

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

P R E F A C E.

THE Work, a new edition of which is here presented to the public, formed quite a desideratum at the time of its original publication. There had, indeed, long existed dictionaries, having for their object the explanation of the various terms, doctrines, ordinances, customs, &c. which are found in the sacred oracles, and their character was more or less in accordance with this very important and laudable object. They were exclusively Biblical. But the multifarious names, phrases, opinions, sects, parties, heresies, &c., which have been introduced since the close of the sacred canon, and which properly appertain to the department of Theological History, were either left uncollected, or, at least, existed in such forms, and were exhibited on such a plan, as were little, if at all calculated to facilitate the acquisition, or promote the extension of religious knowledge.

To supply this deficiency, the respected author applied himself with commendable diligence and extensive research; incorporating into his Work whatever he considered to be important in ecclesiastical history, good and accurate in definition, valuable in theological science, interesting in the religious world, and likely to advance the piety, as well as to gratify the curiosity of his readers. That he succeeded in no ordinary degree, may fairly be concluded from the number of impressions through which the dictionary has gone, and the great extent of its circulation. In the United States of America upwards of 50,000 copies have been circulated.

Since the Work first appeared, other publications, constructed on a similar principle, have been, more or less, brought into competition with it; but instead of displacing it from the position which it has deservedly held in the libraries of the evangelical portion of the community, the demand for copies has been constantly on the increase. With a view to render it still more extensively useful, the Proprietors have resolved to issue a new and improved edition, in which any inaccuracies which might have escaped the author should be corrected, such articles inserted as he had omitted, and the whole, as much as possible, brought down to the present time. In endeavouring to fulfil their wishes, the present Editor has considerably altered several of the original articles, especially such as related to foreign divinity; the circumstances connected with the different religious establishments in Christendom; the history, views, and usages of the different parties that have seceded from these establishments; the literature of theology; and other subjects of a kindred nature. Several that appeared to be of minor importance he has omitted, in order to make room for the insertion of others, of higher and more general interest. The number of additional articles in the present edition amounts to nearly FIVE HUNDRED.

One totally new feature of the Work, as it now appears, is its Biographical department. Readers who have not the command of biographical dictionaries, are frequently at a loss in regard to dates, places, and other circumstances connected with the history of divines and others, to whom reference is currently made, both in conversation and in books on religious subjects. Yet, to supply this want within a reasonable compass has been found to be a matter of no small difficulty. The selection has been regulated by a regard to the prominent station, the literary eminence, or the celebrated character of the individual ; and those writers only have been made the subject of biographical notice, who have exerted, to a considerable extent, a decided influence over the religious opinions and practices of certain sections or communities, in the age in which they lived, and in after times. See the articles, AUGUSTINE, BARCLAY, CALVIN, EDWARDS, KNOX, SANDEMAN, WESLEY, WHITEFIELD, &c.

In preparing the additional articles, the Editor has availed himself of various sources which were not in existence in Mr. Buck's time, or to which he could not obtain access ; and he flatters himself that the extent to which he has carried the improvements will meet with the approbation of general readers.

The volume will be found to contain a melancholy exhibition of the multifarious corruptions of the Christian faith ; of the unhappy influence which pride of intellect, an unbridled imagination, vain speculation, and selfish passions, have had in multiplying the diversity of religious opinion, and in giving rise to interminable disputes. The wide distance at which the various sections of the Christian family still stand from the simplicity and purity of Biblical Christianity, is powerfully adapted to inspire the reader with a practical distrust of himself, an ever wakeful suspicion with respect to the exercise of human authority in matters of religion, an unrelaxing application to the study of the Holy Scriptures, as the only infallible source and standard of Divine Truth, and a constant scriptural dependence on the promised instruction of that Sacred Teacher, one of whose offices it is to "guide into all truth." But while the Work necessarily presents error in almost all the diversity of its modifications, it will also be found to furnish sound, consistent, practical, and consolatory views of all the leading subjects of Revelation ; views calculated to afford instruction to the ignorant, relief to the perplexed, confirmation to the wavering, and conviction to gainsayers.

ADVERTISEMENT TO THE PRESENT EDITION.

IN this Edition a considerable number of new articles have been inserted ; some statements which had been made on incorrect data, have either been rectified, or altogether withdrawn ; every point has been determined according to the latest sources of information ; and the entire work has been rendered as complete as its object and extent would allow.

THEOLOGICAL DICTIONARY.

ABBA, a Syriac word, signifying Father. It is used in the Syriac, Coptic, and Ethiopic churches, as a title given to the bishops. The bishops themselves bestowed the title Abba more eminently on the bishop of Alexandria, which occasioned the people to give him the title of Baba, or Papa, that is, Grandfather: a title which he bore before the bishop of Rome. It is a Jewish title of honour given to certain Rabbins called Tanaites; it is also used by some writers of the middle age for the superior of a monastery. St. Mark and St. Paul use this word, Mark xiv. 36; Rom. viii. 15; Gal. vi. 6, because it was then commonly known in the synagogues and the primitive assemblies of the Christians. Selden has brought a very pertinent quotation from the Babylonian Gemara, to prove that it was not allowed to slaves to use the title of Abba in addressing the master of the family to which they belonged, or the correspondent title of Imma, "Mother," when speaking to the mistress of it—De Succ. in bona Def. cap. 4.

ABBE', before the French Revolution, was the title of all those Frenchmen who devoted themselves to divinity, or had at least pursued a course of study in a theological seminary, in the hope that the king would confer on them a real abbey, i. e. a certain part of the revenues of a monastery. Ordained clergymen, were those only who devoted themselves entirely to the performance of clerical duty; the others were engaged in every kind of literary occupation. There were so many of them, poor and rich, men of quality and men of low birth, that they formed a particular class in society, and exerted an important influence over its character. They were seen everywhere; at court, in the halls of justice, in the theatres, the coffee-houses, &c. In almost every wealthy family was an abbé, occupying the post of familiar friend and spiritual adviser, and not seldom, that of the gallant of the lady. They corresponded, in a certain degree, to the philosophers who lived in the houses of the wealthy Romans in the time of the emperors.

ABBE'S COMMENDATAIRES.—The king of France had formerly the right of appointing abbots over 225 monasteries. These abbots enjoyed a third part of the revenues of the monastery, but had no authority over it, the charge of superintendence being committed to a prieur claustral. According to rule, every abbot ought to receive ordination in the course of a year; but the pope dispensed with the rule, and the abbé spent his income (from 1200 to 150,000 French livres) wherever he pleased. This shocking abuse excited the indignation of the people, and was one of the causes of the Revolution. The lower sinecures of this kind, the abbayes des savans, were used as pensions for learned men; the richer to provide for the younger sons of the nobility.

ABBESS, the superior of an abbey or convent of nuns. The abbess has the same rights and authority over her nuns, that the abbots regular have over their monks. The sex, indeed, does not allow her to perform the spiritual functions annexed to the priesthood, wherewith the abbot is usually invested; but there are instances of some abbesses who have a right, or rather a privilege, to commission a priest to act for them. They have even a kind of episcopal jurisdiction, as well as some abbots, who are exempted from the visitation of their diocesan.

ABBEY, a monastery, governed by a superior under the title of Abbot or Abbess. Monasteries were at first, nothing more than religious houses, whither persons retired from the bustle of the world, to spend their time in solitude and devotion; but they soon degenerated from their original institution, and procured large privileges, exemptions, and riches. They prevailed greatly in Britain before the Reformation, particularly in England; and as they increased in riches, so the state became poor, for the lands which these regulars possessed could never revert to the lords who gave them. These places were wholly abolished by Henry VIII. He first appointed visitors to inspect into the lives of the monks and nuns, which were found in some places very disorderly; upon which the abbots, perceiving their dissolution unavoidable, were induced to resign their houses to the king, who by that means became invested with the abbey lands: these were afterwards granted to different persons, whose descendants enjoy them at this day; they were then valued at 2,853,000*l.* per annum, an immense sum in those days. Though the suppression of these houses, considered in a religious and political light, was a great benefit to the nation, yet it must be owned that, at the time they flourished, they were not entirely useless. Abbeys were then the repositories as well as the seminaries of learning: many valuable books and national records have been preserved in their libraries, the only places wherein they could have been safely lodged in those turbulent times. Indeed, the historians of this country are chiefly beholden to the monks for the knowledge they have of former national events. Thus Providence overruled even the institutions of superstition for good. See MONASTERY.

ABBOT, originally the name of every aged monk; but, after the eighth century, it denotes the chief or head of a monastery. Since the second council of Nice, (787.), abbots have always been priests, and have enjoyed the power of conferring the lower orders of priesthood; but in essential points of jurisdiction, they were everywhere subject to the diocesan bishop till the eleventh century, when, in consequence of the wealth of their monasteries, they were raised to the titles and privileges of bishops, held a rank next to that of bishop, and had a vote in the ecclesiastical councils. Equal rights and privileges appertained to the abbesses as the superiors of the nunneries, except that they have seldom been allowed to vote in synods. As the result of the favour, or the wants of kings, and other causes, many of the most considerable convents came, in the ninth and tenth centuries, into the hands of secular masters, and their spiritual supervision was devolved on inferior abbots, deans, or priors. To the princes and princesses of royal families, abbays were presented to defray the expenses of their table,—while the richest were retained by the kings themselves. Nunneries were sometimes assigned to men, and monasteries to females. In the tenth century, the convents under royal patronage were frequently given in reward for the services of the crown vassals in war; the abbots thus became a kind of military clergy, whose superiors bore, in the camp, the name of field-abbots. In consequence of a reform commenced at Cluny, new monasteries arose without abbots, over which the abbot of reformed Benedictines at that place appointed priors or pro-abbates, or even co-abbates, who remained dependent on him. Besides the Benedictines, only the grey monks of Vallombrosa, the Cistercians, Bernardines, Trappists, Grand Montani, Præmonstratenses, and some bodies of regular choristers, denominate their superiors abbots. Besides the female branches of these orders, the nuns of Fontrevaud, and the female secular choristers, have abbesses. These have always remained under the jurisdiction of their diocesan bishop; but the abbots of many other convents shook off the authority of the bishops, and acknowledged no master but the pope. The mitred abbots enjoyed the right, frequently conferred on the Benedictines in the middle ages by the papal legate, of adopting the episcopal title and insignia. Only a few, however, possessed the episcopal power with dioceses of their own, of whom there was not one in France. Before the period of secularization, there were in Germany, but in Germany only, princely abbots and princely abbesses. These abbays were secularized in 1803, and became principalities. By rule, the choice of abbots belongs to the chapters of their convents. In the independent abbays, this is followed by the papal confirmation; in the dependent, by the episcopal; yet, for a long time, many abbays in Italy have been conferred by the pope, and in France by the king, notwithstanding the concordat of 1516. The secular clergy, who enjoy these benefices without observing the rules of the order, are termed secular abbots; on the other hand, their vicars in the convents themselves, like all abbots of the monkish order, are called regular abbots. Younger sons of distinguished families have often entered the ranks of the secular clergy, in order to become secular abbots, and to receive the income of an abbey without being restricted by monastic rules. As such expectants were called in France abbés, this became a general appellation for young secular clergy who were out of office. (See ABBE'.) Since the Revolution, which changed the abbays into national property, and took from those expectants the objects of their exertions, this class has diminished in France, but it is yet numerous in Italy, where young scholars are called abbots, merely from having undergone the tonsure, though not in orders. Napoleon led a whole army of Italian abbots to Corsica, where they lived on reduced incomes till the restoration again scattered them over Italy.

At the time of the Reformation, several abbays and convents were retained for the benefit of the clergy, and the support of unmarried females. Some Protestant clergymen, therefore, still bear the name of abbot, with which dignity the right of sitting in the Diet of the states is united; as for example, in the Wurtemberg Assembly. There are also Protestant ladies who are called abbesses. In Lower Saxony, indeed, this dignity was abolished at the time of the confiscation of the cloisters, &c., under the French Westphalian government; but in some countries, as in the kingdom of Hanover, it has been restored.

In the Greek church, the superiors of a convent are called Hegoumeni, and the abbots-general, Archimandrites.

ABDIAH, a reputed disciple of Christ in Babylon, to whom is ascribed a book purporting to contain the lives of the Apostles, but which is full of fabulous stories utterly unworthy of credit.

ABELLIANS, ABELITES, ABELONIANS, a sect which arose about the year 360, near Hippo, in Africa, and borrowed their name from Abel, the son of Adam, because as they supposed, he died unmarried and without children. Though they did not abstain from matrimony, yet they had no carnal knowledge of their wives, that they might not be instrumental in propagating original sin. That their numbers might be kept up, they adopted the children of others, on whom they settled their property, on condition that they would adhere to the principles of the sect. It does not appear to have continued long in existence, but it has recently been revived among the Shakers of America.

ABGARUS, or AGBARUS, a king of Edessa in Mesopotamia, who, according to Eusebius, wrote a letter to our Saviour, and received an answer from him, both of which are preserved by that historian, and may be seen also in Lardner's works, and Jones on the Canon. Though their genuineness has been advocated by Cave, Grabe, and others, they are generally considered to be spurious. The pretended epistle of Christ, is by no means worthy of him, and appears to be a mere piece of patchwork, taken from several passages of the Gospels. Nor is it likely that any thing written by the Saviour's own hand, could have remained unknown to the rest of the world till the time of Eusebius. The royal epistle too, is not in the style of an oriental prince.

ABJURATION, OATH OF, an oath by which an obligation was come under not to acknowledge any right in the Pretender to the throne of England. It is also used to signify an oath, ordained by the 25th of Charles II., abjuring particular doctrines of the church of Rome.

ABLUTION, a ceremony in use among the ancients, and still practised in several parts of the world. It consisted in washing the body, which was always done before sacrificing, or even entering their houses. Ablutions appear to be as old as any ceremonies, and external worship itself. Moses enjoined them, the heathens adopted them, and Mahomet and his followers have continued them. The Egyptians, the Greeks, the Romans, the Jews, all had them. The ancient Christians had their ablutions before communion, which the Romish church still retain before their mass, and sometimes after. The Syrians, Copts, &c., have their solemn washings on Good Friday: the Turks also have their ablutions, their Ghast, their Wodou, &c.

ABRAHAMITES.—I. A sect of heretics, so called from their founder, who, towards the end of the eighth century, revived at Antioch his native place, that of the Paulicians, and corrupted a great part of the Syrians; but Cyriacus, the bishop of the Syrian church, powerfully opposed him, and soon put an end to his party.

II. An order of monks in the ninth century, who were exterminated by Theophilus for the idolatrous practices in which they indulged.

III. A modern sect which sprang up in Bohemia about the middle of the last century. They take the name, because they profess to be of the same religion that Abraham was before he was circumcised. They reject this rite, though some of them are circumcised, having formerly been Jews: the rest have either been Catholics or Protestants. They believe in one God, the immortality of the soul, and future rewards and punishments; but they deny the divine legation of Moses, and only receive the Ten Commandments and the Lord's Prayer. They reject the doctrine of original sin, the Trinity, and other peculiar doctrines of revelation. To avoid persecution, they at first attended worship in the churches; but on the publication of the edict of Joseph II., establishing entire toleration throughout his dominions, they avowed their sentiments, and presented a petition to the emperor, who declared that he would not violate their consciences; but false to his promise, he only allowed them till the 24th of March, 1783, to incorporate themselves with one of the religions tolerated in the empire, and threatened them with banishment if they did not comply. Proving obstinate, the imperial menace was carried into execution; and they were transported to Transylvania and the Bannat of Temeswar. There are still in Bohemia, numbers between whom and the Abrahamites some connexion has been traced; but they are not molested by the government. They are known by the name of Deists and Nihilists, because they believe in nothing.—Gregoire's Histoire des Sectes, b. ix. ch. xi.

ABRASAX STONES, gems found in great abundance in Spain, which represent a human body, with the head of a cock and the feet of a reptile. They have often the inscription Abrasax or Abraxas in Greek characters, which is supposed, however, to be of Persian or Egyptian origin. According to Bellermin, they belonged to the religious sect of the Basilidians, and were used, partly as means for teaching secret doctrines, partly as symbols, and partly as amulets or talismans. The name is also given to those stones which bear the emblems of Sabeism. Dr. Neander, of Berlin, has written an interesting dissertation on the subject.

ABSOLUTION signifies acquittal. It is taken, also, for that act whereby the priest declares the sins of such as are penitent remitted. In the earlier ages it was a judicial act, by which the priest, in the name of the community, invoking the favour of God, announced to the penitent his remission from ecclesiastical punishment, and readmission into the bosom of the church. Private absolution having in the course of time become prevalent, through priests acting in the name of the bishop, the opinion was spread among the people, that they had the power of absolving by their own authority, and without the consent of the church. The formula of absolution in the church of Rome, has been said to be absolute; in the Greek church, deprecatory; and in Protestant churches, declaratory. The Romanists hold absolution a part of the sacrament of penance; and the council of Trent, and that of Florence, declare the form or essence of the sacrament to lie in the words of absolution, "I absolve thee of thy sins." According to this, no one can receive absolution without the privacy, consent, and declaration of the priest; except, therefore the priest be willing, God himself cannot pardon any man. This is a doctrine as blasphemous as it is ridiculous. The chief passage on which they ground their power of absolution, is that in John xx. 23: "Whosoever sins ye remit, they are remitted unto them, and whosoever sins ye retain, they are retained." But this is not to the purpose; since this was a special commission to the apostles themselves, and the first preachers of the gospel, and most probably referred to the power Christ gave them of discerning spirits. By virtue of this power, Peter struck Ananias and Sapphira dead, and Paul struck Elymas blind. But supposing the passage in question to apply to the successors of the apostles, and to ministers in general, it can only import that their office is to preach pardon to the penitent, assuring those who believe that their sins are forgiven through the merits of Jesus Christ; and that those who remain in unbelief are in a state of condemnation. Any idea of authority given to fallible, uninspired men to absolve sinners, different from this, is unscriptural; nor is there any propriety in the terms ministerial or declarative absolution, as adopted by some divines, since absolution is wholly the prerogative of God; and the terms above mentioned, can, to say the least, have no good influence on the minds of the ignorant and superstitious.

The ancients reckoned up five kinds of absolution. 1. That of Baptism. 2. That of the Eucharist. 3. That of the word and doctrine. 4. That of imposition of hands, and prayer. 5. That of reconciliation to the communion of the church, by a relaxation of her censures. The two first have been called sacramental; the third, declaratory; the fourth, deprecatory; and the fifth, judicial. The first had no relation to penitential discipline, being never given to persons who had once received baptism. The second had some relation to it, but did not solely belong to it; for it was given to all baptized persons, who never fell under penitential discipline, as well as those who lapsed and were restored to communion again: and in both respects it was called τὸ τελεῖον, the perfection or consummation of a Christian. By the third, the minister made public declaration to men of the terms of reconciliation and salvation. The fourth sort was used as a concomitant of most other absolutions; and by the fifth, penitents were finally restored to the peace and full communion of the church.

In the Liturgy of the Church of England, there are three several forms of absolution. The first is that at morning prayer, "Almighty God, &c. who hath given power, &c. He pardoneth and absolveth," &c. The second is used at the visitation of the sick, "Our Lord Jesus Christ, who hath left power to his church, &c. by his authority committed to me, I absolve thee," &c. The third is in the communion service, "Almighty God, &c. who hath promised forgiveness of sins, &c. have mercy upon you," &c. These three different forms, says Bishop Sparrow, are, in sense and virtue, the same.—"For as when a prince hath granted a commission to any servant of his, to release out of prison all penitent offenders whatever, it were all one, in effect, as to the prisoner's discharge, whether this servant says, by virtue of a commission granted to me, under the prince's hand and seal, I release this prisoner; or thus, the prince, who hath given me this commission, pardons you; or lastly, the prince pardon and deliver you: so here," &c.

The form of absolution, which the pope gives to crowned heads who have been excommunicated, is briefly this. The pope is seated on a rich pontifical throne erected before St. Peter's church, attended by the apostolical court. The ambassadors of the excommunicated princes appear before this assembly, and throw themselves at his holiness's feet, asking pardon in the name of their masters, and desiring absolution. Then they lay their hands on the mass-book, and swear, by the Holy Gospels, and the Holy Crucifix, obedience to the church. Then the pope, and twelve cardinal-priests, sing the Miserere, observing to strike the ambassadors on the shoulder at the beginning of each verse. The ceremony ends with prayers, and the imposition of a penance proportionable to the crime of the person absolved.

ABSTEMII, a name given to such persons as could not partake of the cup of the eucharist, on account of their natural aversion to wine.

ABSTINENCE. See FASTING.

ABSTINENTS, a set of heretics that appeared in France and Spain about the end of the third century. They are supposed to have borrowed part of their opinions from the Gnostics and Manichæans, because they opposed marriage, condemned the use of flesh meat, and placed the Holy Ghost in the class of created beings.

ABUNA, (our father), the title of the Patriarch of Abyssinia, who is generally taken from among the Coptic priests, as the Abyssinians and Copts keep up a communication with each other at Cairo. He has under him the Kamosats, or the chief priests of the secular clergy, the learned theologians and monks.

ABYSSINIAN CHURCH. See CHURCH, ABYSSINIAN.

ACACIANS, a set of heretics in the fourth century; so named from Acacius, bishop of Cæsarea, who denied the Son to be of the same substance with the Father, though some of them allowed that he was of a similar substance. Also the name of another sect, named after Acacius, patriarch of Constantinople, in the fifth century, who favoured the opinions of Eutychus. See EUTYCHIANS.

ACADEMICS, a denomination given to the cultivators of a species of philosophy originally derived from Socrates, and afterwards illustrated and enforced by Plato. The contradictory systems which had been successively urged upon the world were become so numerous, that from a view of the variety and uncertainty of human opinions, many were led to conclude that truth lay beyond the reach of our comprehension. The consequence of this conclusion was absolute scepticism: hence the existence of God, the immortality of the soul, the preferableness of virtue to vice, were all held as uncertain. This sect, with that of the Epicureans, were the two chief that were in vogue at the time of Christ's appearance, and were embraced and supported by persons of high rank and wealth. A consideration of the principles of these two sects [see EPICUREANS] will lead us to form an idea of the deplorable state of the world at the time of Christ's birth; and the necessity there was of some divine teacher to convey to the mind true and certain principles of religion and wisdom. Jesus Christ, therefore, is with great propriety called the Day-Spring from on high, the Sun of Righteousness, that arose upon a benighted world to dispel the clouds of ignorance and error, and discover to lost man the path of happiness and heaven. But, as we do not mean to enlarge much upon these and some other sects, which belong rather to philosophy than theology, we shall refer the reader to Buddens's Introduction to the History of Philosophy; Stanley's Lives; Brucker's History of Philosophy; or (which is more modern) Enfield's Abridgment.

ACADEMY, a place in which the sciences are taught, and in a more restricted theo-gical sense, a house or establishment in which young men are trained for the ministry. The name is derived from the Athenian academy belonging to a certain Academus, which was a famous school for gymnastic exercises, and a place where Plato taught. The first institution of antiquity which merits the name, was that of Alexandria. Attracted by the generosity of the Ptolemies, a numerous association of scholars was collected in that city, who were to have laboured for the perfection and extension of human knowledge, but soon fell into idleness or the exercise of grammatical subtleties. From Alexandria it is supposed the Jews borrowed the custom of founding academies, which were established after the close of the first century, in the cities on the Euphrates, Sora, Neharda, and Punebedita. They had also a famous school at Tiberias, which flourished for several centuries. From them the Nestorians learned in the sixth century to value science, and imparted the same spirit to the Arabs, whose caliphs, Almansor, Harun-al-Rashid, and Almamum, founded a number of academies, which were extended from Cordova, in Spain, to Bockara in the East, with the greatest success. At the court too of Charlemagne we find an academy founded by the emperor, at the suggestion of his instructor, Alcuin, of which he was himself a member. This useful institution was broken up after the death of Alcuin, and no academies, properly so called, are found till the time of the conquest of Constantinople by the Turks, when several Greek scholars were compelled to flee to Italy. Lorenzo de Medici then founded, at Florence, the first Grecian academy, under the care of Argyropylus, Theodore Gaza, and Chalcondylas. Cosmo afterwards established the Platonic academy, the object of which was the study of the writings of Plato, and the restoration of his philosophy.—This gave place to others of various names, which with numbers of more recent origin, still exist.

The term, in its theological acceptation, is now almost exclusively applied to those collegiate seminaries in which candidates for the work of the ministry among Dissenters are conducted through the requisite preparatory courses of instruction; an account of which is contained in the following article.

ACADEMIES, DISSIDENTING.—The origin of these institutions is to be traced to the ejection of many of the most learned ministers of the Church of England, by the Act of Uniformity, the introduction of certain oaths as prerequisites to admission into the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, and the necessity of making provision for the due instruction of such as should be called to labour in future among the nonconformist portion of the community. The edict that deprived those divines of their livings, could not despoil them of their erudition. The treasures of knowledge which they had acquired at the university, eminently qualified them for undertaking the tuition of youth; while the straitened circumstances to which many of them were reduced, obliged them to open schools and establish academies, in which they taught the classics, and read lectures on different branches of theology and general science. As might be expected, these rising seminaries were viewed with fear and jealousy, and harassing processes were instituted in the Spiritual Court against those who presided over them.

The first dissenting academy was opened at the village of Rathmill, near Giggleswick, in Yorkshire, in the year 1665, by Richard Frankland, whom Cromwell had fixed upon to preside over the college which he erected for academical learning at Durham, but who was driven from his situation when the institution was put down at the Restoration. In this seclusion he educated not fewer than three hundred young men. Much about the same time similar institutions were established at Newington Green, under Mr. Morton and Mr. Gale; at Sheriffhales, under Mr. Woodhouse; at Taunton, under Mr. Warren; at Shrewsbury, under Mr. Owen; at Hoxton, under Mr. Spademan; at Islington, under Mr. Doolittle; at Sulby and Little Creacon, under Mr. Shuttlewood; at Wickham Brook, under Mr. Cradock; at Tewksbury, under Mr. Jones, and subsequently at different places in various counties, under the care of gifted and zealous ministers. These schools, many of which were continued by able tutors, after the death of those who had founded them, sent forth a noble race of ministers, whose labours were eminently blessed, for promoting the interests of true religion throughout the country.

Subsequently academies were established in other places,—among which that of Northampton, under Dr. Doddridge, ranked first, and furnished, during the presidency of that eminent servant of Christ, not fewer than one hundred and twenty ministers.

The following are the institutions at present in existence, in alphabetical order:—

AIRDALE COLLEGE, at Undercliffe, in the vicinity of Bradford, Yorkshire. This college, formerly known by the name of Idle Academy, was removed from Idle to the above-mentioned place, in consequence of the handsome donation of two estates in aid of its object. About twenty students receive their education in it.

BRECON COLLEGE, in South Wales, formerly established at Newtown. It is under the superintendence of a committee, and is supported partly by the congregational churches in Wales, and partly by the Congregational Fund Board.

CARMARTHEN ACADEMY, supported by the Presbyterian Fund Board, educates about twelve students.

CHESHUNT COLLEGE, Herts, founded by the Countess of Huntingdon at Talgarth in Wales, but removed to its present locality in 1791. It contains twenty students, who are left at liberty to pursue the ministry in any denomination to which they may choose to attach themselves. The present Trustees have liberally made provision for the education of students designed for Missionary service.

COWARD COLLEGE, so called in memory of its founder. This institution was originally located at Wymondly, Herts; but in 1832, the trustees, determining to avail themselves of the advantages to be derived from the London University College, removed to Byng Place, Torrington Square, where the students reside, and the business is carried on, under the superintendence of a resident theological tutor, in a handsome building, purchased and fitted up for the purpose. The number of students is sixteen.

EXETER, or WESTERN ACADEMY. This establishment sprung out of a seminary successively carried on at St. Mary Ottery, Bridport, Taunton and Axminster. It occupies a commodious building in the vicinity of Exeter, and accommodates fourteen students.

HACKNEY THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY, projected by the Rev. John Eyre, A.M., an English clergyman; and chiefly indebted for its support to the munificent bequest of £10,000 by Charles Townsend, Esq., to the Village Itineracy Society, under the auspices of which its business is prosecuted. The students are from ten to fifteen in number.

HIGHBURY COLLEGE, in the parish of Islington near London, is a continuation of the Institution originally founded at Mile End in 1783, but removed to Hoxton in 1791. From the latter locality it was again removed in 1826, to its present site, which was handsomely presented by the Treasurer, Thomas Wilson, Esq., of Highbury Place. It furnishes accommodation for forty students.

HOMERTON COLLEGE, in the vicinity of London, consists of two foundations, one of which dates as far back as 1690; and the other, to which the property belongs, commenced in 1730. It accommodates twenty students.

LANCASHIRE INDEPENDENT COLLEGE, formerly BLACKBURN ACADEMY. This Institution which sprung from the more private seminary supported at Manchester, by Robert Spear, Esq., and was conducted for nearly thirty years at Blackburn, is now removed to the former of these towns, where its business is conducted in a building singularly elegant and ornamental.

NEWPORT PAGNEL EVANGELICAL INSTITUTION. This academy owes its origin to the benevolent plans of the late excellent John Thornton, Esq., in connexion with the aid of Cowper the poet, the Rev. John Newton, and the Rev. J. Clayton, sen. It was established in 1784, and educated suitable candidates for the ministry irrespective of their particular views in regard to Church government. The number of students is eight.

ROTHERHAM COLLEGE, at Masborough, near Rotherham, has recently been considerably enlarged and improved, and accommodates upwards of twenty students.

SPRING-HILL-COLLEGE, Birmingham. This new establishment originated in the liberality of the late George Storer Mansfield, Esq., and his sisters, Mrs. Sarah Glover, and Miss Elizabeth Mansfield.

All the literary establishments above enumerated belong to dissenters of the Pædo-baptist persuasion. The Anti-Pædo-baptists have similar institutions, of which the principal are:—

BRISTOL ACADEMY, commenced in the reign of George II., and has given education to a considerable number of ministers who have been an honour to the denomination. The number of students is about twenty. Its library in 1825 contained upwards of 7000 volumes.

BRADFORD ACADEMY opened in 1806: furnishes accommodation for twenty-two students.

STEPNEY ACADEMY was founded in 1810. It educates at present fourteen students, but has ample room for more, if the funds of the institution would allow.

ABERGAVENNY ACADEMY, founded in 1807 for the education of Welsh Anti-pædo-baptist ministers, educates at present only seven students.

In all the academies of both persuasions, no principles but those generally accounted orthodox are taught. Arian or Socinian academies have existed at Exeter, Hoxton, Warrington, Hackney, and Manchester; but though enjoying the tuition of such eminent literary characters as Drs. Taylor, Aikin, Priestley, &c., they were not able to sustain themselves, and gradually died away. The only seminary which the Socinians now have is that known by the name of Manchester College. It was removed to York in 1803, but was again removed from that city to Manchester in 1839. The number of its students has never exceeded twenty.

In Scotland the Presbyterian Dissenters have what they term divinity halls, in which their students are carried through different courses on theology; and the Congregationalists have a theological academy at Glasgow, where they enjoy the able tuition of the Rev. Messrs. Ewing and Wardlaw, and possess, besides, the privilege of attending the different courses at the university.

America, rising rapidly into importance and influence as a modern state, stands distinguished also for the number and efficiency of her colleges. Most of these, however, differ essentially from our dissenting colleges. Being designed to furnish tuition in all the branches of ancient and modern literature, and thereby to prepare youth for any department which they may be called to fill, they receive young men without discrimination as to religious character. With their theological seminaries it is otherwise. Into most of these none are admitted who do not give satisfactory evidence of piety and devotedness to the sacred objects of the Christian ministry. They are established at Andover, Princeton, Bangor, Cambridge, Alleghany, Alexandria, New Brunswick, Hartwick, Gettysburg, Carlisle, Maryville, and Rock Spring, &c. Of these, that at Cambridge alone is heterodox, being designed for the instruction of students connected with the Socinian congregations. Andover Institution was established in 1807. It has a president and four professorships. The course of study embraces three years; the students coming well prepared from some of the colleges, where they have gone through the classics and the various courses on human literature. The first year is devoted to sacred literature, the second to Christian theology, and the third to sacred rhetoric. It contains one hundred and twenty students.

Into the British dissenting academies, no young man is received who does not bring sufficient testimonials as to moral character, piety, and talents, and who has not previously submitted to a close and particular examination. These being satisfactory, the candidate is admitted on three months' probation, at the expiration of which, if the report of the tutors be favourable, he is fully received. The term of study varies, but averages about four years. The students are instructed in the Greek and Latin classics; Hebrew, Chaldee, Syriac; Mathematics, Natural History, Mental and Moral Philosophy, Biblical Antiquities, Exegesis and Hermeneutics, Systematic, Polemical, and Pastoral Theology; Ecclesiastical History, &c.

ACATHOLICI, those in general who do not belong to the Catholic Church. In Roman Catholic countries Protestants are distinguished by this name.

ACCENSORII, or Lighters, a name generally given to the ancient acolouthi, because they lighted the candles in the churches.

ACCLAMATIONS, ECCLESIASTICAL, were shouts of joy which the people expressed by way of approbation of their preachers. It hardly seems credible to us that practices of this kind should ever have found their way into the church, where all ought to be reverence and solemnity. Yet so it was in the fourth century. The people were not only permitted, but sometimes even exhorted, by the preacher himself, to approve his talents by clapping of hands, and loud acclamations of praise. The usual words they made use of were, "Orthodox," "Third Apostle," &c. These acclamations being carried to excess, and often misplaced, were frequently prohibited by the ancient doctors, and at length abrogated. Even as late, however, as the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, we find practices that were not very decorous; such as loud humming, frequent groaning, strange gestures of the body, &c. See articles DANCERS, SHAKERS.

ACCOMMODATION, the application of one thing by analogy to another, in consequence of a resemblance real or supposed between them. To know a thing by accommodation is to know it by the idea of a similar thing referred to it.

In theology, the term accommodation is applied to what may be called the indirect fulfilment of prophecy; as when passages, that originally related to one event, are quoted as if they referred to another, in which some resemblance may be traced. The method of explaining Scripture on this principle of accommodation, serves, it has been said, as a key for solving some of the greatest difficulties relating to the prophecies. It has been justly called a convenient principle; for if it were once generally adopted, we should get rid of the strongest proofs of the truth of Christianity, which prophecy has hitherto been supposed to furnish. It is not affirmed, that this is either the wish or the design of some of the authors who have adopted and defended the principle of accommodation; but scarcely any of them, with the exception perhaps of one or two German divines, have pleaded for its unlimited application to the Old Testament predictions. It is vain to press even Michaelis into the service, as has been lately attempted; for both he and his no less acute and learned commentator Marsh, expressly avow, not merely their doubt of the propriety of universally extending this principle, but their conviction of the danger with which it would be attended, and of the inconclusive reasonings which its patrons have brought forward in its defence. (Vide Marsh's Michaelis, vol. i. p. 200—214, and Notes, p. 470—479.) The following view of the subject is taken chiefly from their statements.

This mode of interpreting the prophecies, was early introduced among theologians, probably by Origen, who employs it under the name of Oikonomia, (which the Latin fathers afterwards called dispensatio;) in replying to the objections of Celsus; and whose allegorical disposition did such injury to the cause of truth. They expressly affirmed that the Apostles accommodated their quotations from the Old Testament to the prejudices of the Jews, without any regard to their original import; an opinion the most unwarrantable and dangerous; for that those who were commissioned to publish the revelations of God to mankind should have recourse to such an unjustifiable artifice, is contrary to all the notions which sound reason, the ultimate judge of the truth of revelation, leads us to form respecting the divine character and conduct. Dr. Eckermann extends the doctrine of accommodation to every quotation in the New Testament, without exception; proceeding on the hypothesis that the Old Testament contains no prophecy which literally and immediately relates to the person of Jesus Christ. Dr. Owen on the contrary, in his "Modes of Quotations," sec. 5, entirely rejects the principle of accommodation, to whose opinion Michaelis is, in most cases, inclined to accede, though with this essential difference, that he admits only a grammatical and literal, whilst Dr. Owen contends for a typical meaning of particular passages.

With respect to the quotations from the Jewish Scriptures, contained in the New Testament, it seems necessary to make an accurate distinction between those which, being merely borrowed, are used as the words of the person who quotes them, and those which are produced as proofs of a doctrine or the completion of a prophecy. In the one case, accommodation may be allowed; for it is natural to suppose that the writers of the New Testament, from their intimate acquaintance with the Septuagint, might often allude to passages and quote them from memory, as an illustration of what they were stating, without directly intending to bring them forward as irresistible arguments. But in the other case, there is no little difficulty, and even hazard, in having recourse to this principle; for if it once be admitted that the Evangelists and Apostles, and even our Lord himself, employed arguments, which, on this supposition, are evidently no arguments at all, the inspiration of the one, and the divine mission of the other, must be extremely equivocal.

If it were true that the Old Testament was falsely quoted in the New, when either doctrines or prophecies are the subjects of discussion, it would be necessary to make the following distinctions:—1. If such quotations were discovered in a book, whose canonical authority is doubted, they must be regarded as human errors, and the inspiration of the book itself be abandoned. 2. If they could be found in those books which belong to the ὁμολογούμενα, the inspiration of these books also must be given up, though no inference could be drawn that the Apostles were not preachers of a divine religion. 3. But were it possible to show that the very author of our religion had made a wrong application of any text of the Old Testament, it would follow that he was not infallible, and that Christianity itself was false.

It seems particularly obvious, that the principle of accommodation should not be hastily adopted where the strong expressions are used, "This was done that it might be fulfilled which was spoken by the prophet;" or, "Then was fulfilled that which was spoken," &c. A formula of this kind is never used in quoting from a classic author: it is, therefore, no argument in favour of accommodation in these cases, to say with Nicholls, (Conference with a Theist, P. iii. p. 11.) that no one would object to a writer who should address the Apostles in the words of Virgil's invocation of the sun and moon—

—Vos, o clarissima mundi Lumina.

Every one must perceive that these cases are quite dissimilar, and that when the sacred writers used the above expressions, they were persuaded that the passages which they introduced did directly refer to the events to which they applied them. Wetstein (Note on Matt. i. 22) alleges an example of similar latitude of expression from Ephrem Syrus; and Dr. Sykes (Introduction to the Hebrews, sec. 3) appeals to other writers also. The authority of Jerome, however, whom he quotes among the rest, is of little weight, as that learned father was an avowed allegorist. The examples of Wetstein, and those which Dr. Sykes has quoted from Epiphanius and Olympiodorus, are not much more conclusive, being only similar to the language which we would use in cautioning any one, "Let not that be fulfilled in thee;" where the caution itself implies, that the words to which we allude are no prophecy.

Dr. Sykes indeed, affirms, that if we were better acquainted with the Jewish phraseology, we should less hesitate in admitting the principle of accommodation. As to the particular term "fulfilled," he says the Jewish writers very often meant no more by it than the happening of a similar event, or an exact agreement in particular circumstances of latter things with the former; and that the masters of the synagogue applied passages of the Old Testament in senses very remote from that of the original author. But, not to insist on the impropriety of putting the inspired writers of the New Testament on a level with the Jewish Rabbis, it must not be concealed that this learned author has produced no examples from the Talmud, or from any Jewish commentator, where similar expressions are used in cases of mere accommodation, and no assertion can be admitted without authority. This omission is the more inexcusable, that the very principle which he defends rests almost entirely on the decision of the question,—Did the Rabbis in quoting passages from the Old Testament, with a formula of this kind, "In this the Scripture was fulfilled," consider these passages as directly referring to the events to which they applied them? or did they ground the quotation on a mere parity of circumstances? It is no small presumption against his assertions, that Surenhusius, who has accurately examined this question in his βιβλος καταλλαγης, (Amsterd., 1713,) decides against them. In his third thesis, "De formulis allegandi," he compares the expression, επληρωθη η γραφη, with the rabbinical formulae; and referring to the Tanchuma, fol. 39, col. 3, where Deut. xvii. 7, is quoted with the formula, "ad confirmandum id quod scriptum est," observes, "ex cuius loci applicatione patet illam formulam, non solum alludendi verum etiam demonstrandi vim habere," that it is not merely allusive, but demonstrative.—Encyclop. Edin.

ACCUSED. See ANATHEMA.

ACEPHALI, such bishops as were exempt from the discipline and jurisdiction of their ordinary bishop or patriarch. It was also the denomination of certain sects who refused to acknowledge any ecclesiastical head:—1. Of those who, in the affair of the council of Ephesus, refused to follow either St. Cyril or John of Antioch; 2. Of certain monophysite monks and priests in Egypt, who did not acknowledge the patriarch, Peter Mongus, because he had not, at the adoption of the Henoticon, in 483, expressly condemned the council of Chalcedon. 3. Of the followers of Severus of Antioch, and of all, in general, who held out against the council of Chalcedon; and, 4. Of the Flagellants, whom see.

ACOMETÆ, or ACOOMETI, an order of monks at Constantinople in the fifth century, whom the writers of that and the following ages called Ἀκομηται; that is, Watchers, because they performed divine service day and night without intermission. They divided themselves into three classes, who alternately succeeded one another, so that they kept up a perpetual course of worship. This practice they founded upon that passage—"Pray without ceasing." 1 Thess. v. 17.

ACOLOUTHY, or ACOLITES, servants of the church, who appeared in the Latin Church as early as the third century; but in the Greek not till the fifth. Their office was to light the candles, thence they were called accensores; to carry the tapers in the festal processions, thence ceruiferarii; to present the wine and water at the supper, and in general to assist the bishops and priests in the performance of the ceremonies. They belonged to the clergy, and had a rank immediately below the subdeacons. In the Roman Church the consecration of an acolouthos is the highest of the lower kinds of ordination. The person ordained receives a candlestick and chalice, in token of his ancient employment. The duties, however, formerly belonging to this office, have been performed since the seventh century by menials and boys taken from the laity, who are improperly called acoulouthi in the books of Roman liturgy. The modern Greek Church no longer retains even the name.

ACT, CONVENTICLE, passed in 1664. It enacted that only five persons above sixteen years of age, besides the family, were to meet for any worship, domestic or social. The first offence on the part of him who officiated was three months' imprisonment, or five pounds fine; the second, six months' imprisonment, or ten pounds; the third offence was transportation for life, or a fine of one hundred pounds. Those who permitted conventicles to be held in their barns, houses, or out-houses, were liable to the same forfeitures; and married women taken at such meetings were to be imprisoned for twelve months, unless their husbands paid forty shillings for their redemption. The power of enforcing the act was lodged in the hands of a single justice of the peace, who might proceed, without the verdict of a jury, on the bare oath of an informer. In consequence of this act, houses were broken open, goods and cattle distrained, persons arrested, and the gaols in the different counties filled with those who had been guilty of no other misdemeanour but that of assembling together to worship God, or listen to the exposition of his holy word.

ACT, CORPORATION, a statute of 13 Charles II., chap. i., in which, to the end that the succession in corporations might most probably be perpetuated in the hands of persons well affected to his Majesty, and the established government, it was, among other things, enacted, "That no person shall be chosen into any office of magistracy, or other employment relating to corporations, who shall not, within one year next before such election, have taken the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, according to the rites of the Church of England."

ACT, FIVE-MILE, or OXFORD, an act passed in 1665, which imposed an oath on all non-conformists, binding them to attempt no alteration in either church or state; and provided that all ministers, who did not take it, should neither live in, nor come within five miles (except in crossing the road) of any borough, city, or corporate town; or within five miles of any parish, town, or place in which they had been, since the Act of Oblivion, parson, vicar, or lecturer, under a penalty of forty pounds, and being rendered incapable of teaching any school, or taking any boarders to be taught or instructed.

ACT, TEST, a statute, 25 Charles II. 2, for preventing dangers that were apprehended from Popish recusants, by which it was enacted, that every person who should be admitted into office or trust under his Majesty, should, among other things therein required, receive the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, according to the usage of the Church of England, within three months after his admittance into such office, under very severe penalties. This, together with the Corporation Act, has at last been repealed, after a very protracted struggle on the part of the dissenters.

ACT OF TOLERATION, the famous statute of William and Mary, sec. i., ch. 18, "for exempting their Majesties' Protestant subjects dissenting from the Church of England, from the penalties of certain laws" enforcing conformity (except the Test Acts), and extending a free and full toleration to all dissenters, excepting Papists and such as deny the Trinity.

The preamble states,—That forasmuch as some ease to scrupulous consciences, in the exercise of religion, may be an effectual means to unite their Majesties' Protestant subjects in interest and affection, it enacts as follows, viz.—

Sect. II. That neither the statute made in the 23d of Elizabeth, intituled "An Act to retain the Queen's Majesty's subjects to their due obedience;" nor the statute made in the twentieth year of the said Queen, "for the more speedy and due execution of certain branches of the former act;" nor that clause of a statute made in the first year of the said Queen, intituled "An Act for the Uniformity of Common Prayer," &c.; whereby all persons are required to resort to their parish church or chapel, upon pain of punishment by the censures of the church; and also upon pain that every person so offending shall forfeit, for every such offence, twelve pence; nor the statute made in the third year of the late King James, intituled "An Act for the better discovering and repressing Popish Recusants;" nor that other statute, intituled "An Act to prevent and avoid dangers which may grow by Popish Recusants;" nor any other law or statute of this realm made against Papists or Popish Recusants, shall be construed to extend to any person or persons dissenting from the Church of England, that shall take the oaths of allegiance and supremacy, and shall make and subscribe the declaration against Popery; which oaths and declaration the justices of peace at the general sessions of the peace for the county or place where such persons shall live, are hereby required to administer to such persons as shall offer themselves to make and subscribe the same, and thereof to keep a register; and, likewise, none of the persons aforesaid shall give or pay, as any fee or reward, to any officer belonging to the court, above the sum of sixpence for his entry of his taking the said oaths, &c., nor above the further sum of sixpence for any certificate of the same.

Sect. IV. That every person that shall take the said oaths, and make and subscribe the declaration aforesaid, shall not be liable to any pains, penalties, or forfeitures, mentioned in an act made in the 35th of the late Queen Elizabeth, nor in an act made in the 22d of Charles II., intituled "An Act to prevent and suppress Seditious Conventicles;" nor shall any of the said persons be prosecuted in any ecclesiastical court for their nonconformity to the Church of England.

Sect. V. Provided that, if any assembly of persons, dissenting from the Church of England, shall be held in any place for religious worship with the doors locked, barred, or bolted, during any time of such meeting together, such persons shall not receive any benefit from this law, but be liable to all the pains and penalties of all the aforesaid laws.

Sect. VI. Provided that nothing herein contained shall be construed to exempt any of the persons aforesaid from paying of tithes, or other parochial duties; nor from any prosecution in any ecclesiastical court, or elsewhere, for the same.

Sect. VII. That if any person dissenting, &c., as aforesaid, shall hereafter be chosen high constable, or petit constable, churchwarden, overseer of the poor, or any other parochial or ward officer, and such person shall scruple to take upon him any of the said offices, in regard of the oaths or any other matter or thing required by the law to be taken or done in respect of such office, every such person shall and may execute such office by a sufficient deputy, that shall comply with the laws on this behalf.

Sect. VIII. That no person dissenting from the Church of England in holy orders, or pretended holy orders, or pretending to holy orders, nor any preacher or teacher of any congregation of Dissenting Protestants, that shall make and subscribe the declaration aforesaid, and take the said oaths at the general or quarter sessions of the peace, to be held for the county, town, parts, or division where such person lives, which court is hereby empowered to administer the same, and shall also declare his approbation of, and subscribe the articles of religion mentioned in the statute made in the 13th of Queen Elizabeth, except the 34th, 35th, and 36th, and these words in the 20th article; viz.—“the Church hath power to decree rites or ceremonies, and authority in controversies of faith,”—shall be liable to any of the pains or penalties mentioned in former acts.

Sect. X. recites, That some dissenting Protestants scruple the baptizing of infants; and proceeds to enact,—That every person in pretended holy orders, &c., &c., that shall subscribe the aforesaid articles of religion, except before excepted, and also except part of the 27th article, touching infant baptism, and shall take the said oaths, &c., &c., shall enjoy all the privileges, benefits, and advantages which any other dissenting minister might enjoy.

Sect. XI. That every teacher or preacher in holy orders, or pretended holy orders, that is, a minister, preacher, or teacher of a congregation, that shall take the oaths herein required, and make and subscribe the declaration aforesaid, &c., &c., shall be exempted from serving upon any jury, or from being appointed to bear the office of churchwarden, overseer of the poor, or any other parochial or ward office, or other office in any hundred of any shire, city, town, parish, division, or wapentake.

Sect. XII. That every justice of the peace may, at any time, require any person that goes to any meeting for exercise of religion, to make and subscribe the declaration aforesaid, and also to take the said oaths or declaration of fidelity hereinafter mentioned, in case such person scruples the taking of an oath; and upon refusal, such justice of the peace is required to commit such person to prison, and to certify the name of such person to the next general or quarter sessions of the peace, &c.

Sect. XIII. recites, That there are certain other Dissenters who scruple the taking of any oath; and then proceeds to enact, That every such person shall make and subscribe the aforesaid declaration, and also this declaration of fidelity following: viz. “I, A. B., do sincerely promise and solemnly declare, before God and the world, that I will be true and faithful to King William and Queen Mary; and I do solemnly profess and declare, that I do from my heart abhor, detest, and renounce, as impious and heretical, that damnable doctrine and position, That princes excommunicated or deprived by the Pope, or any authority of the see of Rome, may be deposed or murdered by their subjects, or any other whatsoever; and I do declare, That no foreign prince, person, prelate, state, or potentate, hath, or ought to have, any power, jurisdiction, superiority, pre-eminence, or authority, ecclesiastical or spiritual, within this realm;” and shall subscribe a profession of their Christian belief in these words: “I, A. B., profess faith in God the Father, and in Jesus Christ, his eternal Son, the true God, and in the Holy Spirit, one God, blessed for evermore; and do acknowledge the Holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testament to be given by divine inspiration:”—which declarations and subscription shall be entered on record at the General Quarter Sessions, &c.; and every such person shall be exempted from all the pains and penalties of all and every the aforementioned statutes, &c.

Sect. XVI. Provided, That all the laws made and provided for the frequenting of divine service on the Lord's Day, commonly called Sunday, shall be still in force, and executed against all persons that offend against the said laws, except such persons come to some congregation or assembly of religious worship, allowed or permitted by this act.

Sect. XVII. Provided, That neither this act, nor any clause, article, or thing herein contained, shall extend, or be construed to extend, to give any ease, benefit, or advantage to any Papist or Popish Recusant whatsoever, or any person that shall deny in his preaching or writing the doctrine of the blessed Trinity, as it is declared in the aforesaid Articles of Religion.

Sect. XVIII. Provided, That if any person or persons do and shall willingly, maliciously, or contemptuously, come into any cathedral or parish-church, chapel, or other congregation permitted by this act, and disquiet and disturb the same, or misuse any preacher or teacher, such person or persons, upon proof thereof before any justice of the peace, by two or more sufficient witnesses, shall find two sureties, to be bound by recognizance in the penal sum of 50*l.*, and, in default of such sureties, shall be committed to prison, there to remain till the next General or Quarter Session; and, upon conviction of the said offence at the said General or Quarter Sessions, shall suffer the pain and penalty of 20*l.*, to the use of the King's and Queen's Majesties, their heirs and successors.

Sect. XIX. That no congregation or assembly for religious worship shall be permitted or allowed by this act until the place of such meeting shall be certified to the bishop of the diocese, or to the archdeacon of that archdeaconry, or to the justices of the peace at the General or Quarter Sessions of the peace for the county, city, or place in which such meeting shall be held, and registered in the said bishop's or archdeacon's court respectively, or recorded at the said General or Quarter Sessions; the register or clerk of the peace whereof respectively is hereby required to register the same, and to give certificate thereof to such person as shall demand the same; for which there shall be no greater fee or reward taken than the sum of sixpence.

Lord Sidmouth attempted, in 1810, to introduce a bill in the House of Lords, proposing some amendment or explanation of this famous act, in order to prevent abuses; but, in reality, the prevention of the spread of Dissent by means of itinerant preachers; and to clog the exertions of those who wish to instruct their neighbours. Vast numbers of petitions from all parts of the country were presented against the bill; so that when it was brought forward on May 21, 1811, (after a considerable discussion,) the question for a second reading was put and negatived without a division. The bill was, therefore, thrown out. It is to be hoped that this will be the last effort ever made to infringe the Act of Toleration.

ACT OF FAITH, (Auto da Fe), in the Romish church, is a solemn day held by the Inquisition for the punishment of heretics, and the absolution of the innocent accused. They usually contrive the auto to fall on some great festival, that the execution may pass with the more awe; and it is always on a Sunday. The Auto da Fe may be called the last act of the inquisitorial tragedy: it is a kind of gaol delivery, appointed as often as a competent number of prisoners in the Inquisition are convicted of heresy, either by their own voluntary or extorted confession, or on the evidence of certain witnesses. The process is this:—In the morning they are brought into a great hall, where they have certain habits put on, which they are to wear in the procession, and by which they know their doom. The procession is led up by Dominican friars, after which come the penitents, being all in black coats without sleeves, and bare-footed, with a wax candle in their hands. These are followed by the penitents who have narrowly escaped being burnt, who over their black coats have flames painted, with their points turned downwards. Next come the negative and relapsed, who are to be burnt, having flames on their habits pointing upwards. After these come such as profess doctrines contrary to the faith of Rome, who besides flames pointing upwards, have their picture painted on their breasts, with dogs, serpents, and devils, all open-mouthed, about it. Each prisoner is attended with a familiar of the Inquisition: and those to be burnt have also a Jesuit on each hand, who are continually preaching to them to abjure. After the prisoners, comes a troop of familiars on horseback; and after them the Inquisitors, and other officers of the court, on mules: last of all, the Inquisitor-general on a white horse, led by two men with black hats and green hatbands. A scaffold is erected big enough for two or three thousand people; at one end of which are the prisoners, at the other the inquisitors. After a sermon made up of encomiums of the Inquisition, and invectives against heretics, a priest ascends a desk near the scaffold, and, having taken the abjuration of the penitents, recites the final sentence of those who are to be put to death, and delivers them to the secular arm, earnestly beseeching at the same time the secular power not to touch their blood, or put their lives in danger!!! The prisoners, being thus in the hands of the civil magistrate, are presently loaded with chains, and carried first to the secular gaol, and from thence, in an hour or two, brought before the civil judge; who, after asking in what religion they intend to die, pronounces sentence on such as declare they die in the communion of the church of Rome, that they shall be first strangled, and then burnt to ashes: or such as die in any other faith, that they be burnt alive. Both are immediately carried to the Ribera, the place of execution, where there are as many stakes set up as there are prisoners to be burnt, with a quantity of dry furze about them. The stakes of the professed, that is, such as persist in the heresy, are about four yards high, having a small board towards the top for the prisoner to be seated on. The negative and relapsed being first strangled and burnt, the professed mount their stakes by a ladder, and the Jesuits, after several repeated exhortations to be reconciled to the church, part with them, telling them that they leave them to the devil, who is standing at their elbow, to receive their souls, and carry them with him to the flames of hell. On this a great shout is raised; and the cry is, "Let the dogs' beards be made!" which is done by thrusting flaming furzes fastened to long poles against their faces, till their faces are burnt to a coal, which is accompanied with the loudest acclamations of joy. At last, fire is set to the furze at the bottom of the stake, over which the professed are chained so high, that the top of the flame seldom reaches higher than the seat they sit on; so that they rather seem roasted than burnt. There cannot be a more lamentable spectacle: the sufferers continually cry out, while they are able, "Pity, for the love of God!" Yet it is beheld by all sexes and ages with transports of joy and satisfaction.—O merciful God! is this the benign, humane religion thou hast given to men? Surely not. If such were the genius of Christianity, then it would be no honour to be a Christian. Let us, however, rejoice that the time is coming when the demon of persecution shall be banished out of this our world, and the true spirit of benevolence and candour pervade the universe; when none shall hurt or destroy, but the earth be filled with the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea! See INQUISITION.

ACT OF UNIFORMITY. 1. An act passed in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, establishing the Protestant religion as the religion of England, binding all her subjects to be Protestants, and compelling them to use the liturgy, &c., in such order and form as were prescribed in the Book of Common Prayer, to the exclusion of every other order and form, under the severest penalties. It has been well remarked, that in thus casting off the Popish antichrist of Rome, a legal existence was given to the Protestant antichrist of England. Nothing could be more intolerant, or more hostile to the spirit of Christianity, or the natural rights of mankind.

2. A statute enacted in the reign of Charles II., requiring all ministers of religion in England to declare their unfeigned assent and consent to all and every thing contained in the Book of Common Prayer. This act received the royal assent May 19, 1662, and on Bartholomew day, August 24 following, it took effect in the ejection from their livings of more than two thousand ministers, who refused to violate their consciences in subscribing to many things which they regarded to be contrary to the word of God. The principal agent in procuring this unrighteous act was Archbishop Sheldon, who carried this, and several other harsh and unjust measures, through the influence of Lord Clarendon.

ACTION AND ACTION SERMON, an old Scottish designation of the sermon preached immediately before the administration of the Lord's Supper.

ACTS OF THE APOSTLES, (Πράξεις τῶν Ἀποστόλων), one of the books of the New Testament, written in Greek by Luke, the author of the gospel which bears his name. It is addressed to Theophilus, of whom nothing is known, and is evidently intended as a continuation of the gospel which the author himself calls his "First Book," Acts i. 1. It has been universally received, and is generally allowed to have been written between A.D. 63 and 64, but in what place is doubtful: Jerome says at Rome; Grotius and Lardner think in Greece; Michaelis, in Alexandria. It embraces a period of about thirty years, beginning immediately after the Resurrection, and extending to the second year of Paul's imprisonment at Rome. Very little information is given of any of the Apostles, excepting Paul and Peter: and even the accounts of them are partial and incomplete; it not being the design of Luke to give us the whole of their history. Thus that of Peter terminates with the death of Herod, although that Apostle is considered to have lived and preached twenty-four years longer. The position of the book is generally at the head of the Apostolicon, or before the Epistles; but in some MSS. it is found after the thirteen Paulinic Epistles. The style of this book, which was originally composed in Greek, is purer than that of the other books.

ACTS OF PAUL AND THECLA, one of the spurious documents of antiquity, falsely ascribed to the Apostle. It was printed by Dr. Grabe in his Spicilegium, from a Greek MS. in the Bodleian; a translation of it is given by Jones in his work on the Canon: and also in Hone's Apoc. New Testament. It is full of legendary stories.

ACTS OF PAUL AND SENECA, another of the apocryphal writings of the New Testament, containing epistles alleged to have passed between the Apostle and Seneca the philosopher. They were published by Sixtus Senensis, and an English translation will be found in Hone.

ACTS OF PETER, of similar apocryphal character, and abounding in the most trifling and absurd stories.

ACTS OF PILATE, a relation alleged to have been sent by Pilate to the emperor Tiberius, concerning Jesus Christ, his death, resurrection, ascension, and the crimes of which he was convicted before him. It was a custom among the Romans, that the proconsuls and governors of provinces should draw up acts or memoirs of what happened in the course of their government, and send them to the emperor and senate. The acts of Pilate were sent by him to Tiberius, who reported them to the senate; but they were rejected, it is said, by that assembly, because not immediately addressed to them.—Tertullian, Apol. cap. 5, 20, 21.

The genuine acts, if they existed, are now lost, and those that remain are manifestly spurious.—See Fabric. Cod. Apoc. New Testament, p. 298, Ap. 972.

Pearson, Mosheim, and Lardner, are inclined to think that considerable credit is due to the account given by Justin Martyr and Tertullian of these acts. Dupin and some others consider the whole matter very doubtful. Lardner discusses the subject with his usual impartiality.—Works, 4to., vol. iii. p. 599—606.

ACTS OF THE SAINTS, (Acta Sanctorum), a name given to all collections of accounts of ancient martyrs and saints, both of the Greek and Roman churches. It is used more particularly as the title of a voluminous work comprising all those accounts, which were commenced at the instigation of the Jesuits, 1643, by John Bolland, a Jesuit of Antwerp, and continued after his death by others of the same order, known by the name of Bollandists (which see) to the year 1794, but not yet finished, though forming not fewer than fifty-three volumes in folio. It is held in high esteem by the members of the Roman communion; but contains a sad mixture of truth and falsehood, superstition and fiction.

ADAMIC CONSTITUTION, the dispensation originally established with Adam, as the public head and representative of his posterity, in virtue of which, had he continued obedient, they would have been confirmed in holiness and happiness, but because he sinned, are involved with him in all the consequences of his rebellion. This constitution is specifically laid as the basis of the Apostle's reasoning, (Rom. v. 12—21. 1 Cor. xv. 22,) in which passages the connexion and analogy between the representative characters sustained by Adam and Christ are clearly set forth; in the former for the purpose of illustrating the plan of redemption, and in the latter for the purpose of confirming the doctrine of the future resurrection of believers. It has been common to designate the establishment given to Adam a covenant; and certainly, considering the latitude in which this term is frequently used in Scripture, it may not seem, at first sight, to be improper; but see under the word COVENANT.

ADAMITES, a sect that sprang up in the second century. Epiphanius tells us that they were called Adamites from their pretending to be re-established in the state of innocence, such as Adam was at the moment of his creation, whence they ought to imitate him in going naked. They detested marriage; maintaining that the conjugal union would never have taken place upon earth had sin been unknown. This obscure and ridiculous sect did not last long. It was, however, revived with additional absurdities in the twelfth century. About the beginning of the fifteenth century the name was revived, and applied to a sect that spread in Germany and Bohemia, and found also some partisans in Poland, Holland, and England, which arose about the same time with the Hussites, whom they resembled in their hatred of the Roman hierarchy; but the accounts that have been handed down to us respecting the appearing of both sexes naked in their assemblies and various, other outrageous customs, are not to be relied on with any degree of certainty, as they come originally from their enemies, who appear to have given them this ancient heretical appellation in order to hold them up to execration.

ADESSENARIANS, a branch of the Sacramentarians; so called from the Latin Adesse, to be present, because they believed the presence of Christ's body in the eucharist, though in a manner different from the Romanists.

ADIAPHORISTS, a term given in the sixteenth century to Melancthon and the divines of Wittenberg, who regarded as a matter of indifference the introduction into the Protestant worship of altars, mass-vestments, vespers, &c. This concession occasioned a violent dispute, called the Adiaphoristic Controversy, which was commenced by Flacius, a theologian of Jena, in connexion with the clergy of Lower Saxony.

ADMISSION, a term in use amongst Presbyterians, to denote the service and act by which a minister is publicly introduced into a new charge.

ADMISSION SERMON, the discourse which is preached introductory to the admission of a minister to a new charge.

ADMONITION denotes a hint or advice given to another, whereby we reprove him for his fault, or remind him of his duty. Admonition was a part of the discipline much used in the ancient church; it was the first act or step towards the punishment or expulsion of delinquents. In case of private offences it was performed according to the evangelical rule, privately; in case of public offence, openly before the church. If either of these sufficed for the recovery of the fallen person, all further proceedings, in a way of censure, ceased; if they did not, recourse was had to excommunication.—Tit. iii. 10. 1 Thess. v. 14. Eph. vi. 4.

ADONAI, one of the Hebrew names exclusively given to God, and signifying "The Supreme Ruler or Judge." It is literally "My Lords," in the plural number, as "Adoni" is "My Lord" in the singular. The Jews, who either out of respect or superstition do not pronounce the name of Jehovah, read Adonai instead of it in all the places in which it occurs in the Hebrew Bible. This veneration for the Tetragrammaton is at least as ancient as the time of Josephus, who declares that it was not lawful for him to speak of it.

ADONISTS, such divines and critics as maintain that the Hebrew points ordinarily annexed to the consonants of the word Jehovah, are not the natural points belonging to that word, nor express the true pronunciation of it; but are the vowel points belonging to the words Adonai and Elohim, applied to the consonants of the ineffable name Jehovah, to warn the readers, that instead of the word Jehovah, which the Jews were forbid to pronounce, and the true pronunciation of which had been long unknown to them, they are always to read Adonai. They are opposed to Jehocists, of whom the principal are Drusius, Capellus, Buxtorf, Alting, and Reland.

ADOPTIANISTS, the followers of Felix of Urgil and Elipandus of Toledo, who, towards the end of the eighth century, advanced the notion that Jesus Christ, in his human nature, is the Son of God, not by nature, but by adoption. It was condemned by Charlemagne at the Council of Ratisbon, and again at the Synod of Francfort, 794, and at Rome and Aix-la-Chapelle, 799, as a new modification of the Nestorian heresy. Felix was dismissed from his office: and the whole controversy ceased after the death of Elipandus.

ADOPTION, an act whereby any person receives another into his family, owns him for his son, and appoints him his heir. 2. Spiritual adoption is an act of God's free grace, whereby we are received into the number, and have a right to all the privileges of the sons of God. 3. Glorious, is that in which the saints being raised from the dead, are at the Last Day solemnly owned to be the children of God, and enter into the full possession of that inheritance provided for them. Rom. viii. 19, 23. Adoption is a word taken from the civil law, and was much in use among the Romans in the Apostles' time, when it was a custom for persons who had no children of their own, and were possessed of an estate, to prevent its being divided, or descending to strangers, to make choice of such who were agreeable to them, and beloved by them, whom they took into this political relation of children; obliging them to take their name upon them, and to pay respect to them as though they were their natural parents, and engaging to deal with them as though they had been so; and accordingly to give them a right to their estates as an inheritance. This new relation, founded in a mutual consent, is a bond of affection; and the privilege arising from thence is, that he who is in this sense a father takes care of and provides for the person whom he adopts, as though he were his son by nature; and therefore civilians call it an act of legitimation, imitating nature, or supplying the place of it.

It is easy, then, to conceive the propriety of the term as used by the Apostles in reference to this act, though it must be confessed there is some difference between civil and spiritual adoption. Civil adoption was allowed of and provided for the relief and comfort of those who had no children; but in spiritual adoption this reason does not appear. The Almighty was under no obligation to do this; for he had innumerable spirits whom he had created, besides his own Son, who had all the perfections of the divine nature, who was the object of his delight, and who is styled the heir of all things. Heb. i. 3. When men adopt, it is on account of some excellency in the persons who are adopted; thus Pharaoh's daughter adopted Moses because he was exceeding fair, Acts vii. 20, 21; and Mordecai adopted Esther because she was his uncle's daughter, and exceeding fair, Est. ii. 7; but man has nothing in him that merits this divine act. Ezek. xvi. 5. In civil adoption, though the name of a son be given, the nature of a son may not: this relation may not necessarily be attended with any change of disposition or temper. But in spiritual adoption we are made partakers of the divine nature, and a temper or disposition given us becoming the relationship we bear. Jer. iii. 19.

Much has been said as to the time of adoption. Some place it before regeneration, because it is supposed that we must be in the family before we can be partakers of the blessings of it. But it is difficult to conceive of one before the other; for although adoption may seem to precede regeneration in order of nature, yet not of time; they may be distinguished, but cannot be separated. "As many as received him, to them gave he power to become the sons of God, even to them that believe on his name." John i. 12. There is no adoption, says the great Charnock, without regeneration. "Adoption," says the same author, "is not a mere relation; the privilege and the image of the sons of God go together. A state of adoption is never without a separation from defilement." 2 Cor. vi. 17, 18. The new name in adoption is never given till the new creature be formed. "As many as are led by the Spirit of God, they are the sons of God." Rom. viii. 14. Yet these are to be distinguished. Regeneration, as a moral act, gives us a likeness to God in our nature; adoption, as a legal act, gives us a right to an inheritance. Regeneration makes us formally his sons, by conveying a principle, 1 Pet. i. 23; adoption makes us relatively his sons, by conveying a power. John i. 12. "By the one, we are instated in the divine affection; by the other, we are partakers of the divine nature."

The privileges of adoption are every way great and extensive. 1. It implies great honour.—They have God's name put upon them, and are described as "his people, called by his name." 2 Cor. vi. 18. Eph. iii. 15. They are no longer slaves to sin and the world; but emancipated from its dreadful bondage, are raised to dignity and honour. Gal. iv. 7. 1 John iii. 1, 2. 2. Inexhaustible provision and riches.—They inherit all things. Rev. xxi. 7. All the blessings of a temporal kind that are for their good shall be given them. Psal. lxxiv. 11. All the blessings of grace are treasured up in Jesus Christ for them. Eph. i. 3. All the blessings of glory shall be enjoyed by them. Col. i. 27. "All things are yours," says the Apostle, "whether Paul, or Apollos, or Cephas, or the world, or life, or death, or things present, or things to come, all are yours." 1 Cor. iii. 22. 3. Divine protection.—"In the fear of the Lord is strong confidence, and his children shall have a place of refuge." Prov. xiv. 26. As the master of a family is engaged to defend and secure all under his roof, and committed to his care, so Jesus Christ is engaged to protect and defend his people. "They shall dwell in a peaceable habitation, and in sure dwellings and quiet resting places." Isa. xxxii. 18. Heb. i. 14. 4. Unspeakable felicity.—They enjoy the most intimate communion with the Father, and with his Son Jesus Christ. They have access to his throne at all times, and under all circumstances. They see divine wisdom regulating every affair, and rendering every thing subservient to their good. Heb. xii. 6—11. The laws, the liberties, the privileges, the relations, the provisions, and the security of this family, are all sources of happiness; but especially the presence, the approbation, and the goodness of God, as the governor thereof, afford joy unspeakable and full of glory. 1 Pet. i. 8. Prov. iii. 17. Heb. iv. 16. 5. Eternal glory.—In some cases civil adoption might be made null and void, as among the Romans, when against the right of the pontifex, and without the degree of the college; but spiritual adoption, as it is divine as to its origin, so it is perpetual as to its duration. "The Son abideth in the house for ever." John viii. 35. "The inheritance of the saints is incorruptible, undefiled, and never fadeth away." 1 Pet. i. 4. "Now are we the sons of God, and it doth not yet appear what we shall be; but we know that when he shall appear we shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is." 1 John iii. 2. In the present state, we are as children at school; but in heaven we shall be as children at home, where we shall always behold the face of our heavenly Father, for ever celebrating his praises, admiring his perfections, and enjoying his presence. "So shall we be ever with the Lord." 1 Thess. iv. 17.

The evidences of adoption are, 1. Renuncia- tion of all former dependencies.—When a child is adopted, he relinquishes the object of his past confidence, and submits himself to the will and pleasure of the adopter; so they who are brought into the family of God, will evidence it by giving up every object, so far as it interferes with the will and glory of their heavenly Father. "Ephraim shall say, What have I to do any more with idols?" Hos. xiv. 8. "Other lords have had dominion over us; but by thee only will we make mention of thy name." Isa. xxvi. 13. Matt. xiii. 45, 46. Phil. iii. 8. 2. Affection.—This may not always apply to civil adoption, but it always does to spiritual. The children of God feel a regard for him above every other object. His own excellency, his unspeakable goodness to them, his promises of future blessings, are all grounds of the strongest love. "Whom have I in heaven but thee, and there is none upon earth that I desire beside thee." Psal. lxxiii. 25. "Thou art my portion, saith my soul, therefore will I hope in thee." Lam. iii. 24. Luke vii. 47. Psal. xviii. 1. 3. Access to God with a holy boldness.—They who are children by adoption are supposed to have the same liberty of access as those who are children by nature; so those who are partakers of the blessings of spiritual adoption, will prove it by a reverential yet familiar address to the Father of spirits: they will confess their unworthiness, acknowledge their dependence, and implore the mercy and favour of God. "Because ye are sons, God hath sent forth the Spirit of his Son into your hearts, crying, Abba, Father." Gal. iv. 6. "Through Jesus Christ we have access by one Spirit unto the Father." Eph. ii. 18. "Having such a privilege, they come boldly to the throne of grace, that they may obtain mercy and find grace to help in time of need." Heb. iv. 16. 4. Obedience.—Those who are adopted into a family must obey the laws of that family; so believers prove themselves adopted by their obedience to the word and ordinances of God. "Ye are my friends, if ye do whatsoever I command you." John xv. 14. "Whoso keepeth his word, in him verily is the love of God perfected: hereby know we that we are in him. He that saith he abideth in him, ought himself also to walk even as he walked." 1 John ii. 4, 5. 5. Patient, yet joyful expectation, of the inheritance. In civil adoption, indeed, an inheritance is not always certain; but in spiritual adoption it is. "To them who, by patient continuance in well-doing, seek for glory, and honour, and immortality, eternal life." Rom. ii. 7. "We look not at the things which are seen, but at the things which are not seen; for the things which are seen are temporal, but the things which are not seen are eternal." 2 Cor. iv. 18. Rom. vi. 23. Heb. xi. 26, 27. From the consideration of the whole of this doctrine, we may learn that adoption is an act of free grace through Jesus Christ. Eph. i. 5. Applied to believers by the Holy Spirit. Gal. iv. 6. Rom. viii. 15, 16. A blessing of the greatest importance, 1 John iii. 1, and lays us under an inviolable obligation of submission, Heb. xii. 9; imitation, Eph. v. 1; and dependence, Matt. vi. 32. See Ridgley's and Gill's Body of Div. art. Adoption; Charnock's Works, vol. ii. p. 32-72; Flavel's Works, vol. ii. p. 601; Brown's System of Nat. and Rev. Religion, p. 442; Witsii Econ. Fœd. p. 165.

ADORATION, the act of rendering divine honours, including in it reverence, esteem, and love: this is called supreme, or absolute. The word is compounded of ad, "to," and os, oris, "mouth;" and literally signifies to apply the hand to the mouth, "to kiss the hand;" this being, in the eastern countries, one of the great marks of respect and submission. See Job xxxi. 26, 27. The attitude of adoration, however, we find has not been confined to this mode; standing, kneeling, uncovering the head, prostration, bowing, lifting up the eyes to heaven, or sometimes fixing them upon the earth, with the body bending forward; sitting with the under parts of the thighs resting on the heels, have all been used as expressive of veneration and esteem. Whatever be the form, however, it must be remembered that adoration, as an act of worship, is due to God alone. Matt. iv. 10. Acts x. 25, 26. Rev. xix. 10. There is, 2. what may be called human, or paying homage or respect to persons of great rank and dignity. This has been performed by bowing, bending the knee, falling on the face. The practice of adoration may be said to be still subsisting in England, in the ceremony of kissing the king's or queen's hand, it being performed kneeling on one knee. There is also, 3. adoration relative, which consists in worship paid to an object as belonging to or representative of another. In this sense the Romanists profess to adore the cross, not simply or immediately, but in respect of Jesus Christ, whom they suppose to be on it. This is, however, considered by Protestants as coming little short of idolatry. See IDOLATRY.

ADULTERY, an unlawful commerce between one married person and another, or between a married and unmarried person. 2. It is also used in Scripture for idolatry, or departing from the true God. Jer. iii. 9. 3. It is also used in ecclesiastical writers for a person's invading or intruding into a bishoprick during the former bishop's life. 4. The word is also used in ancient canons for the punishment or fine imposed for that offence, or the privilege of prosecuting for it. Although adultery is prohibited by the law of God, yet some have endeavoured to explain away the moral turpitude of it; but it is evident, observes Paley, that, on the part of the ~~man~~ man who solicits the chastity of a married woman, it certainly includes the crime of seduction. and is attended with mischief still more extensive and complicated; it creates a new sufferer—the injured husband,—upon whose affection is inflicted a wound the most painful and incurable that human nature knows. The infidelity of the woman is aggravated by cruelty to her children, who are generally involved in their parents' shame, and always made unhappy by their quarrel. The marriage vow is witnessed before God, and accompanied with circumstances of solemnity and religion, which approach to the nature of an oath. The married offender, therefore, incurs a crime little short of perjury; and the seduction of a married woman is little less than subornation of perjury. But the strongest apology for adultery is, the prior transgression of the other party; and so far, indeed, as the bad effects of adultery are anticipated by the conduct of the husband or wife who offends first, the guilt of the second offender is extenuated. But this can never amount to a justification, unless it could be shown that the obligation of the marriage vow depends upon the condition of reciprocal fidelity; a construction which appears founded neither in expediency nor in terms of the vow, nor in the design of the legislature which prescribed the marriage rite. To consider the offence upon the footing of provocation, therefore, can by no means vindicate retaliation. "Thou shalt not commit adultery," it must ever be remembered, was an absolute interdict delivered by God himself. Mankind, in all ages, and in all civilized countries, have regarded the violation of the marriage-bed with abhorrence. It has been punished in various ways, and with different degrees of severity, according to the general manners and morals of the country; sometimes with extreme rigour, and in other instances with capricious and ridiculous penalties. By the divine law, given to the Jews, it was punished with death in both parties, where either the woman was married, or both. Strabo says, the same was the case in Arabia Felix. Among the ancient Egyptians, it was not common; but when it did occur, a thousand lashes were inflicted on the man, and the woman was deprived of her nose. In Greece, the laws against it were severe. The rich, however, were sometimes allowed to redeem themselves by paying a fine, in which case the woman's father returned the dowry which he had received from the husband. Some suppose it was refunded by the adulterer. A frequent punishment there was putting out the eyes. According to Homer, adulterers were stoned to death. By the laws of Draco and Solon, when caught in the act, they were at the mercy of the injured party. Adulteresses were prohibited, in Greece, from appearing in fine garments, and entering the temples. Some suppose that this offence was made capital by Romulus, and again by the twelve tables; others, that it was first made capital by Augustus; and others, not till the time of Constantine. The fact is, that the punishment was left to the discretion of the husband and parents of the adulteress. The most usual mode of taking revenge was by mutilating, castrating, or cutting off the nose or ears. The punishment assigned by the lex Julia de adulteris, instituted by Augustus, was banishment, or a heavy fine. It was decreed by Antoninus, that to sustain a charge of adultery against a wife, the husband who brought it must be innocent himself. Under Macrinus, adulterers were burnt at the stake. Under Constantius and Constans, they were burned, or sewed up in sacks and thrown into the sea. But the punishment was mitigated, under Leo and Marcian, to perpetual banishment or cutting off the nose; and, under Justinian, the wife was only to be scourged, lose her dower, and be shut up in a monastery; or, at the expiration of two years, the husband might take her back again: if he refused, she was shaven, and made a nun for life. Theodosius instituted the shocking practice of public constupration, which, however, he soon abolished. In Crete, adulterers were covered with wool, as an emblem of their effeminacy, and carried in that dress to the magistrate's house, where a fine was imposed on them, and they were deprived of all their privileges and their share in public business. The punishment in use among the Mingrelians is the forfeiture of a hog, which is usually eaten very amicably by the woman, the gallant, and the cuckold. In some parts of India, it is said that any woman may prostitute herself for an elephant, and it is reputed no small glory to have been rated so high. Adultery is stated to be extremely frequent in Ceylon, although punishable with death. Among the Japanese, and some other nations, it is punishable only in the woman. Among the Abyssinians, the crime of the husband is punished on the innocent wife. On the contrary, in the Marian Islands, the woman is not punishable, but the man is; and the wife and her relations waste his lands, burn him out of his house, &c. Among the Chinese, adultery is not capital: parents will even make a contract with the future husbands of their daughters, to allow them the indulgence. In Portugal, an adulteress is condemned to the flames; but the sentence is seldom executed. By the ancient laws of France, this crime was punishable with death. Before the revolution, the adulteress was usually condemned to a convent, where the husband could visit her during two years, and take her back if he saw fit. If he did not choose to receive her again by the expiration of this time, her hair was shaven, she took the habit of the convent, and remained there for life. Where the parties were poor, she might be shut up in an hospital instead of a convent. The Code Napoleon does not allow the husband to proceed against his wife in case he has been condemned for the same crime. The wife can bring an action against the husband only in case he has introduced his paramour into the house where she resides. An adulteress can be imprisoned from three months to two years; but the husband may prevent the execution of the sentence by taking her back. Her partner in guilt is liable to the same punishment. Castration was the punishment in Spain. In Poland, previous to the establishment of Christianity, the criminal was carried to the market-place, and there fastened by the testicles with a nail; a razor was laid within his reach, and he had the option to execute justice on himself, or remain where he was and die. The Saxons consigned the adulteress to the flames, and over her ashes erected a gibbet, on which her paramour was hanged. King Edmund the Saxon ordered adultery to be punished in the same manner as homicide; and Canute the Dane ordered that the man should be banished, and the woman have her ears and nose cut off. In the time of Henry I., it was punished with the loss of the eyes and genitals. Adultery is in England considered as a spiritual offence, cognizable by the spiritual courts, where it is punished by fine and penance. The common law allows the party aggrieved only an action and damages. In the United States, the punishment of adultery has varied materially at different times. In the State of Massachusetts, an adulterer or adulteress may be set on the gallows for one hour, be publicly whipped, and imprisoned or fined. All or any of these punishments may be inflicted, according to the circumstances of the offence. Adultery is, moreover, very seldom punished criminally in the United States. The Mohammedan code pronounces it a capital offence. It is one of the three crimes which the prophet directs to be expiated by the blood of a Mussulman.—Encyc. Amer.

ADVENT, a term commonly used in reference to the Incarnation, and also to the appearance of Christ to judge the world. The one is called the First, and the other the Second Advent. It is, however, employed in Scripture to denote any coming of the Lord, especially that which has for its object, the infliction of a particular judgment. In ecclesiastical use, it signifies a festival which includes the four Sundays, or weeks, before Christmas, which season the Roman Catholics spend in fasting and humiliation. It is first mentioned in this sense by Maximus Laurinensis, in one of his homilies, written in the middle of the fifth century. No nuptials were allowed to be celebrated in Advent after the council held at Lerida, in the sixth century.

ADVERSARY, one who sets himself in opposition to another; one of the names of Satan. See SATAN.

ADVERSITY, a state which is opposite to our wishes, and the cause of sorrow. It stands opposed to prosperity. See AFFLICTION.

ADVOCATE, one who pleads or defends the cause of another, or interposes on his behalf with a judge. It is used,

1. Of our Saviour, and never of any created being in its biblical sense. 1 John ii. 1.

2. Of a species of officers appointed to defend the rights and revenues of a church or religious house. They were first appointed under the consulship of Silico, and were divided according to their several offices into defensores, causidici, actores, pastores laici, &c. These offices were first entrusted to canons, but afterwards were held even by monarchs. The advocates set over single churches administered justice in secular affairs in the name of the bishops and abbots, and had jurisdiction over their whole dioceses. In case of necessity they defended the property of the clergy by force of arms. In the courts of justice they pleaded the cause of the churches with which they were connected. They superintended the collection of the tithes and other revenues of the church, and enjoyed, on the part of the convents, many benefices and considerable revenues. After a time, these advocates and their assistants becoming a burthen to the clergy, and the people under their charge, who began to suffer severely from their avarice, the churches began to get rid of them. Urban III. laboured to deliver the church from these oppressors, but found, in 1186, the German prelates, in connexion with the Emperor Frederic I., opposed to it. Under the Emperor Frederic II., however, most of the German churches succeeded in abolishing these offices by the grant of large sums of money and of various immunities.

3. Of the advocée, or patron, who has the right of presentation to a living in his own name. Females having the same right were called advocatissæ.

ADVOCATE, DEVIL'S, the person appointed at Rome to raise doubts against the genuineness of the miracles of a candidate for canonization, to expose any want of formality in the investigation of the miracles, and to assail the general merits of the candidate. After every thing is said pro and con, and three papal advocates of the consistory have found the whole course of proceeding legal and formal, the canonization follows. It is said that in the beginning of the seventeenth century the canonization of Cardinal Borromeo was almost prevented by the accusations of the devil's advocate.

ADVOWEE, a term employed to denote the ecclesiastical orders of advocates, and the patrons of churches, &c.

ADVOWSON, in English law, a right of presentation to a vacant benefice, or, in other words, a right of nominating a person to officiate in a vacant church. The name is derived from advocatio, because the right was first obtained by such as were founders, benefactors, or strenuous defenders (advocates) of the church. Those who have this right are styled patrons. Advowsons are of three kinds,—presentative, collative, and donative :—presentative when the patron presents his clerk to the bishop of the diocese to be instituted; collative when the bishop is the patron, and institutes or collates his clerk by a single act; and donative when a church is founded by the king, and assigned to the patron without being subject to the ordinary, so that the patron confers the benefice on his clerk without presentation, institution, or induction.

ÆONS, (Αἰῶνες,) ages. The Valentinians, followers of the Gnostics, (who had corrupted the simplicity of the Christian doctrine, by mixing with it the fancies and conceits of the Jewish Cabbalists, of the schools of Pythagoras and Plato, and of the Chaldean Philosophy, more ancient than either,) invented a kind of theogony or genealogy of gods, (not unlike that of Hesiod,) whom they called by several glorious names, and all by the general appellation of ÆONS; among which they reckoned Ζωή, Life, Λόγος, Word, Μονογένης, Only-begotten, Πληρωμα, Fulness; and many other divine powers and emanations, amounting in number to thirty, which they fancied to be successively derived from one another, and all from one self-originated deity, named Bythus, i. e. profound, or unfathomable; whom they called likewise the most high and ineffable Father. See VALENTINIANS.

ÆRA, a fixed point of time, from which chronologers reckon. Æras are either Christian, Jewish, Heathen, or Mohammedan. Christian æras are deduced either from the birth of Christ, from the emperor Dioclesian, or the beginning of the world. Chronologers differ as to the true point of time in which Christ was born: some place it two years, others four, and some five, before the vulgar æra, which by general consent is placed in the year of the world 4000,—of the Julian period, 4714. This æra is that in general use among the Christians.

The ancient Jews made use of several æras in their computations: sometimes they reckoned from the deluge, sometimes from the division of tongues, sometimes from their departure out of Egypt, at other times from the building of the temple, and sometimes from their restoration after the Babylonish captivity; but their vulgar æra was from the creation of the world, which falls in with the year of the Julian Period 953; and consequently they supposed the world created 249 years sooner than according to our computations. But when the Jews became subject to the Syro-Macedonian kings, they were obliged to make use of the Æra of the Seleucidæ in all their contracts, which from thence was called the Æra of Contracts. This æra begins with the year of the world 3692; of the Julian period, 4403; before Christ, 308.

The Pagan Æras, as having little or no relation to matters of religion, we shall omit.

The Mohammedan Æra is computed from the Hegira, or flight of the false prophet Mohammed from Mecca to Medina, and is from thence called The Hegira. It began in the year of the world 4622,—of the Julian period, 5335,—and after Christ, 622.

ÆRIANS, a branch of Arians in the reign of Constantine, who held that there was no difference between bishops and priests; a doctrine maintained by many modern divines, particularly of the presbyterian and reformed churches, on account of which they have been accused of Ærianism by the Catholics. The sect received its denomination from Ærius, an Arian monk of Sebaste, in Armenia, who founded his doctrine on 1 Tim. iv. 14, and besides, declared prayers and offerings for the dead to be ineffectual and injurious; rejected the ordinance of fasting; and declared the practice of sacrificing a lamb at Easter to be contrary to the spirit of the Christian religion. Though guilty, in fact, only of opposing the abuses of the hierarchy, and the corruptions of superstition, the Ærians were condemned as heretics. See EPISCOPACY.

ÆTIANUS, those who maintained that the Son and Holy Ghost were in all things dissimilar to the Father. They received their name from Ætius, one of the most zealous defenders of Arianism, who was born in Syria, and flourished about the year 336. Besides the opinions which the Ætians held in common with the Arians, they maintained that faith without works was sufficient to salvation; and that no sin, however grievous, would be imputed to the faithful. Ætius, moreover, affirmed that what God had concealed from the Apostles, he had revealed to him.

AFFECTION, in a philosophical sense, refers to the manner in which we are affected by any thing for a continuance, whether painful or pleasant; but in the most common sense, it may be defined to be a settled bent of mind towards a particular being or thing. It holds a middle place between disposition on the one hand, and passion on the other. It is distinguishable from disposition, which being a branch of one's nature originally, must exist before there can be any opportunity to exert it upon any particular object; whereas affection can never be original, because, having a special relation to a particular object, it cannot exist till the object have once, at least, been presented. It is also distinguishable from passion, which, depending on the real or ideal presence of its object, vanishes with its object; whereas affection is a lasting connexion, and, like other connexions, subsists even when we do not think of the object. [See DISPOSITION and PASSION.]

The affections, as they respect religion, deserve in this place some attention. They may be defined to be the "vigorous and sensible exercises of the inclination and will of the soul towards religious objects." Whatever extremes Stoics or enthusiasts have run into, it is evident that the exercise of the affections is essential to the existence of true religion. It is true indeed, "that all affectionate devotion is not wise and rational; but it is no less true, that all wise and rational devotion must be affectionate." The affections are the springs of action; they belong to our nature, so that with the highest perceptions of truth and religion, we should be inactive without them. They have considerable influence on men in the common concerns of life; how much more, then, should they operate in those important objects that relate to the Divine Being, the immortality of the soul, and the happiness or misery of a future state! The religion of the most eminent saints has always consisted in the exercise of holy affections. Jesus Christ himself affords us an example of the most lively and vigorous affections; and we have every reason to believe that the employment of heaven consists in the exercise of them. In addition to all which, the scriptures of truth teach us, that religion is nothing if it occupy not the affections. Deut. vi. 4 and 5. Deut. xxx. 6. Rom. xii. 11. 1 Cor. xiii. 13. Ps. xxvii. 14.

A distinction, however, must be made between what may be merely natural, and what is truly spiritual. The affections may be excited in a natural way, under ordinances, by a natural impression, Ezek. xxxiii. 32; by a natural sympathy, or by the natural temperament of our constitution. It is no sign that our affections are spiritual because they are raised very high, produce great effects on the body, excite us to be very zealous in externals, to be always conversing about ourselves, &c. These things are often found in those who are only mere professors of religion. Matt. vii. 21, 22.

Now, in order to ascertain whether our affections are excited in a spiritual manner, we must inquire whether that which moves our affections be truly spiritual; whether our consciences be alarmed, and our hearts impressed; whether the judgment be enlightened, and we have a perception of the moral excellency of divine things; and, lastly, whether our affections have a holy tendency, and produce the happy effects of obedience to God, humility in ourselves, and justice to our fellow-creatures. As this is a subject worthy of close attention, the reader may consult Lord Kaimes's Elements of Criticism, vol. ii. p. 517; Edwards on the Affections; Pike and Hayward's Cases of Conscience; Watts's Use and Abuse of the Passions; McLaurin's Essays, sec. 5 and 6, where this subject is masterly handled; Jeremy Taylor's Works, vol. ii. pp. 114, 164.

AFFINITY, SPIRITUAL, in the church of Rome,—a relation contracted by the sacraments of Baptism and Confirmation, according to which a god-father may not marry his god-daughter without a dispensation.

AFFIRMATION, the solemn declaration of Quakers, and the members of some other sects, in confirmation of their testimony in courts of law, or of their statements on other occasions, on which the sanction of an oath is required of other persons. The English laws did not permit affirmations instead of oaths, in criminal cases, until 1828. In the United States, no difference has been made between civil and criminal cases in this respect, it being permitted both to Quakers and other scrupulous persons to give testimony on mere solemn affirmation. The same privilege is extended in Prussia to certain sects whose principles do not allow them to make oath.

AGAPÆ, OR LOVE FEASTS, (from ἀγάπη, "love,") feasts of charity among the ancient Christians, when liberal contributions were made by the rich to the poor. It has been supposed by many that the custom is sanctioned by 1 Cor. xi. 20, 21; but the following verse clearly shows that the apostle reprobates the idea of the Corinthian Christians eating any other social meal in public but that of the Lord's Supper. Chrysostom gives the following account of this feast, which he derives from the apostolic practice. He says,—"The first Christians had all things in common, as we read in the Acts of the Apostles; but when that equality of possessions ceased, as it did even in the apostles' time, the Agape or love feast was substituted in the room of it. Upon certain days, after partaking of the Lord's Supper, they met at a common feast, the rich bringing provisions, and the poor, who had nothing, being invited." It was always attended with receiving the holy sacrament; but there is some difference between the ancient and modern interpreters as to the circumstance of time,—viz., whether this feast was held before or after the communion. Chrysostom is of the latter opinion; the learned Dr. Cave of the former. These love feasts, during the first three centuries, were held in the church without scandal or offence; but in after-times the heathens began to tax them with impurity. This gave occasion to a reformation of these Agapæ. The kiss of charity, with which the ceremony used to end, was no longer given between different sexes; and it was expressly forbidden to have any beds or couches for the conveniency of those who should be disposed to eat more at their ease. Notwithstanding these precautions, the abuses committed in them became so notorious, that the holding them (in churches at least) was solemnly condemned at the council of Carthage in the year 397. Attempts have been made, of late years, to revive these feasts, but in a different manner from the primitive custom, and, perhaps, with little edification. They are, however, not very general, being confined almost entirely to the Sandemanians and some of the stricter Antipædobaptists.

AGAPETÆ, a name given to certain virgins and widows who, in the ancient church, associated themselves with, and attended on, ecclesiastics, out of a motive of piety and charity. See DEACONESSSES.

AGEDA, SYNOD OF, an assembly of Jewish doctors, held A.D. 1650, and so denominated from a plain on which they met, about thirty leagues from Buda, in Hungary. More than 300 Rabbins, and many other Jews, of different nations, attended. The object was to debate the question—Whether the Messiah had appeared. The negative of the question was carried, and it was agreed that his coming was delayed on account of their sins and impenitence. They were of opinion that he would be born of a virgin, come as a great conqueror, deliver the Jews from every foreign yoke, and alter nothing in the Mosaic religion. Some ecclesiastics from Rome attended this meeting, but the Jews would not hear them.

AGENDA, among divines and philosophers, signifies the duties which a man lies under an obligation to perform: thus we meet with the agenda of a Christian, or the duties he ought to perform, in opposition to the crendenda, or things he is to believe. It is also applied to the service or office of the church, and to church books compiled by public authority, prescribing the order to be observed, and amounts to the same as ritual, formulary, directory, missal, &c.

AGENT, that which acts: opposed to patient, or that which is acted upon.

AGENT, MORAL. See MORAL AGENT.

AGNOETÆ, (from ἀγνοω, "to be ignorant of,") a sect, the followers of Meophronius, of Cappadocia, which appeared about 370. They called in question the omniscience of God, alleging that he knew things past only by memory, and things future only by an uncertain prescience. There arose another sect of the same name in the sixth century, who followed Themistius, deacon of Alexandria. They maintained that Christ was ignorant of certain things, and particularly of the time of the day of judgment. It is supposed they built their hypothesis on that passage in Mark xiii. 32, "Of that day and that hour knoweth no man; no, not the angels which are in heaven, neither the Son, but the Father." The meaning of which most probably is, that this was not known to the Messiah himself in his human nature, or by virtue of his unction, as any part of the mysteries he was to reveal; for, considering him as God, he could not be ignorant of any thing.

AGNUS DEI, in the Church of Rome, a cake of wax, stamped with the figure of a lamb supporting the banner of the cross, with the year and name of the pope. The name literally signifies "Lamb of God." These cakes, being consecrated by the pope with great solemnity, and distributed among the people, are supposed to have great virtues. They cover them with a piece of stuff, cut in the form of a heart, and carry them very devoutly in their processions. The Romish priests and religious derive considerable pecuniary advantage from selling them to some, and presenting them to others.

Agnus Dei is also used as a prayer in the Romish Liturgy, which begins with the words, and is generally sung before the communion. According to the regulation of Pope Sergius I., in 688, it was also sung at the close of the mass.

AGONISTICI, a name given by Donatus to such of his disciples as he sent to fairs, markets, and other public places, to propagate his doctrine. They were called Agonistici, from the Greek áyw, "combat," because they were sent, as it were, to fight and subdue the people to their opinions. See DONATIST.

AGONYCLITÆ, a sect of Christians in the seventh century, who prayed always standing, as thinking it unlawful to kneel.

AGRICOLA, JOHN, the son of a tailor at Eisleben, was born in 1492. He was one of the most active among the theologians who propagated the doctrines of Luther. He studied at Wittenberg and Leipsic, was afterwards rector and preacher in his native city, and, in 1526, chaplain to the Elector John of Saxony. He subsequently was made chaplain to Count Albert of Mansfeldt, and took a part in the delivery of the Augsburg Confession, and the signing of the articles of Smalcald. When professor at Wittenberg, whither he went in 1537, he stirred up the Antinomian Controversy with Luther and Melancthon. After a life of disputation, he died at Berlin, in 1566. Besides his theological works, he published one, the object of which was to explain the common German proverbs. Its patriotic spirit, strict morality, and pithy style, place it among the first prose German compositions of the time, at the side of Luther's translation of the Bible. In conjunction with Julius Pflug and Michael Heldingus, he composed the famous INTERIM, which see.

AGYNIANI, a sect which appeared before 694. They condemned all use of flesh and marriage as not instituted by God, but introduced at the instigation of the devil.

AHRIMAN, according to the system of the ancient magi, one of the two original principles, the cause of all evil, whose symbol was darkness, and whose influence was experienced in all the ills of life.

AINSWORTH, HENRY, a celebrated nonconformist divine of the 16th and 17th centuries, but both the time and place of his birth are unknown.

In the year 1590, he greatly distinguished himself among the sect called Brownists; and in early life gained very great reputation by his knowledge of the learned languages, and particularly of Hebrew. The Brownists having fallen into great discredit in England, Ainsworth was involved in their difficulties and troubles; and at length he was compelled to quit his native land, and retire into Holland. In conjunction with Johnson, he erected a church at Amsterdam, and published a Confession of Faith of the Brownists, in the year 1602, which caused much contention, and a division between him and Mr. Johnson was the result; the latter removing to Embden with half the congregation, and Ainsworth remaining at Amsterdam; but Johnson soon after died, and his congregation was dissolved. Ainsworth also left his people for a short time, and went to Ireland, but returned to Amsterdam, and continued there till the time of his death. Nothing could persuade him, however, to return home; and he died, as he lived, in exile. This circumstance was at that time very prejudicial to the Protestant cause in general, and especially to the Puritans; and it has ever been a matter of regret, that this great and able man was prevented from the public exercise of his ministry in his native country. Very few authors are more quoted than Ainsworth by the literati of all countries; and not only at a considerable distance of time, but by all sects and parties. To his works the celebrated Bishop Hall paid much attention.

Ainsworth was a man of profound learning, well versed in the Scriptures, and deeply read in the works of the Rabbins. He published several treatises, many of which excited great interest, particularly that entitled "A counter Poison against Bernard and Crashaw." Ainsworth is, however, most celebrated for his "Annotations on several Books of the Bible." These were printed at various times and in different sizes. In those on the Five Books of Moses, Psalms, and the Canticles, the Hebrew words are compared with and explained by the ancient Greek and Chaldee versions, and other records and monuments of the Hebrews.

Mr. Ainsworth's death was sudden; and suspicion of his having been poisoned was raised by his having found a diamond of great value, belonging to a Jew, and his refusing to return it to him till he had conferred with some of his Rabbins on the prophecies of the Old Testament, relating to the Messiah, which was promised; but the Jew not having sufficient interest to obtain one, it is thought he was the instrument of his death. Mr. Ainsworth was a great, a pious, and a learned man; and his name will be justly handed down to posterity, as worthy not only of praise, but imitation. In addition to the works referred to in this life, he was the author of "A Treatise on the Communion of Saints;" "A Treatise on the Fellowship that the Faithful have with God, his Angels, and one with another in this present Life;" and "An Arrow against Idolatry."

ALASCANI, so called from John Alasco, a Polish bishop, a sect of anti-Lutherans in the sixteenth century, whose distinguishing tenet, besides their denying baptism, is said to be this, that the words, "This is my body," in the institution of the eucharist, are not to be understood of the bread, but of the whole action or celebration of the supper.

ALBANESE, a denomination which commenced about the year 796. They held, with the Gnostics and Manicheans, two principles, the one of good, and the other of evil. They denied the divinity and even the humanity of Jesus Christ; asserting that he was not truly man, did not suffer on the cross, die, rise again, nor really ascend into heaven. They rejected the doctrine of the resurrection, affirmed that the general judgment was past, and that hell torments were no other than the evils we feel and suffer in this life. They denied free will, did not admit original sin, and never administered baptism to infants. They held that a man can give the Holy Spirit of himself, and that it is unlawful for a Christian to take an oath.

This denomination derived their name from the place where their spiritual ruler resided. See MANICHEANS and CATHARIST.

ALBIGENSES, a party of reformers about Toulouse and the Albigeois, in Languedoc, who sprung up in the twelfth century, and distinguished themselves by their opposition to the Church of Rome. They were charged with many errors by the monks of those days; but from these charges they are generally acquitted by the Protestants, who consider them only as the inventions of the Romish Church to blacken their character. The Albigenses grew so formidable, that the Catholics agreed upon a holy league or crusade against them. Pope Innocent III., desirous to put a stop to their progress, stirred up the great men of the kingdom to make war upon them. After suffering from their persecutors, they dwindled by little and little, till the time of the Reformation; when such of them as were left, fell in with the Vaudois, and conformed to the doctrine of Zuinglius, and the disciples of Geneva. The Albigenses have been frequently confounded with the Waldenses, from whom it is said they differ in many respects, both as being prior to them in point of time, as having their origin in a different country, and as being charged with divers heresies, particularly Manicheism, from which the Waldenses were exempt. See WALDENSES.

ALEXANDRIAN MANUSCRIPT, a famous copy of the Scriptures, in four volumes quarto. It is written in uncial or capital letters, without breathings or accents. It contains the whole Bible in Greek, including the Old and New Testament, with the Apocrypha, and some smaller pieces, but not quite complete. It is of the greatest importance to biblical criticism, and is at present preserved in the British Museum. It was sent as a present to King Charles I., from Cyrillus Lucaris, patriarch of Constantinople, by Sir Thomas Rowe, ambassador from England to the Grand Seignior, about the year 1628. Cyrillus brought it with him from Alexandria, where probably it was written. In a schedule annexed to it he gives this account:—"That it was written, as tradition informed them, by Thecla, a noble Egyptian lady, about 1300 years ago, not long after the Council of Nice. But this high antiquity, and the authority of the tradition to which the patriarch refers, have been disputed; nor are the most accurate biblical writers agreed about its age. Grabe, who follows it in his edition of the Old Testament, thinks that it might have been written before the end of the fourth century; others are of opinion that it was not written till near the end of the fifth century, or somewhat later. Dr. Woide published the New Testament from this copy with fac-simile types. This edition is so perfect a resemblance of the original, that it may supply its place. The Old Testament has been published in a similar style by the Rev. Mr. Baber.

ALEXANDRIAN VERSION. See ancient BIBLE VERSIONS, No. 9.

ALLAH, the name of God in Arabic, and adopted into most other languages spoken by Mohammedans. It signifies "the Adorable," from the verb alaha, "to venerate, adore." From the same root, the Hebrew forms Eloah and Elohim are derived.

ALLEGORY, a mode of speech under which something is understood different from what is expressed. It differs from metaphor, in that it is not confined to a word, but extends to a whole thought, or, it may be, to several thoughts. Allegory may be expressed by pictures, Ezek. iv. 1; actions, Ezek. iii. iv. v., Luke xxii. 36, or by any significant thing. In interpreting allegories, their general design is to be ascertained, and then the primary word or words are to be sought for, and their force expressed by a word or words that are not figurative, and explained accordingly. It must never be forgotten, that the comparison is not to be extended to all the circumstances of the allegory. Thus, in the parable of the good Samaritan, the point to be illustrated is the extent of the duty of benevolence. Most of the circumstances in the parable merely go to make up the verisimilitude of the narration, so that it may give pleasure to him who reads or hears it. But how differently does the whole appear when interpreted by an allegorizer of the mystic school! According to him, the man going from Jerusalem to Jericho, is Adam wandering in the wilderness of this world; the thieves are evil spirits; the priest is the law of Moses; the Levite is good works; the good Samaritan is Christ; the twopence the price of atonement; the oil and wine, grace, &c. What may not a parable be made to mean, if imagination is to supply the place of reasoning and philology? And what riddle or oracle of Delphos could be more equivocal, or of more multifarious significancy than the Bible, if such exegesis be admissible? It is a miserable excuse which some interpreters make, that they render the Scriptures more edifying and significant by interpreting them in this manner. Are the Scriptures, then, to be made more significant than God has made them? or to be amended by the skill of the interpreter, so as to become more edifying than the Holy Spirit has made them? If there be a semblance of piety in such interpretations, a semblance is all. Real piety and humility appear to the best advantage in receiving the Scriptures as they are, and expounding them as simply and skilfully as the rules of language will permit, rather than by attempting to amend and improve the revelation which God has given.—Stuart's Ernesti.

ALLENITES, the followers of Henry Allen, a man of natural good sense, but of a warm imagination, who, about the year 1774, journeyed through most parts of the province of Nova Scotia, and, by his popular talents, made many converts. He also published several treatises and sermons, in which he maintains, that the souls of all the human race are emanations, or rather parts, of the one Great Spirit; but that originally they had individually the powers of moral agents;—that they were all present with our first parents in the garden of Eden, and were actually in the first transgression. He supposes that our first parents in innocence were pure spirits, without material bodies; that the material world was not then made; but, in consequence of the fall, mankind being cut off from God, that they might not sink into immediate destruction, the world was produced, and they were clothed with hard bodies; and that all the human race will in their turns, by natural generation, be invested with such bodies, and in them enjoy a state of probation for happiness of immortal duration. He maintains, that the body of our Saviour was never raised from the grave, and that none of the bodies of men ever will be; but when the original number of souls have had their course on earth, they will all receive their reward or punishment in their original un-embodied state. He held baptism, the Lord's supper, and ordination, to be matters of indifference.

These are his most distinguishing tenets, which he and his party endeavour to support, by alleging that the Scriptures are not to be understood in their literal sense, but have a spiritual meaning. He had such influence over his followers, that some of them pretend to remember their being in the Garden of Eden. Of the moment of their conversion they are so well assured, that some of them are said even to calculate the age of their cattle by it. Allen died in 1783, after which his party greatly declined.—H. Adams's Alphabet. Compend.

ALL-SUFFICIENCY OF GOD, is that power or attribute of his nature whereby he is able to communicate as much blessedness to his creatures as he is pleased to make them capable of receiving. As his self-sufficiency is that whereby he has enough in himself to denominate him completely blessed, as a God of infinite perfection; so his all-sufficiency is that by which he hath enough in himself to satisfy the most enlarged desires of his creatures, and to make them completely blessed. We practically deny this perfection, when we are discontented with our present condition, and desire more than God has allotted for us. Gen. iii. 5. Prov. xix. 3. 2. When we seek blessings of what kind soever, in an indirect way, as though God were not able to bestow them upon us in his own way, or in the use of lawful means. Gen. xxvii. 35. 3. When we use unlawful means to escape imminent dangers. 1 Sam. xxi. 13. Gen. xx. and xxvi. 4. When we distrust his providence, though we have had large experience of his appearing for us in various instances. 1 Sam. xxvii. 1. Ps. lxxviii. 19. 2 Chron. xvi. 2 Chron. xiv. 9, 31. Josh. vii. 7, 9. 5. When we doubt of the truth or certain accomplishment of the promises. Gen. xviii. 12. Ps. lxxvii. 8, 9. Is. xlix. 14. 6. When we decline great services, though called to them by God, under a pretence of our unfitness for them. Jer. i. 6, 8.

The consideration of this doctrine should lead us—1. To seek happiness in God alone, and not in human things. Jer. ii. 13. 2. To commit all our wants and trials to him. 1 Sam. xxx. 6. Heb. xi. 19. 2 Cor. xii. 8, 9. 3. To be courageous in the midst of danger and opposition. Ps. xxvii. 1. 4. To be satisfied with his dispensations. Rom. viii. 28. 5. ALL-SAINTS, FEAST OF.—After the persecutions against the Christians had ceased, in the fourth century, the Sunday after Whitsuntide was appointed to commemorate the martyrs. Chrysostom's 74th Homily was delivered on such an occasion, and shows how far they were from being objects of adoration in his day. This feast was introduced into the Western Church in 610, by Boniface IV. The Emperor Phocas had presented the Pantheon at Rome to this pope, who made a church of it, and dedicated it as such, March the 4th, to the honour of the Virgin and all the martyrs. This church still exists under the name of Rotunda. Greg. IV. in 835, appointed Nov. 1 for the celebration of this feast, and consecrated it to all the saints and angels. In order that it might be generally celebrated, he solicited the Emperor Louis le Debonnaire to confirm it. About 870 it was introduced into England.

ALL-SOULS.—A feast celebrated on the 2nd of November, in commemoration of all the faithful deceased. It was instituted in the eleventh century.

ALLIANCE, HOLY, a misnomer used for—1. A confederation formed by Helder, Vice-Chancellor of the Emperor, in the year 1538, to counteract the privileges derived by the Protestants from the league of Smalcald, and support and further the Catholic faith. It was acceded to by the archbishops of Metz and Salzburg, by William and Lewis, dukes of Bavaria, George, duke of Saxony, and Eric and Henry, dukes of Brunswick. It was to have remained a profound secret, but the rumour of it soon got abroad, the Protestants were greatly alarmed; it was feared that their rights and liberties would be suppressed; and they concerted how to raise a sufficient force to defend themselves. But the convention of Francfort, in 1539, allayed their fears, and effectually prevented the evils that had been apprehended.

ALLIANCE, HOLY, The—A league entered into by the Emperor Alexander of Russia, the Emperor Francis of Austria, and Frederic William King of Prussia, after the defeat of Napoleon in 1815, consisting of a declaration signed by them personally, that, in accordance with the precepts of the Gospel of Jesus Christ, the principles of justice, charity, and peace, should be the basis of the internal administration of their empires, and of their international relations; and that the happiness and religious welfare of their subjects should be the great objects they should ever keep in view. It originated with Alexander, who, it is said, imagined that it would introduce a new era of Christian government; but whatever may have been the original intentions, it soon became, in the hands of the wily Metternich, an instrument for the support of tyranny and oppression, and laid the foundation of the Congressional system of politics, which, while it professes to have for its object the support of legitimacy, is a horrid conspiracy against the rights and privileges of the subject.

ALMARICIANS, a denomination that arose in the thirteenth century.—They derived their origin from Almaric, professor of logic and theology at Paris. His adversaries charged him with having taught that every Christian was obliged to believe himself a member of Jesus Christ, and that without this belief none could be saved. His followers asserted that the power of the Father had continued only during the Mosaic dispensation, that of the Son twelve hundred years after his entrance upon earth; and that in the thirteenth century the age of the Holy Spirit commenced, in which the sacraments and all external worship were to be abolished; and that every one was to be saved by the internal operations of the Holy Spirit alone, without any external act of religion.

ALMONER, in its primitive sense, denoted an officer of any religious establishment to whom belonged the distribution of alms. Every bishop was required to keep an almoner. The Great Almoner of France was the highest ecclesiastical dignity in that kingdom before the Revolution. Napoleon restored the office, and it has since been kept up by the Bourbons. To this officer belonged the superintendence of all hospitals and houses of charity. The King received the sacrament from him, and he said mass at all grand solemnities. He still officiates at the performance of the mass called Veni Spiritus, before the Chamber of Deputies. The Lord Almoner, or Lord High Almoner of England, is an ecclesiastical officer, generally a bishop, who formerly received all deadends and the goods of every jelo de se, which he was to distribute among the poor. He had also the power of giving the first dish from the king's table to whatever poor person he pleased. The Emperors of Germany, too, and most of the European monarchs, had their almoners; and at the papal court the almoner is one of the highest officers of state. The name has by some writers been given to the chaplains of ships, regiments, &c.

ALMS. Something given towards the relief of the poor. In the primitive Christian Church, the people gave alms to the poor at their first entrance into the church; upon which practice Chrysostom employs his rhetoric in the following manner. "Our forefathers appointed the poor to stand before the doors of our churches, that the sight of them might melt the most obdurate heart into pity. And as, by law and custom, we have fountains before our oratories, that they who go in, in order to worship God, may wash their hands before they lift them up in prayer: so our ancestors, instead of fountains and cisterns, placed the poor before the doors of the churches, that, as we wash our hands in water, so we should first cleanse our souls by beneficence and charity, and then go in and offer up our prayers."

Again, "You go into the church to obtain mercy: first, show mercy. Make God your debtor, and then you may ask of him, and receive with usury. We are not heard barely for the lifting up our hands. Stretch forth your hands, not only to heaven, but to the poor. If you stretch out your hands to the poor, you touch the very height of heaven. For he that sits there receives your alms. But if you lift up barren hands, it profits nothing."

The alms of the primitive Christians were divided into four parts; three of which were appropriated to the maintenance of the bishop, the priests, and the deacons, and the fourth was applied to the relief of the poor, and the repair of the churches.

Paul describes the manner of collecting alms among the Christians of his time. The practice was borrowed from the Jewish synagogue, where it still obtains. The Jews call alma, Tsedakah, i. e. Justice. See Dr. Barrow's admirable sermon on Bounty to the Poor, which took him up three hours and a half in preaching; Saurin's Ser. vol. iv.; Eng. Trans. ser. 9; Paley's Mor. Phil. ch. 5. vol. i.

ALOGIANS, a sect of ancient heretics who denied that Jesus Christ was the Logos, and consequently rejected the Gospel of John. The word is compounded of the privative α and λόγος; q. d. without logos, or word. They made their appearance towards the close of the second century, under the direction of Theodore of Byzantium, by trade a currier, who apostatized in the time of the persecution under Severus.

ALPHA AND OMEGA, the first and last letters of the Greek alphabet; in the Holy Scripture signify the beginning and the end, or the first and the last, i. e. before and after all things. These two letters, corresponding to the Aleph and Thau of the Hebrews, were used as a symbol of the eternity and perfection of the Divine Being; they are thus claimed by our Saviour, Rev. xxii. 13; and they were afterwards employed as the symbol of Christianity, and engraved on the tombs of the ancient Christians, to distinguish them from those of idolaters.

ALPHABETICAL POETRY. See POETRY, HEBREW.

ALTAR, a kind of table or raised place whereon the ancient sacrifices were offered. 2. The table in national churches, where the Lord's supper is administered. Altars are, doubtless, of great antiquity; some suppose they were as early as Adam; but there is no mention made of them till after the flood, when Noah built one, and offered burnt-offerings on it. The Jews had two altars in and about their temple:—1. The altar of burnt-offerings. 2. The altar of incense. Some also call the table for shew-bread an altar, but improperly. Exod. xx. 24, 25. 1 Kings xviii. 30. Exod. xxv.; xxvii.; xxx. Heb. ix.

Altars in the Romish Church are built of stone, to represent Christ, the foundation-stone of the spiritual building, the Church. Every altar has three steps going up to it, covered with a carpet. It is decked with natural and artificial flowers, according to the season of the year; and no cost is spared in adorning it with gold, silver, and jewels. The tabernacle of the Holy Sacrament is placed on the altar, on each side of which stand tapers of white wax, excepting at all offices for the dead, and during the last three days of passion-week, at which times they are of yellow. A crucifix, neatly made in relievo, is placed on the altar. There is also upon every altar, a copy, written very fair and large, of the Te igitur, which is a prayer addressed only to the first person of the Trinity; it is also called the Secret Prayer. The altar is furnished likewise with a little bell, which is rung thrice, when the priest kneels down; thrice, when he elevates the Host; and thrice, when he sets it down. They have also a portable altar, or consecrated stone, with a small cavity in the middle of the front side, in which are put the relics of saints and martyrs, and sealed up by the bishop; should the seal break, the altar loses its consecration.

The furniture of the altar consists further of a chalice and paten, for the bread and wine, both of gold or silver; a pyx, for holding the holy sacrament, at least of silver gilt; a vail, in form of a pavilion, of rich white stuff, to cover the pyx; a thurible, of silver or pewter, for the incense; a holy water-pot, of silver, pewter, or tin; and many other utensils, as corporals, palls, purificatories, &c., which it would be tedious to mention.

AMAURITES, the followers of Amauri, a clergyman of Bonne, in the thirteenth century. He acknowledged the Divine three, to whom he attributed the empire of the world. But according to him, religion had three epochas, which bore a similitude to the reign of the three persons in the Trinity. The reign of God had existed as long as the law of Moses. The reign of the Son would not always last. A time would come when the sacraments should cease, and then the religion of the Holy Ghost would begin, when men would render a spiritual worship to the Supreme Being. This reign Amauri thought would succeed to the Christian religion, as the Christian had succeeded to that of Moses.

AMBROSIAN OFFICE. A particular ritual or form of worship, used in the church of Milan, and so called because composed by Ambrose, archbishop of that see, in the fourth century. When the pope took upon him to impose the Roman office on all the western churches, that of Milan sheltered itself under the name and authority of Ambrose, since which time his ritual has obtained, in contradistinction to the Roman ritual.

AMEDIANI, a congregation of religionists in Italy; so called from their professing themselves amantes Deum, "lovers of God;" or rather amati Deo, "beloved of God." They wore a grey habit and wooden shoes, had no breeches, and girt themselves with a cord. They had twenty-eight convents, and were united by Pope Pius V., partly with the Bistercian order, and partly with that of the Scolanti, or wooden-shoe wearers.

AMEN, a Hebrew word, which when prefixed to an assertion, signifies assuredly, certainly, or emphatically so it is; but when it concludes a prayer, so be it, or so let it be, is its manifest import. In the former case it is assertive, or assures of a truth or a fact; and is an asseveration, and properly translated, verily, John iii. 3. In the latter case it is petitionary, and, as it were, epitomises all the requests with which it stands connected, Numb. v. 25. Rev. xxii. 20. This emphatical term was not used among the Hebrews by detached individuals only, but on certain occasions, by an assembly at large. Deut. xxvii. 14, 20. It was adopted, also, in the public worship of the primitive churches, as clearly appears by that passage, 1 Cor. xiv. 16, and was continued among the Christians in following times; and Jerome informs us, that in his time, at the conclusion of every public prayer, the united amen of the people sounded like the fall of water, or the noise of thunder. It is to be desired that this primitive custom, which obtains in some churches, and which might so easily be introduced, were again universally to prevail.

AMMONIANS, OR MODERN PLATONISTS, a sect which sprang up at Alexandria in the second century, and which contributed greatly to the early corruption of Christianity. The founder of this sect was Ammonius Saccas.—Musheim de rebus, ii. 125—134.

AMSDORFIANS, a sect, in the sixteenth century, who took their name from Amadorf, their leader. They maintained that good works were not only unprofitable, but obstacles to salvation.

AMULET, a piece of stone, metal, or other substance, marked with certain characters, which people wear about them as a protection against diseases and enchantments. The name, as well as the thing itself, is derived from the East: coming from the Arabic hamail, a locket, or any thing hung round the neck. Amulets were much used by the Jews, who attached the most superstitious notions to them. Many of the Christians of the first century wore them, marked with a fish, as a symbol of the Redeemer. To Christian divines the use of them was interdicted by the Council of Laodicea, under penalty of dismission from office. The small images of saints, &c., which the Neapolitan seamen, and almost all the Greeks, wear about them, are nothing but amulets.

AMYRALDISM, a name given by some writers to the doctrine of universal grace, as explained and asserted by Amyraldus, or Moses Amyrault, and others his followers, among the reformed in France, towards the middle of the seventeenth century. This doctrine principally consisted of the following particulars, viz. that God desires the happiness of all men, and none are excluded by a divine decree; that none can obtain salvation without faith in Christ; that God refuses to none the power of believing, though he does not grant to all his assistance that they may improve this power to saving purposes; and that they may perish through their own fault. Those who embraced this doctrine were called Universalists; though it is evident they rendered grace universal in words, but limited in reality. See CAMERONITES.

ANABAPTISTS, from anà, again, and βαπτίζω, I baptize, a name commonly given to those who reject infant baptism, because they re-baptize such as join their communion.

In present usage, the term is more generally confined to a sect which sprang up in Germany, immediately after the rise of the Reformation. It originated with some opponents of infant baptism at Zwickau, in Saxony, in the year 1521, who, by their lawless fanaticism, completely separated themselves from the cause of the reformers; and with the subject of adult baptism, connected principles subversive of all religious and civil order. The vast increase of their adherents from the year 1524, especially among the common people on the Rhine, in Westphalia, Holstein, Switzerland, and the Netherlands, was soon met by severe measures on the part of the magistrates. Imperial and ecclesiastical decrees were issued against them, and many were put to death, after being urged to recant. Still new associations were perpetually formed by itinerant prophets and teachers, whose doctrines consisted of the following propositions: "Impiety prevails every where. It is therefore necessary that a new family of holy persons should be founded, enjoying, without distinction of sex, the gift of prophecy, and skill to interpret divine revelations. Hence they need no learning. For the internal word is more than the outward expression. No Christian must be suffered to engage in a legal process, to hold a civil office, to take an oath, or to hold any private property; but all things must be in common."

With such sentiments, John Bockhold, or Bockelson, a tailor, of Leyden, aged 26; and John Matthias, or Matthiesen, a baker, of Harlem, came, in 1533, to Münster, in Westphalia, a city which had adopted the doctrines of the Reformation. Here they soon gained over a portion of the excited populace, and among the rest, Rothmann, a protestant clergyman, and the counsellor Knipperdolling. The magistrates in vain excluded them from the churches. They obtained possession of the council-house by violence. Their numbers daily increased, and towards the end of the year, they extorted a treaty, securing the religious liberty of both parties. Being strengthened by the accession of the restless spirits of the adjacent cities, they soon made themselves masters of the town by force, and expelled their adversaries. Matthiesen came forward as their prophet, and persuaded the people to devote their gold, and silver, and moveable property to the common use, and to burn all their books but the Bible. But in a sally against the bishop of Münster, who had laid siege to the city, he lost his life. He was succeeded in the prophetic office by Bockhold and Knipperdolling. The churches were destroyed, and twelve judges were set over the tribes, as in Israel, but even this form of government was soon abolished, and Bockhold, under the name of John of Leyden, raised himself to the dignity of King of New Zion, (so the Anabaptists of Münster styled their kingdom,) and caused himself to be formally crowned. From this period (1534) Münster was a theatre of all the excesses of fanaticism, lust, and cruelty. The introduction of polygamy, and the neglect of civil order, concealed from the infatuated people the avarice and madness of their young tyrant, and the daily increase of danger from abroad. Bockhold lived in princely luxury and magnificence; he sent out seditious proclamations against neighbouring rulers,—against the Pope and Luther; he threatened to destroy with his mob, all who differed in opinion from him, made himself an object of terror to his subjects by frequent executions, and while famine and pestilence raged in the city, persuaded the wretched, deluded inhabitants to a stubborn resistance of their besiegers. The city was at last taken, June 24th, 1535, by treachery, though not without a brave defence, in which Rothmann and others were killed, and the kingdom of the Anabaptists destroyed, by the execution of the chief men. Bockhold, and two of his most active companions, Knipperdolling and Krecking, were tortured to death with red hot pincers, and then hung up in iron cages, on St. Lambert's steeple, at Münster, as a terror to all rebels. In the mean time, some of the twenty-six apostles, who were sent out by Bockhold to extend the limits of his kingdom, had been successful in various places: and many independent teachers, who preached the same doctrines, continued active in the work of founding a new empire of pure Christians, and propagating their visions and revelations in the countries above mentioned. It is true that they rejected the practice of polygamy, community of goods, and intolerance towards those of different opinions, which had prevailed in Münster; but they enjoined upon their adherents the other doctrines of the early Anabaptists, and certain heretical opinions in regard to the humanity of Christ, occasioned by the controversies of that day about the sacrament.

The most celebrated of these Anabaptist prophets were Melchior Hoffman and David Joris. The former, a furrier from Swabia, first appeared as a teacher in Kiel, in 1527; afterwards, in 1529, in Emden; and finally in Strasburg, where in 1540, he died in prison. He formed chiefly by his magnificent promises of a future elevation of himself and his disciples, a peculiar sect, whose scattered members retained the name of Hoffmanists, in Germany, till their remains were lost among the Anabaptists. They have never owned that Hoffman recanted before his death. David Joris, or George, a glass-painter of Delft, born 1501, and re-baptized in 1534, showed more depth of mind and warmth of imagination in his various works. Amidst the confusion of ideas which prevails in them, they dazzle by their elevation and fervour. In his endeavours to unite the discordant parties of the Anabaptists, he collected a party of quiet adherents in the country, who studied his works, (as the Gichtelians did those of Bohme,) especially his book of miracles, which appeared at Deventer in 1542, and revered him as a kind of new Messiah. Unsettled in his opinions, he travelled a long time from place to place, till at last to avoid persecution, in 1554, he became a citizen of Basle, under the name of John of Bruges. In 1556, after an honourable life, he died there among the Calvinists. In 1559, his long concealed heresy was first made public. He was accused, though without much reason, of profligate doctrine and conduct, and the council of Basle condemned him, and ordered his body to be burnt. A friend of Joris was Nicholas, the founder of the Familists, who do not however belong to the Anabaptists.

After the disturbances at Münster, an opinion slowly gained ground among the Protestants, that no heretic could be punished with death unless he was guilty of exciting disturbances; hence these and similar parties of separatists were permitted to remain unmolested, provided they continued quiet. But, till after the middle of the sixteenth century, prophets were constantly rising up among the Anabaptists, and subverting the civil order. Of the heretics executed by Alva, in the Spanish Netherlands, a large proportion were Anabaptists. In fact, they were never worthy of toleration till quiet and good order were introduced among them. The institutions of Menno were the first occasion of this change. This judicious man, about the middle of the sixteenth century, united them in regular societies, which formed an independent church, under the name of Menno-nists, Mennists, or Anabaptists, as they are still called in the north of Germany and in Holland, imitating strictly the peculiarities of the primitive Apostolical Church. But he could not prevent the division which took place among them as early as 1554, in regard to the degree of severity necessary in case of excommunication. The stricter party punished every individual transgression against morality and church order with excommunication, and carried their severity so far, that near relations, even husbands and wives, were obliged to renounce all connexion with one another, in case of such punishment. The more moderate party resorted to excommunication only in cases of long-continued disobedience to the commands of the Holy Scriptures. Moreover they never inflicted this punishment till after various kinds of warnings and reproofs, (gradus admonitionis,) —and then it did not extend beyond the relation of the individual excommunicated with the church. As neither party would yield, and the strict often excluded the moderate from their communion, the Anabaptists have continued to this day divided into two parties. The moderate party were called Waterlanders, because their earliest congregations lived in the Waterland, on the Pampus, in the north of Holland, and in Franeker. By the strict party they were styled the Gross, and even the dung-carts, as a designation of their inferior purity. This latter party, who consisted of the Frieslanders in and about Emden, Flemish refugees (Flemingians), and Germans, called themselves the Pure (Die Feinen), i. e. the Blessed, the Strict.

Menno did not wholly adopt the excessive rigour of the Pure, nor yet would he abandon the Frieslanders, among whom he taught. Immediately after his death, in 1565, a contest broke out among the Pure, and they divided into three parties. Of these, the Flemingians were more severe and fanatical than the rest, and maintained the utmost severity in regard to excommunication; the Frieslanders did not, indeed, exercise this discipline on whole congregations, nor extend the curse, in the case of individuals, to the destruction of their family relations; the Germans were distinguished from the Frieslanders only by more carefully avoiding all luxury. To the party of these Germans belonged those who were settled in Holstein, Prussia, Dantzic, the Palatinate of the Rhine, Juliers, Alsace, and Switzerland, and the numerous Anabaptists who inhabited Moravia till the thirty years' war. In 1591, they were again united with the Frieslanders by means of the concept of Cologne, so called, or articles of faith, chiefly because their separation was injurious to commerce, in which the Anabaptists soon became much engaged.

With these two sects thus connected, after many attempts towards reconciliation and friendship, the strictest Anabaptists at length joined themselves, and certain articles of faith were adopted by the whole body. But these arrangements were insufficient to check the bitterness with which they persecuted one another. Soon after the union of the Frieslanders with the Germans, a large number of malecontents left the former, because they were displeased with this connexion, and the laxness of church discipline. Under Jan Jacob, their teacher, they constituted a separate church on the most rigid principles. They were not numerous. During the negotiations of the Flemingians with the Frieslanders, there appeared among the former a Friesland peasant, Uke Wallis, who held the opinion that Judas and the high priests were blessed, because in the murder of Jesus they had executed the designs of God. In 1637, he collected a party of individuals who adopted this opinion, but still remained distinct from the other Anabaptists, on account of their aversion to the excessive strictness of the ancient Flemingians. The Uke Wallists, or Gröningenists, so called because the sect arose in the territory of Gröningen, received the malecontents of the united parties, and therefore called themselves emphatically the ancient Flemingians, or the ancient Frieslanders; but by their adversaries they were denominated the Dompelers, i. e. Dippers, because some of their churches used, in baptism, the three-fold immersion of the whole body. The other Anabaptists, on the contrary, regarded the sprinkling of the head as sufficient. Beyond Friesland, though not numerous, they spread to Lithuania and Dantzic. The Anabaptists in Galicia, a part of the ancient Moravia, who were divided, on account of their dress, into Buttoners, (those who buttoned their clothes), and Pinner, (those who used wire pins instead of buttons, and wore long beards,) and comprehended about twenty-four families, of the simple country-people, agreed with the Uke Wallists in maintaining the ancient doctrines and strict exercise of excommunication, and were distinguished for purity of morals. The ancient Flemingians, or the strictest sect of Anabaptists, persevere firmly in the ancient doctrines and practices of the sect. They reject the word person, in the doctrine of the Trinity, and explain the purity of the human nature in Christ, according to Menno, by saying that he was created out of nothing by God, in the womb of Mary, although he was nourished by the blood of the mother. They view the baptism of their own party as alone valid, and practise the washing of feet, as an act commanded by Christ, not only towards travellers of their own party, like the Pure, but even in religious assemblies. Like Anabaptists in general, they view as improper, oaths, the discharge of civil offices, and all defence of property, liberty, or life, which requires violence against their fellow men. Hence they were formerly called, without distinction, the unarmed Christians. Only in this particular, and in church discipline, are the ancient Flemingians more strict than the other Anabaptists. Immorality, the bearing of arms, marriage with a person out of their church, extravagance in dress or furniture, they punish by excommunication, without gradus admonitionis, and extend their discipline to domestic life. Those of Dantzic excluded persons who had their portraits painted, as a punishment for their vanity. In general they strive to imitate, with the utmost exactness, the simplicity, purity, and government of the earliest apostolic church, the restoration of which was originally the object of every Anabaptist. They appoint their teachers by a vote of the whole church, forbid them to enjoy any political office, and place but little value on learning. In modern times, it is true, they have gradually remitted their severity, and given up, in particular, the rebaptism of proselytes from other Anabaptist sects; while Christians, who have only been baptized in infancy, are admitted into any sect of the Anabaptists only after rebaptism. The Flemings, Frieslanders, and Germans, who had united, 1649, and at first belonged also to the Pure, gradually sided with the moderate party, with which they are now reckoned.

A division took place in the general church of the united Waterlanders, Flemings, Frieslanders, and Germans, in 1664, on account of the favour with which a part of them regarded the doctrines of the Remonstrants. Galenus Abrahamsohn, of Haen, a learned physician and teacher of the Anabaptists, of a gentle disposition, and distinguished talents, was the leader of this new party, which was called, after him, the sect of the Galenists. He maintained that sound doctrine is less decisive of Christian worth than a pious life; and, therefore, church communion should be refused to no virtuous person believing in the Scriptures. But he betrayed, by these opinions, his Socinian views of Christ and the Holy Ghost. Samuel Apostool (also a physician and teacher of the church), and the orthodox party in it, declared themselves opposed to such innovations, and determined to maintain their ancient faith and discipline. Besides the branches of the ancient Flemings, or the proper Pure, described above, there are now two leading parties of Anabaptists,—the Apostoolians, who, from their attachment to the ancient confessions, founded on the doctrines of Menno, are called Mennonites, in a more limited use of that word; and the Galenists, who are likewise styled Remonstrants, and Arminian Baptists, after Arminius, the founder of the Remonstrants.

The Mennonites, as they belong to the moderate party, no longer maintain Menno's doctrine of the creation of Christ in the womb of Mary; they rebaptize no proselyte, and punish none but gross crimes with excommunication, and that not without previous warning. They do not require the church-members utterly to avoid the excommunicated. They carefully prohibit oaths, military service, and the holding of civil offices.

The confession of faith of the true Mennonites, composed by Cornelius Riss, one of their teachers, and published in German, at Hamburg, in 1776, corresponds, in almost every point, with the doctrines of the Calvinist church. The Remonstrants have departed the most widely from the faith and order of the ancient Anabaptists. They reject all symbolical books, and permit the most unrestrained reading; hence they have among them many Socinians. They tolerate, in the bosom of the church, those of a different faith, and receive Christians of all creeds, but only in a few congregations, without rebaptism. They consider the Pure and Mennonites as brethren; seldom exclude members, except from the sacrament, and this not so frequently as the latter parties; permit military service, and the discharge of civil offices, and even an oath of testimony, and prohibit only the oath of promise. They allow of learning, and have erected a seminary at Amsterdam for the education of ministers, to which young men of the Mennonite party are also admitted. In Holland, the Anabaptists obtained toleration under William I., and complete religious liberty in 1626. There are now in that country 131 churches, and 183 teachers of all the parties of Anabaptists, of whom the majority belong to the Remonstrants, about one-third to the Mennonites, and a few small congregations to the Pure. The Anabaptists in Germany, where they are most numerous, on the banks of the Rhine, in East Prussia, Switzerland, Alsace, and Lorraine, consider themselves pure Mennonites. In the religious worship of all, there is but a trifling difference from the forms of the Protestant service; but they more nearly resemble the Calvinists than the Lutherans. The Pure have elders or bishops who administer the sacraments, ministers who preach, and deacons or almoners. All these officers are chosen by the vote of the churches. The Mennonites have ministers or deacons, of whom the former are the proper pastors, and the latter only exhorters or preachers; but both are chosen by the ecclesiastical council or presbytery. The Remonstrants pursue a similar course. In general, the Anabaptists still deserve the praise formerly bestowed upon them, of diligence, industry, order, and purity of morals. Many of them, however, have become so accustomed to the manners of the world, that the peculiarities of this sect have gradually worn away, and the sect itself seems hastening to decay. The Antipædobaptists in England form a distinct sect, without any connexion with the successors of the ancient Anabaptists here described.

ANALOGY OF FAITH, is the proportion that the doctrines of the Gospel bear to each other, or the close connexion between the truths of revealed religion. Rom. xii. 6. This is considered as a grand rule for understanding the true sense of Scripture. It is evident that the Almighty doth not act without a design in the system of Christianity, any more than he does in the works of nature. Now this design must be uniform; for as in the system of the universe every part is proportioned to the whole, and made subservient to it, so in the system of the Gospel all the various truths, doctrines, declarations, precepts, and promises, must correspond with and tend to the end designed. For instance, supposing the glory of God in the salvation of man by free grace, be the grand design; then whatever doctrine, assertion, or hypothesis, agrees not with this, it is to be considered as false. Great care, however, must be taken, in making use of this method, that the inquirer previously understand the whole scheme, and that he harbour not a predilection only for a part; without attention to this, we shall be liable to error. If we come to the Scriptures with any preconceived opinions, and are more desirous to put that sense upon the text which quadrates with our sentiments rather than the truth, it becomes then the analogy of our faith, rather than that of the whole system. This was the source of the error of the Jews, in our Saviour's time. They searched the Scriptures; but, such were their favourite opinions, that they could not, or would not, discover that the sacred volume testified of Christ. And the reason was evident, for their great rule of interpretation was what they might call the analogy of faith, i.e. the system of the Pharisean scribes, the doctrine then in vogue, and in the profound veneration of which they had been educated. Perhaps there are few who have not, more or less, been guilty in this respect. It is, however, of great use to the serious and candid inquirer; for, as some texts may seem to contradict each other, and difficulties present themselves, by keeping the analogy of faith in view, he will the more easily resolve those difficulties, and collect the true sense of the sacred oracles. What "the aphorisms of Hippocrates are to a physician, the axioms in geometry to a mathematician, the adjudged cases in law to a counsellor, or the maxims of war to a general, such is the analogy of faith to a Christian." Of the analogy of religion to the constitution and course of nature, we must refer our readers to Bishop Butler's excellent treatise on that subject. See also Dr. Campbell's Prelim. Dissert.

ANAGOGICAL, signifies mysterious, transporting; and is used to express whatever elevates the mind, not only to the knowledge of divine things, but of divine things in the next life. The word is seldom used, but with regard to the different senses of Scripture. The anagogical sense is when the sacred text is explained with regard to eternal life, the point which Christians should have in view; for example, the rest of the sabbath, in the anagogical sense, signifies the repose of everlasting happiness.

ANAGOGY, the anagogical interpretation of Scripture just described.

ANATHEMA (Gr.) signifies originally something set apart, separated, devoted, from ἀνατίθημι, sepono. Among the Jews, things devoted to destruction could not be redeemed at any rate, as might be done in the case of things devoted to the service of God. If the thing devoted had life, it was to be put to death; if it had not, it was to be destroyed by fire, or some other way. We meet with many instances of these anathemas in the Jewish history. All the cities of the Canaanites, particularly Jericho, were devoted to destruction. Achan fell under the same curse, for having saved some of the plunder of that city, which was to have been destroyed. And Saul would have sacrificed his own son Jonathan, for ignorantly incurring the curse which he had laid upon those who should eat or drink whilst he was in pursuit of his victory.

It is also, in church history, one kind of excommunication, or cutting off, any person from the communion or privileges of a society.

The anathema differs from simple excommunication, in the circumstance of being attended with execrations and curses. It signifies not only to cut off the living from the church, but the dead from salvation. It was practised, in the ancient church, against notorious offenders. The form of anathema, such as that pronounced by Synesius against one Andronicus, is preserved to us, and is as follows:—"Let no church of God be open to Andronicus and his accomplices; but let every sacred temple and sanctuary be shut against them. I admonish both private men and magistrates neither to receive them under their roof, nor to their table; and priests more especially, that they neither converse with them living, nor attend their funerals when dead." When any one was anathematized, notice was given of it to the neighbouring churches, and sometimes to the churches all over the world, that all churches might confirm and ratify this act of discipline, by refusing to admit such an one to their communion.

The form of denouncing anathemas against heresies and heretics is very ancient. But, as zeal about opinions increased, and Christians began to set a greater value on trifles, than on the weightier matters of the law, it grew to be a common practice to add anathemas to every point in which men differed from one another; which arrived at last to such a pitch, that in the council of Trent, a whole body of divinity was put into canons, and an anathema affixed to every one of them. How important an instrument of spiritual power the anathema was in the hands of the popes in the middle ages, and how little it is regarded in modern times, is matter of history. Yet every year the Pope publicly repeats the anathema against all heretics, amongst whom Protestants, Lutherans, &c. are specified. See MARANATHA, and EXCOMMUNICATION.

ANCHORETS, a sort of monks, so called (ἀπὸ τοῦ ἀναχωρεῖν) from their retiring from society, and living in private cells in the wilderness. Such were Paul, and Anthony, and Hilarion, the first founders of the monastic life in Egypt and Palestine. Some of them lived in caves, ἐν σπηλαιοῖς, as Chrysostom tells us the monks of Mount Casius, near Antioch, did; and others in little tents or cells, ἐν οἰκίσκοις. When many of those were placed together in the same wilderness, at some distance from one another, they were all called by one common name, Laura, which, as Evagrius informs us, differed from a Canobium, or community, in this, that a Laura consisted of many cells, divided from each other, where every monk provided for himself; but a Canobium was but one habitation, where the monks lived in society, and had all things in common. See MONK, CENOBITE, and LAURA.

ANGEL, a spiritual intelligent substance, the first in rank and dignity among created beings. The word angel (ἄγγελος) is Greek, and signifies a messenger. The Hebrew word מַלְאָךְ, from the Arabic and Ethiopic laaka, to send on any errand, to execute a commission, signifies the same. Angels, therefore, in the proper signification of the word, do not import the nature of any being, but only the office to which they are appointed, especially by way of message or intercourse between God and his creatures. Hence the word is used differently in various parts of the Scripture, and signifies, 1. Human messengers, or agents for others, 2 Sam. ii. 5. "David sent messengers (Heb. angels) to Jabesh Gilead." Prov. xiii. 17. Mark i. 2. James ii. 25.—2. Officers of the churches, whether prophets or ordinary ministers, Hag. i. 13. Rev. i. 20.—3. Jesus Christ, Mal. iii. 1. Is. lxiii. 9.—4. Some add the dispensations of God's providence, either beneficial or calamitous. Gen. xxiv. 7. Ps. xxxiv. 7. Acts xii. 23. 1 Sam. xiv. 14; but I must confess, that, though I do not at all see the impropriety of considering the providences of God as his angels or messengers for good or for evil, yet the passages generally adduced under this head do not prove to me that the providences of God are meant in distinction from created angels.—5. Created intelligences, both good and bad. Heb. i. 14. Jude vi. the subject of the present article.—As to the time when the angels were created, much has been said by the learned. Some wonder that Moses, in his account of the creation, should pass over this in silence. Others suppose that he did this because of the proneness of the Gentile world, and even the Jews, to idolatry: but a better reason has been assigned by others, viz. that this first history was purposely and principally written for information concerning the visible world; the invisible, of which we know but in part, being reserved for a better life. Some think that the idea of God's not creating them before this world was made, is very contracted. To suppose, say they, that no creatures whatever, neither angels nor other worlds, had been created previous to the creation of our world, is to suppose that a Being of infinite power, wisdom, and goodness, had remained totally inactive from all eternity, and had permitted the infinity of space to continue a perfect vacuum till within these 6000 years; that such an idea only tends to discredit revelation, instead of serving it. On the other hand, it is alleged that they must have been created within the six days; because it is said, that within this space God made heaven and earth, and all things that are therein. It is, however, a needless speculation, and we dare not indulge a spirit of conjecture. It is our happiness to know that they are all ministering spirits, sent forth to minister to them who are heirs of salvation.

As to the nature of these beings, we are told that they are spirits; but whether pure spirits divested of all matter, or united to some thin bodies, or corporeal vehicles, has been a controversy of long standing; the more general opinion is, that they are substances entirely spiritual, though they can at any time assume bodies, and appear in human shape. Gen. xviii. and xix. Gen. xxxii. Matt. xxviii. Luke i. &c. The Scriptures represent them as endued with extraordinary wisdom and power, 2 Sam. xiv. 20. Ps. ciii. 20; holy, and regular in their inclinations; zealous in their employ, and completely happy in their minds, Job xxxviii. 7. Heb. i. 7. Matt. xviii. 10. Their number seems to be great, Ps. lxxviii. 17. Heb. xii. 22; and perhaps they have distinct orders, Col. i. 16, 17. 1 Pet. iii. 22. 1 Thess. iv. 16. Dan. x. 13. They are delighted with the grand scheme of redemption, and the conversion of sinners to God. Luke ii. 12. 1 Pet. i. 12. Luke xv. 10. They not only worship God, and execute his commands at large, but are attendant on the saints of God while here below, Ps. xci. 11, 12. Heb. i. 13. Luke xvi. 22. Some conjecture that every good man has his particular guardian angel, Matt. xviii. 10. Acts xii. 15; but this is easier to be supposed than to be proved; nor is it a matter of consequence to know. "What need we dispute," says Henry, "whether every particular saint has a guardian angel, when we are sure he has a guard of angels about him?" They will gather the elect in the last day, attend the final judgment, Matt. xxv. 31. Rev. xiv. 18. Matt. xiii. 39, and live for ever in the world of glory. Luke xx. 36.

Although the angels were originally created perfect, yet they were mutable: some of them sinned, and kept not their first estate; and so, of the most blessed and glorious, became the most vile and miserable of all God's creatures. They were expelled the regions of light, and with heaven lost their heavenly disposition, and fell into a settled rancour against God, and malice against men. What their offence was is difficult to determine, the Scripture being silent about it. Some think envy, others unbelief; but most suppose it was pride. As to the time of their fall, we are certain it could not be before the sixth day of the creation, because on that day it is said, "God saw every thing that he had made, and behold it was very good;" but that it was not long after, is very probable, as it must have preceded the fall of our first parents. The number of the fallen angels seems to be great, and, like the holy angels, perhaps they have various orders among them. Matt. xii. 24. Eph. ii. 2. Eph. vi. 12. Col. ii. 15. Rev. xii. 7. Their constant employ is not only doing evil themselves, but endeavouring by all arts to seduce and pervert mankind. 1 Pet. v. 8. Job i. 6. It is supposed they will be restrained during the millennium, Rev. xx. 2, but afterwards again, for a short time, deceive the nations, Rev. xx. 8, and then be finally punished, Matt. xxv. 41. The authors who have written on this subject have been very numerous; we shall only refer to a few: Reynolds' Inquiry into the State and Economy of the Angelical World; Doddridge's Lect. lect. 10. p. 210 to 214; Milton's Paradise Lost; Bp. Newton's Works, vol. iii. p. 538, 568; Shepherd of Angels; Gilpin on Temptation; Casmanni Angelographia; Gill and Ridgely's Bodies of Divinity; Dwight.

ANGELIC DOCTOR. See AQUINAS.

ANGELICS, an ancient sect, supposed by some to have got this appellation from their excessive veneration of angels, and by others from maintaining that the world was created by angels. The name is also denominative of a congregation of nuns, founded at Milan in 1534, who observe the rule of St. Augustine.

ANGELITES, a sect in the reign of the Emperor Anastasius, about the year 494; so called from Angelium, a place in the city of Alexandria, where they held their first meetings. They were called likewise Severites, from Severus, who was the head of their sect; as also Theodosians, from one Theodosius, whom they made pope at Alexandria. They held that the persons of the Trinity are not the same; that none of them exists of himself, and of his own nature; but that there is a common God or Deity existing in them all, and that each is God by a participation of this Deity.

ANGER, a violent passion of the mind, arising upon the receipt, or supposed receipt, of any injury, with a present purpose of revenge. All anger is by no means sinful; it was designed by the Author of our nature for self-defence; nor is it altogether a selfish passion, since it is excited by injuries offered to others as well as ourselves, and sometimes prompts us to reclaim offenders from sin and danger, Eph. iv. 26; but it becomes sinful when conceived upon trivial occasions or inadequate provocations; when it breaks forth into outrageous actions, vents itself in reviling language, or is concealed in our thoughts to the degree of hatred.—Paley's Mor. Phil. ch. 7. vol. i.; Fawcett's excellent Treatise on Anger; Seed's Posth. Sermon. ser. xi.; Jeremy Taylor's Works, vol. iii. p. 33, vol. iv. p. 244, vol. v. p. 69.

ANGER OF GOD, see WRATH.

ANGLO-CALVINISTS, a name given by some writers to the members of the Church of England, as agreeing with the other Calvinists in most points, excepting church government.

ANGLO-SAXON VERSION, see BIBLE VERSE.

ANNALS ECCLESIASTICAL, of Baronius, a work on church history, from the birth of Christ to the year 1198, published at Rome, 1588-1607, in twelve volumes, folio, which was principally composed for the purpose of confuting the Centuries of Magdeburg, and to prove that the doctrines and constitution of the Church had remained the same from the beginning. These annals comprise a rich collection of documents from the papal archives, and are, therefore, of great use to the student of ecclesiastical history; but they contain many false statements and unauthentic documents, and require to be consulted with great caution. The air of sincerity which breathes in them is calculated to give very erroneous ideas of the state of things in the Church of Rome. They were afterwards continued by Raynaldi and Laderchi, and brought down to the year 1761.

ANNATES, a year's income due to the Pope, on the death of any bishop, abbot, or parish priest, to be paid by his successor. The Concordata Germanica, in 1448, restored to the Pope the right of raising the annates, which had been forbidden by the Council of Basle, in 1434. They were made perpetual by Boniface IX. In France, they were finally abolished in 1789. In England, they were first paid to the Archbishop of Canterbury, but afterwards appropriated to the popes. In 1532, the parliament gave them to the crown; but Queen Anne restored them to the Church, by applying them to the augmentation of poor livings.

ANNIHILATION, the act of reducing any created being into nothing. The sentiments of mankind have differed widely as to the possibility and impossibility of annihilation. According to some, nothing is so difficult; it requires the infinite power of God to effect it: according to others, nothing so easy. Existence, say they, is a state of violence; all things are continually endeavouring to return to their primitive nothing: it requires no power at all; it will do it itself; nay, more, it requires an infinite power to prevent it. With respect to human beings, it appears probable from reason, but it is certain from Scripture, that they will not be annihilated, but exist in a future state, Matt. x. 28. Ecc. xii. 7. John v. 24. 1 Thess. v. 10. Matt. xxv. 34, 41. Luke xvi. 22, 28. Luke xx. 37, 38. 1 Cor. xv. See p. 158, &c. vol. i. Massillon's Ser., Eng. Trans.; No. 129, Guardian; Blair's Ser. vol. i. p. 461; and articles DESTRUCTIONISTS, RESURRECTION, SOUL.

ANNUNCIATION, a festival, celebrated on the 25th March, in memory of the annunciation, or tidings, brought by the angel Gabriel to the Virgin Mary, of the incarnation of Christ.

The feast of the annunciation appears to be of very great antiquity. There is mention made of it in a sermon, which goes under the name of Athanasius. Others carry it up to the time of Gregory Thaumaturgus, because there is a sermon likewise attributed to him upon the same subject; but the best critics reject both these writings as spurious. However, it is certain this festival was observed before the time of the Council of Trullo, in which there is a canon forbidding the celebration of all festivals in Lent, excepting the Lord's Day and the feast of the annunciation: so that we may date its original from the seventh century.

On this festival, in the Romish Church, the Pope performs the ceremony of marrying or cloistering a certain number of maidens, who are presented to the Pope in the church Della Minerva, clothed in white serge from head to foot, and so muffled up, that they have scarce room to peep out. An officer stands on one side, having in his hand a basin, wherein are small bags, containing notes of fifty crowns for those who make choice of marriage, and notes of a hundred for those who choose the veil. The latter are distinguished, after their choice, by garlands of white flowers. Misson, who was present at this ceremony, tells us, that of three hundred and fifty maidens, who were presented to the Pope, thirty-two only chose a religious life.

ANOINTING.—In the Catholic Church, the custom of anointing priests is still continued. The ordaining bishop anoints with the holy oil called chrism, the palm of both hands, the thumb, and the forefinger of the person to be ordained; and thus, according to the expression in the ritual of ordination, the hands receive power to bless, to consecrate, and to make holy. If a clergyman is excommunicated, these spots are rubbed off. This custom, like many others, is an impious perversion of the sacred ceremony by which the Jewish priests and kings were inducted into office.

ANOMEANS, the name by which the pure Arians were called in the fourth century, in contradistinction to the Semi-arians. The word is formed from the Greek ἀνομοιος, different. See ARIANS and SEMI-ARIANS.

ANONYMUS GRECUS, a name given to each of the three additional Greek versions of the Old Testament, otherwise known by the names Editio quinta, sexta and septima, which Origen consulted, and inserted in the last three columns of his great work. Their age and authors were unknown.

ANTEDILUVIANS, a general name for all mankind who lived before the flood, including the whole human race from the creation to the deluge. For the history of the Antediluvians, see Book of Genesis, Whiston's Josephus, Cockburn's Treatise on the Deluge, and article DELUGE.

ANTELUCAHI, a name given to the primitive Christians, because, in times of persecution, they frequently held their religious assemblies before daybreak.

ANTHEM, a church song performed in cathedral service by choristers who sung alternately. It was used to denote both psalms and hymns, when performed in this manner; but, at present, anthem is used in a more confined sense, being applied to certain passages taken out of the Scriptures and adapted to a particular solemnity. Anthems were first introduced in the reformed service of the English church, in the beginning of the reign of Queen Elizabeth.

ANTHOLOGIUM. [Gr.] In Latin, Florilegium: the title of a book used in the Greek church, divided into twelve months, containing the offices, sung throughout the whole year, on the festivals of our Saviour, the blessed Virgin, and other remarkable saints. It is in two volumes: the first contains six months, from the first day of September to the last day of February; the second comprehends the other six months. It is observable, from this book, that the Greek church celebrates Easter at the same time with the Church of England, notwithstanding that they differ from us in the lunar style.

ANTHONY, ST., THE ABBOT'S DAY, a festival of the Romish church on the 17th of January. On this day the pope, cardinals, princes, and even private gentlemen, send their horses and mules, together with their harnesses, to be blessed and sprinkled by the fathers of his order. They likewise apply to this saint for the exorcising, and conjuring, and delivering up to the devil, mice, grasshoppers, and other noxious animals.

ANTHONY, ST., OF PADUA'S DAY, a festival in the Romish church, on the 13th of June. Ribadeinara, in his life of this saint, gives us the following relation:—A certain Franciscan novice, throwing off his habit, ran away from the monastery in which the saint lived, and carried away with him a psalm book, written by St. Anthony's own hand. The saint, perceiving his book to be stolen, begged of God to restore it to him. In the meantime the thief, preparing to swim across a river, met the devil, who commanded him to return to the monastery, and restore the book to St. Anthony, threatening to kill him if he refused; which so terrified the young novice, that he immediately complied, and, returning back, gave St. Anthony his book again, and continued in a religious course ever after. Hence St. Anthony is prayed to, in order to recover stolen goods. It is related of him likewise, that, having wearied himself with labour, and being laid down to sleep, the devil set upon him, and took him so fast by the throat, that he almost choked him; but the saint, invoking the Virgin Mary, and beginning to sing the hymn, O gloriosa Domina, his cell was immediately filled with a celestial light, which the devil not being able to endure, immediately departed.

ANTHROPOMORPHISMS, instances in which God is spoken of as having a human form, or as possessing members of the human body, as eyes, ears, &c.

ANTHROPOMORPHITES, a sect of ancient heretics, who taking every thing spoken of God in the Scriptures in a literal sense, particularly that passage in Genesis, in which it is said, "God made man after his own image," maintained that God had a human shape.

ANTHROPOPATHY, a figure, expression, or discourse, whereby some passion is attributed to God which properly belongs only to man. Anthropopathy is frequently used promiscuously with anthropology; yet in strictness they ought to be distinguished as the genus from the species. Anthropology may be understood of any thing human attributed to God, as eyes, hands, &c., but anthropopathy only of human affections and passions, as joy, grief. We have frequent instances of the use of these figures in holy Scripture.

ANTIBAPTISTS, a name which might be supposed to include the Society of Friends, but is restricted to those who maintain, that baptism is merely a proselyting ordinance, and is not to be administered to the descendants, whether infant or adult, of any who have been baptized. Several societies of this sect exist in Ireland. Encyclo. of Religious Knowledge.

ANTIBURGERS, a numerous and respectable body of dissenters from the church of Scotland, who differed from the established church chiefly in matters of church government; and who differed also from the Burgher Seceders, with whom they were originally united, chiefly, if not solely, respecting the lawfulness of taking the burgh oath. For an account of their origin and principles, see SECEDERS, with whom they are again united as one body.

ANTICHRIST, (ἀντί and Χριστός), a name which occurs only in the epistles of John, and may signify either an opponent or adversary of Christ; one who gives himself out to be Christ, a false Messiah; or one who pretends to the authority, and acts as the Vicar of Christ. According to these three interpretations of the word, may be ranged the different views which have been entertained on the subject of the character thus denominated.

1. Those who regard it as denoting a pretender to the Messiahship, are necessarily confined by their interpretation to some noted Jew, who shall, in some remarkable manner, give himself out to be the Messiah. Several such pretenders have appeared at different times, such as Barchocheba, &c.

2. The great body of Protestant interpreters understand the word in the last sense, and apply it to the Pope of Rome, or the ecclesiastical system of the papacy, carried on and sustained under the different popes that have filled the Roman See. With the early fathers, and many of the Romanists themselves, they agree to identify the Antichrist with the man of sin, the little horn of Daniel's fourth beast, and the second beast, or false prophet of the Apocalypse. They thus consider the term to signify that corrupt and unscriptural system of church polity, by which the authority of Christ has been compromised by men professedly his servants, and acting according to his will, having set aside his mandates, to give place to the doctrines and commandments of men; but they have improperly confined themselves in the view they have taken of it to the church of Rome; it being notorious that the corruptions and antichristian institutions of the Eastern church fall little short of those which have obtained in the Western, while in the different establishments which exist under the name of Protestantism, the same system of substitution in regard to human authority, and religious rites and ordinances, prevails according to the utmost extent that the circumstances of each particular community will admit.

3. Several writers maintain that Antichrist is to be taken in the sense which indicates direct and positive hostility; and accordingly some have found him in Nero, some in Caligula, some in Simon Magus, while others look for him in a wicked infidel power, which is yet to appear and attempt the complete annihilation of the cause and name of Christ. There have not been wanting those who regard this great enemy to be Satan himself incarnate! The grand characteristic of him who is pre-eminently the Antichrist, is his denying the Father and the Son; a mark, it is maintained, which cannot apply to the popes, for they confess both, and must therefore indicate an individual, or a combination of individuals, who shall reject the doctrine of the Trinity, and with it all the peculiar and distinguishing tenets of Christianity. This view is taken by Faber, who identifies him with the infidel king, Daniel xi., by whom he understands a whole kingdom or community of infidels; and the "Spirit of Antichrist," mentioned by the apostle, he holds to be the principles of unbelief by which that kingdom or community is animated.

ANTIDORON, a name given by the Greeks to the consecrated bread; out of which the middle part, marked with the cross, wherein the consecration resides, being taken away by the priest, the remainder is distributed after mass to the poor.

ANTINOMIANS, those who maintain that the law is of no use or obligation under the gospel dispensation, or who hold doctrines that clearly supersede the necessity of good works. The Antinomians took their origin from John Agricola, about the year 1538, who taught that the law is no way necessary under the gospel; that good works do not promote our salvation, nor ill ones hinder it; that repentance is not to be preached from the decalogue, but only from the gospel. This sect sprang up in England during the protectorate of Cromwell, and extended their system of libertinism much farther than Agricola did. Some of them, it is said, maintained, that if they should commit any kind of sin, it would do them no hurt, nor in the least affect their eternal state; and that it is one of the distinguishing characters of the elect, that they cannot do any thing displeasing to God. It is necessary, however, to observe here, and candour obliges us to confess, that there have been others who have been styled Antinomians, who cannot, strictly speaking, be ranked with these men: nevertheless, the unguarded expressions they have advanced, the bold positions they have laid down, and the double construction which might so easily be put upon many of their sentences, have led some to charge them with Antinomian principles. For instance, when they have asserted justification to be eternal, without distinguishing between the secret determination of God in eternity, and the execution of it in time; when they have spoken lightly of good works, or asserted that believers have nothing to do with the law of God, without fully explaining what they meant; when they assert that God is not angry with his people for their sins, nor in any sense punishes them for them, without distinguishing between fatherly corrections and vindictive punishment: these things, whatever be the private sentiments of those who advance them, have a tendency to injure the minds of many. It has been alleged, that the principal thing they have had in view, was to counteract those legal doctrines which have so much abounded among the self-righteous; but granting this to be true, there is no occasion to run from one extreme to another. Had many of those writers proceeded with more caution, been less dogmatical, more explicit in the explanation of their sentiments, and possessed more candour towards those who differed from them, they would have been more serviceable to the cause of truth and religion. Some of the chief of those who have been charged as favouring the above sentiments, are: Crisp, Richardson, Saltmarsh, Hussey, Eaton, Town, &c. These have been answered by Gataker, Sedgwick, Witsius, Bull, Williams, Ridgeley, Beart, De Fleury, &c. See also Bellamy's Letters and Dialogues between Theron, Paulinus, and Aspasio; with his Essay on the Nature and Glory of the Gospel; Edwards' Crispianism Unmasked.

ANTINOMIANISM is strictly enmity to the divine law, hatred of its purity, opposition to its justice, or suspicion of its benevolence. Though, as put in this naked form, it is probable there is scarcely, under the profession of religion, a single Antinomian in the world; and the sanity of that individual would be justly questionable who should maintain principles so incompatible with the common sense of mankind, and so obviously subversive of the moral order of the universe; it is nevertheless an undoubted fact, that many persons have adopted views of the religion of Christ which virtually imply a renunciation of regard to the divine law, and tend to the entire subversion of its authority. If in their own practice there is not a violation of its precepts, they are careful it should be understood that their conduct is not indebted to the law for regulation or purity, and that they deny its claims to any authority over them. They assert the freedom of believers in Christ from the canon as well as from the curse of the law; and that if they do what is required, it is not because it is there enjoined, or because there is any danger of its penalty, but because grace secures provision for holiness, and makes the believer complete in Christ.

These views are alleged to be essential to the glory of the gospel, to exalt the grace of Christ, and to be indispensably necessary to Christian peace and comfort. Other sentiments are proscribed as legal, or anti-evangelical, expressive of low views of the Saviour, indicative of a state of bondage and servility of spirit, and inconsistent with Christian confidence and liberty. The parties are thus at issue on first principles. They occupy no common ground. The Scriptures are in vain appealed to, a large portion of them being virtually abrogated, and a system of interpretation adopted, which sets at defiance all rules, and is destructive of all enlightened deductions.

High Calvinism, or Antinomianism, absolutely withers and destroys the consciousness of human responsibility. It confounds moral with natural impotency, forgetting that the former is a crime, the latter only a misfortune; and thus treats the man dead in trespasses and sins, as if he were already in his grave. It prophesies smooth things to the sinner going on in his transgressions, and soothes to slumber and the repose of death the souls of such as are at ease in Zion. It assumes that, because men can neither believe, repent, nor pray acceptably, unless aided by the grace of God, it is useless to call upon them to do so. It maintains that the gospel is only intended for elect sinners, and therefore it ought to be preached to none but such. In defiance, therefore, of the command of God, it refuses to preach the glad tidings of mercy to every sinner. In opposition to Scripture, and to every rational consideration, it contends that it is not man's duty to believe the truth of God—justifying the obvious inference, that it is not a sin to reject it. In short, its whole tendency is to produce an impression on the sinner's mind, that if he is not saved, it is not his fault, but God's; that if he is condemned, it is more for the glory of the Divine Sovereignty, than as the punishment of his guilt.

So far from regarding the moral cure of human nature as the great object and design of the gospel, Antinomianism does not take it in at all, but as it exists in Christ, and becomes ours by a figure of speech. It regards the grace and the pardon as every thing—the spiritual design or effect as nothing. Hence its opposition to progressive, and its zeal for imputed sanctification: the former is intelligible and tangible, but the latter a mere figment of the imagination. Hence its delight in exulting on the eternity of the divine decrees, which it does not understand, but which serve to amuse and to deceive; and its dislike to all the sober realities of God's present dealings and commands. It exults in the contemplation of a Christ who is a kind of concretion of all the moral attributes of his people; to the overlooking of that Christ who is the Head of all that in heaven and on earth bear his likeness, and while unconscious of possessing it. It boasts in the doctrine of the perseverance of the saints, while it believes in no saint but one, that is Jesus, and neglects to persevere.—Orme's Life of Baxter, vol. ii. p. 311.

ANTI-PÆDOBAPTISTS (from ἀντί "against," and παιδοῦς, "child," and βαπτίζω, "baptize,") is a distinguishing denomination given to those who object to the baptism of infants. See BAPTISM.

Antipædobaptists hold that believing adults only are proper subjects, because Christ's commission to baptize appears to them to restrict this ordinance to such only as are taught, or made disciples; and that, consequently, infants, who cannot be thus taught, are to be excluded. It does not appear, say they, that the apostles, in executing Christ's commission, ever baptized any but those who were first instructed in the Christian faith, and professed their belief of it. They contend that infants can receive no benefit from it, and are not capable of faith and repentance, which are to be considered as pre-requisites.

As to the mode.

They observe, that the meaning of the word βαπτίζω signifies immersion or dipping only; that John baptized in Jordan; that he chose a place where there was much water; that Jesus came up out of the water; that Philip and the eunuch went down both into the water; that the terms washing, purifying, burying in baptism, so often mentioned in Scripture, allude to this mode; that immersion only was the practice of the apostles and the first Christians; and that it was only laid aside from the love of novelty, and the coldness of our climate. These positions, they think, are so clear from Scripture, and the history of the church, that they stand in need of but little argument to support them. Further, they also insist that all positive institutions depend entirely upon the will and declaration of the institutor, and that, therefore, reasoning by analogy from previous abrogated rites, is to be rejected, and the express command of Christ respecting baptism ought to be our rule.

Although there were several among the Albigenses, Waldenses, and the followers of Wickliffe, it does not appear that they were formed into any stability until the time of Menno, about the year 1536. See ANABAPTISTS and MENNONITES. About 1644, they began to make a considerable figure in England, and spread themselves into several separate congregations. They separated from the Independents about the year 1638, and set up for themselves under the pastoral care of Mr. Jesse; and, having renounced their former baptism, they sent over one of their number to be immersed by one of the Dutch Anabaptists of Amsterdam, that he might be qualified to baptize his friends in England after the same manner.

They subside under two denominations, viz. the Particular or Calvinistic, and the General or Arminian. Their modes of church government and worship are the same as the Independents; in the exercise of which they are protected, in common with other dissenters, by the act of toleration. Some of both denominations allow of mixed communion; by which it is understood that those who have not been baptized by immersion, on the profession of their faith, may sit down at the Lord's table with those who have been thus baptized. Others, however, disallow it, supposing that such have not been actually baptized at all. See FREE COMMUNION.

Some of them observe the seventh day of the week as the Sabbath, apprehending the law that enjoined it not to have been repealed by Christ.

Some of the General Baptists have gone into Socinianism or Arianism; on account of which, several of their ministers and churches, who disapprove of those principles, have, within the last forty years, formed themselves into a distinct connexion, called the New Association. The churches in this union keep up a friendly acquaintance, in some outward things, with those from whom they have separated; but in things more essential, disclaim any connexion with them, particularly as to changing ministers, and the admission of members. The General Baptists have, in some of their churches, three distinct orders separately ordained, viz.:—messengers, elders, and deacons. Their general assembly is held annually in Worship-street, London, on the Tuesday in the Whitsun week.

They have two exhibitions for students to be educated at one of the universities of Scotland, given them by Dr. Ward, of Gresham College. There is likewise an academy at Bristol for students, generally known by the name of the Bristol Education Society. The Baptists in America, and in the East and West Indies, are chiefly Calvinists, and hold occasional fellowship with the Particular Baptist churches in England. Those in Scotland, having imbibed a considerable part of the principles of Messrs. Glass and Sandeman, have no communion with the other. They have liberally contributed, however, towards the translation of the Scriptures into the Bengalee language, which some of the Baptist brethren have executed in the East. See Rippon's Baptist Register, vol. i. p. 172-175; Adam's View of Religions, article Baptists; Evans' Sketch of Religious Denominations; Gill, Gale, Robinson, Stennet, and Booth, on Baptism.

ANTIPHONY, alternate singing, as when a congregation, divided into two parts, repeats or sings a psalm or anthem, verse for verse, one after the other. It is opposed to symphony, which is singing jointly, or all together. St. Austin carries the original of this way of singing, in the western church, no higher than the time of St. Ambrose, when it was first introduced into the church of Milan, which example was soon followed by the other western churches. What was the original of it in the eastern church, is not so certainly agreed upon by writers either ancient or modern. It was a method of singing so taking and delightful, that it was often used when only two or three were met together for private devotion: and Socrates particularly remarks of the emperor Theodosius the younger, and his sisters, that they sung alternate hymns together, every morning in the royal palace. See PSALMODY.

ANTIPODES, those who at different periods

have produced a schism in the Roman church by opposing the pope, under the pretence that they were themselves popes. This is the catholic explanation, because it is evident the Roman church cannot admit that there ever existed two popes; but the fact is, that in many cases both competitors for the papal chair (sometimes there have been even three) were equally antipopes,—that is to say, their claims were equally good. Each was frequently supported by whole nations, and the schism was nothing but the struggle of political interests, which induced particular governments to support a pope against the pope supported by other governments. These quarrels always greatly lessened the belief in the pope's sanctity and infallibility, shook the whole fabric of the church, and contributed much to pave the way for the great reformation. Amadeus VIII., duke of Savoy, was the last Antipope. He was elected by the council of Basle in 1439, in opposition to Eugene IV. and Nicholas V., but he renounced his title in favour of the latter in 1449.

ANTIQUITIES, a term implying all testimonies or authentic accounts that have come down to us of ancient nations. As the study of antiquity may be useful both to the inquiring Christian as well as to those who are employed in or are candidates for the gospel ministry, we shall here subjoin a list of those which are esteemed the most valuable.—Fabricii Bibliographia Antiquaria; *Spencer de Legibus Heb. ANTISABBATARIANS, a modern religious sect, who deny the necessity of observing the Sabbath day. Their chief arguments are,—1. That the Jewish Sabbath was only of ceremonial, not of moral obligation; and consequently, is abolished by the coming of Christ. 2. That no other Sabbath was appointed to be observed by Christ or his apostles. 3. That there is not a word of Sabbath breaking in all the New Testament. 4. That no command was given to Adam or Noah to keep any Sabbath. And, 5. That, therefore, although Christians are commanded "not to forsake the assembling of themselves together," they ought not to hold one day more holy than another. See article SABBATH.

ANTISUPERNATURALISTS. See SUPERNATURALISTS.

ANTITACTÆ, a branch of Gnostics, who held that God was good and just, but that a creature had created evil; and, consequently, that it is our duty to oppose this author of evil, in order to avenge God of his adversary.

ANTITHESIS. See HEBREW POETRY.

ANTITRINITARIANS, those who deny the Trinity, and teach that there are not three persons in the Godhead.—See TRINITY.

ANTITYPE, a Greek word, properly signifying a type or figure corresponding to some other type.

The word antitype occurs twice in the New Testament, viz. in the Epistle to the Hebrews, chap. ix. 24; and in the 1 Epistle of Peter, chap. iii. 21, where its genuine import has been much controverted. The former says, that Christ is not entered into the holy places made with hands, which are antitypa, the figures or antitypes of the true—now to appear in the presence of God. Now, τυπος signifies the pattern by which another thing is made; and as Moses was obliged to make the tabernacle, and all things in it, according to the pattern shown him in the Mount, the tabernacle so formed was the antitype of what was shown to Moses; anything, therefore, formed according to a model or pattern, is an antitype. In the latter passage, the apostle, speaking of Noah's flood, and the deliverance only of eight persons in the ark from it, says, ὡς καὶ ἡμεῖς ἀντιτύπον τῆς σωτῆς βαπτίσμα: Baptism being an antitype to that, now saves us; not the putting away of the filth of the flesh, but the answer of a good conscience towards God, &c. The meaning is, that righteousness, or the answer of a good conscience towards God, now saves us, by means of the resurrection of Christ, as formerly righteousness saved these eight persons by means of the ark during the flood. The word antitype, therefore, here signifies a general similitude of circumstances; and the particle ω, whereunto, refers not to the immediate antecedent ὕδατος, water, but to all that precedes.

ANTOSIANDRIANS, a sect of rigid Lutherans, who opposed the doctrine of Oslander relating to justification. These are otherwise denominated Osiandromastiges. The Antosiadrians deny that man is made just, with that justice wherewith God himself is just; that is, they assert that he is not made essentially, but only imputatively just; or that he is not really made just, but only pronounced so.

ANTWERP POLYGLOTT. See BIBLE, POLYGLOTT, No. 3.

ΑΠΑΞ AEFOMENON, hapax legomenon, any word or phrase that occurs but once in the Bible or any other book.

APELLEANS, so called from Apelles, in the second century. They affirmed that Christ, when he came down from heaven, received a body not from the substance of his mother, but from the four elements, which at his death he rendered back to the world, and so ascended into heaven without a body.

APHTHARTODOCITES, a denomination in the sixth century, so called from the Greek αφθαρτος, incorruptible, and δοκεω, to judge, because they held that the body of Jesus Christ was incorruptible, and not subject to death. They were a branch of the Euty-chians.

APOCARITEÆ, a denomination, in the third century, which sprang from the Manicheans. They held that the soul of man was of the substance of God.

APOCRISIARII, a description of papal agents who rose into notice during the pontificate of Gregory, and who acted as envoys or legates at the court and see of Constantinople.

APOCRYPHA signifies concealed, obscure, without authority. In reference to the Bible, it is employed to designate such books as claim a place in the sacred volume, but which are not canonical; it is said to have been first used by Melito, Bishop of Sardis.

An inquiry into this subject cannot be uninteresting to the friends of the Bible, for it behoves them to ascertain, on the best evidence, what books belong to the sacred volume, and also on what grounds other books are rejected from the canon. This subject assumes a higher importance from the fact, that Christians are much divided on this point, for some receive, as of canonical authority, books which others reject as spurious, or consider merely as human compositions. On such a point every Christian should form his opinion upon the best information which he can obtain.

In controversy with the Romanists, this subject meets us at the very threshold. It is vain to dispute about particular doctrines of Scripture, until it is determined what books are to be received as Scripture.

It has also been recently found that this was a point of great importance in the circulation of the Bible. This book ought not to be distributed, maimed of some of its parts; nor should we circulate mere human compositions for the Word of God. The committee of the British and Foreign Bible Society were recently called upon to decide this question in a case of great practical importance. The whole subject was referred to a select and learned sub-committee, who, after mature deliberation, brought in a report, which was adopted, and led to the following wise resolution in the general committee: viz. "That the funds of the society be applied to the printing and circulation of the canonical books of Scripture, to the exclusion of those books, and parts of books, which are termed apocryphal; and that all copies printed, either entirely or in part, at the expense of the society, and whether such copies consist of the whole or of any one or more of such books, be invariably issued bound, no other book whatever being bound with them; and further, that all money grants to societies or individuals be made only in conformity to the principle of this regulation.

"In the sacred volume, as it is to be hereafter distributed by the society, there is to be nothing but divine truth, nothing but what is acknowledged by all Christians to be such. Of course, all may unite in the work of distribution, even should they regard the volume as containing but part of the inspired writings; just as they might, in the circulation of the Pentateuch, or the Book of Psalms, or the Prophets, or the New Testament. Such harmonious operation would not, however be possible, if the books of the Apocrypha were mingled or joined with the rest; and, besides, those who have the strongest objection to the Apocrypha are, ordinarily, those who are most forward in active and liberal efforts to send the Word of God to all people."

This judicious decision of the committee of the British and Foreign Bible Society depends for its correctness on the supposition that the books of the Apocrypha are not canonical; for whatever may be said about circulating a part of the Bible, it was undoubtedly the original object of this society to print and circulate the whole of the sacred volume. Hence appears the practical importance of the inquiry which we have here instituted, to ascertain whether these books have any claim whatever to a place in the sacred canon.

At a very early period of the Christian church, great pains were taken to distinguish between such books as were inspired and canonical, and such as were written by uninspired men. It has never been doubted among Christians that the canonical books only were of divine authority, and furnished an infallible rule of faith and practice; but it has not been agreed what books ought to be considered canonical and what apocryphal. In regard to those which have already been enumerated as belonging to the Old Testament, there is a pretty general consent of Jews and Christians, of Romanists and Protestants; but in regard to some other books there is a wide difference of opinion.

The Council of Trent, in their fourth session, gave a catalogue of the books of the Old Testament, among which are included, Tobias, Judith, Wisdom, Ecclesiasticus, Baruch, and Two books of the Maccabees. Besides, they included, under the name of Esther and Daniel, certain additional chapters which are not found in the Hebrew copies. The book of Esther is made to consist of sixteen chapters; and prefixed to the book of Daniel is the History of Susannah; the Song of the Three Children is inserted in the third chapter; and the History of Bel and the Dragon is added at the end of this book. Other books, which are found in the Greek or Latin Bibles, they rejected, as apocryphal,—as the third and fourth books of Esdras, the third book of Maccabees, the Hundred and Fifty-first Psalm, the Appendix to Job, and the Preface to the Lamentations.

Both these classes of books all denominations of Protestants consider apocryphal; but as the English church, in her Liturgy, directs that certain lessons shall be read from the former for the instruction of the people, but not for confirmation of doctrine, they are retained in the larger copies of the English Bible, but are not mingled with the canonical books, as in the Vulgate, but placed at the end of the Old Testament, under the title of Apocrypha. It is certainly to be regretted that these books are permitted to be included in the same volume which contains the lively oracles,—the Word of God,—the Holy Scriptures; all of which are given by inspiration: but more to be regretted still, that they should be read in the church, promiscuously with the lessons taken from the canonical books; especially as no notice is given to the people that what is read from these books is apocryphal; and as in the Prayer-book of the Episcopal church the tables which refer to the lessons to be read have this title prefixed,—"Tables of lessons of Holy Scripture to be read at Morning and Evening Prayer throughout the year." Now, however good and instructive these apocryphal lessons may be, it never can be justified that they should thus be put on a level with the Word of God.

But it is our object, at present, to show that none of these books, canonized by the Council of Trent, and inserted in our larger English Bibles, are canonical.

1. The first argument by which it may be proved that these books do not belong to the canon of the Old Testament, is, that they are not found in the Hebrew Bible. They are not written in the Hebrew language, but in the Greek, which was not known to the Jews until long after inspiration had ceased, and the canon of the Old Testament was closed. It is rendered probable, indeed, that some of them were written originally in the Chaldaic; Jerome testifies this to be the fact in regard to 1st Maccabees, and Ecclesiasticus; and he says, that he translated the book of Tobit out of Chaldee into Latin; but this book is now found in the Greek, and there is good reason for believing that it was written originally in this language. It is certain, however, that none of these books were composed in the pure Hebrew of the Old Testament.

Hottinger, indeed, informs us, that he had seen the whole of the Apocrypha in pure Hebrew, among the Jews; but he entertains no doubt that it was translated into that language in modern times,—just as the whole New Testament has recently been translated into pure Hebrew.

It is the common opinion of the Jews and of the Christian Fathers, that Malachi was the last of the Old Testament prophets. Books written by certain authors afterwards, have no claim to be reckoned canonical; and there is good reason for believing that those books were written long after the time of Ezra and Malachi; and some of them, perhaps, later than the commencement of the Christian era.

2. These books, though probably written by Jews, have never been received into the canon by that people. In this, the ancient and modern Jews are of the same mind. Josephus declares, "That no more than twenty-two books were received as inspired by his nation." Philo, who refers often to the Old Testament in his writings, never makes the least mention of them; nor are they recognised in the Talmud as canonical. Not only so, but the Jewish Rabbies expressly reject them.

The Jews, in the time of Jerome, entertained no other opinion of these books than those who came after them; for, in his Preface to Daniel, he informs us, "That he had heard one of the Jewish doctors deriding the history of Susanna, who said, 'it was invented by some Greek, he knew not whom.'"

The same is the opinion of the Jews respecting the other books which we call apocryphal, as is manifest from all the copies of the Hebrew Bible extant; for, undoubtedly, if they believed that any of these books were canonical, they would give them a place in their sacred volume. But will any ask, what is the opinion of the Jews to us? I answer, much on this point. The oracles of God were committed to them; and they preserved them with a religious care until the advent of the Messiah. Christ never censures them for adding to the sacred scriptures, nor detracting from them. Since their nation has been in dispersion, copies of the Old Testament, in Hebrew, have been scattered all over the world, so that it was impossible to produce a universal alteration in the canon. But it is needless to argue this point, for it is agreed by all that these books never were received by the Jewish nation.

3. The third argument against the canonical authority of these books, is derived from the total silence respecting them in the New Testament. They are never quoted by Christ and his apostles. This fact, however, is disputed by the Romanists, and they even attempt to establish their right to a place in the canon, from the citations which they pretend have been made from these books by the apostles. They refer to Rom. xi. and Heb. xi., where they allege that Paul has cited passages from the Book of Wisdom: "For who hath known the mind of the Lord, or who hath been his counsellor?"—"For before his translation he had this testimony, that he pleased God." But both these passages are taken directly from the canonical books of the Old Testament. The first is nearly in the words of Isaiah; and the last from the book of Genesis: their other examples are as wide of the mark as these, and need not be set down.

4. The fourth argument is, that these books were not received as canonical by the Christian Fathers, but were expressly declared to be apocryphal.

This is proved from passages in the writings of Justin Martyr, Origen, Athanasius, Hilary, Gregory Nazianzen, Jerome, Epiphanius, Cyril of Jerusalem, Eusebius, Philastrius Chrysostom, Rufin, Gregory the First, Augustine, Innocent the First, Anastasius, Leontius, Gregory, who lived at the beginning of the seventh century, Isidore, John Damascene, &c.

5. A fifth argument to disprove the canonical authority of these books, is derived from internal evidence. Books which contain manifest falsehoods, or which abound in silly and ridiculous stories, or contradict the plain and uniform doctrine of acknowledged scripture, cannot be canonical. Now, the books in dispute are all, or most of them, condemned by this rule.

6. Finally, it is manifest that these books were not inspired, and therefore not canonical, because they were not written by prophets, but by men who speak of their labours in a way wholly incompatible with inspiration.

The Popish writers, to evade the force of the arguments of their adversaries, pretend that there was a twofold canon: that some of the books of scripture are protocanonical, and others deuterocanonical. If by this distinction they only meant that the word canon was often used by the fathers with great latitude, so as to include all books that were ever read in the churches, or that were contained in the volume of the Greek Bible, the distinction is correct, and signifies the same, as is often expressed, by calling some books sacred and canonical, and others ecclesiastical. But these writers make it manifest, that they mean much more than this. They wish to put their deuterocanonical books on a level with the old Jewish canon; and this distinction is intended to teach, that after the first canon was constituted, other books were, from time to time, added; but when these books thus annexed to the canon have been pronounced upon by the competent authority, they are to be received as of equal authority with the former. When this second canon was constituted, is a matter concerning which they are not agreed; some pretend that in the time of Shammai and Hillel, two famous rabbies, who lived before the advent of the Saviour, these books were added to the canon.

But why then are they not included in the Hebrew canon? Why does Josephus never mention them? Why are they never quoted or alluded to in the New Testament? And why did all the earlier fathers omit to cite them, or expressly reject them? The difficulties of this theory being too prominent, the most of the advocates of the Apocrypha suppose that these books, after having remained in doubt before, were received by the supreme authority of the church, in the fourth century. They allege that these books were sanctioned by the council of Carthage, which met A.D. 397. But the story of the method pursued by the council of Nice, to distinguish between canonical and spurious books, is fabulous and ridiculous. There is nothing in the canons of that council relative to these books; and certainly they cited no authorities from them in confirmation of the doctrines established by them. And as to the third council of Carthage, it may be asked, what authority had this provincial synod to determine any thing for the whole church, respecting the canon? But there is no certainty that this council did determine any thing on the subject; for in the same canon there is mention made of Pope Boniface, as living at that time, whereas he did not rise to this dignity until more than twenty years afterwards, in which time three other popes occupied the see of Rome; so that this canon could not have been formed by the third council of Carthage. And in some copies it is inserted as the fourteenth of the seventh council of Carthage. However this may be, we may be confident that no council of the fourth century had any authority to add to the canon of scripture, books which were not only not received before, but explicitly rejected as apocryphal, by most of the fathers. Our opponents say, that these books were uncertain before, but now received confirmation. How could there be any uncertainty in regard to these books, if the church was as infallible in the first three ages as in the fourth? These books were either canonical before the fourth century, or they were not; if the former, how came it to pass they were not recognised by the apostles? How came they to be overlooked and rejected by the primitive fathers? But if they were not canonical before, they must have been made canonical by the decree of some council. That is, the church can make that an inspired book which was never given by inspiration. This absurdity deserves mention, because, however unreasonable it may be, it forms the true, and almost the only ground, on which the doctrine of the Romish Church, in regard to these apocryphal books, rests. This is, indeed, a part of the Pope's supremacy. Some of their best writers, however, deny this doctrine; and whatever others may pretend, it is most certain that the fathers, with one consent, believed that the canon of sacred scripture was complete in their time: they never dreamt of books, not then canonical, becoming such by any authority upon earth. Indeed, the idea of adding to the canon what did not from the beginning belong to it, never seems to have entered the mind of any person in former times. If this doctrine were correct, we might still have additions made to the canon, and that too of books which have existed for hundreds of years.

This question may be brought to a speedy issue with all unprejudiced judges. These books were either written by divine inspiration for the guidance of the church in matters of faith and practice, or they were not; if the former, they always had a right to a place in the canon; if the latter, no act of a pope or council could render that divine which was not so before. It would be to change the nature of a fact, than which nothing is more impossible.

It is alleged, with much confidence, that the Greek Bibles used by the fathers contained these books; and therefore, whenever they give their testimony to the sacred scriptures, these are included. This argument proves too much, for the third book of Esdras, and the Prayer of Manasses, were contained in these volumes, but these are rejected by the Romanists. The truth however is, that these books were not originally connected with the Septuagint; they were probably introduced into some of the latter Greek versions, which were made by heretics. These versions, particularly that of Theodotion, came to be used promiscuously with that of the Septuagint; and to this day the common copies contain the version of the book of Daniel, by Theodotion, instead of that by the Seventy.

By some such means these apocryphal books crept into the Greek Bible; but the early fathers were careful to distinguish between them and the canonical scriptures, as we have already seen.

That they were read in the churches is also true; but not as scripture; not for the confirmation of doctrine; but for the edification of the common people.

Some of the fathers, it is true; cited them as authority, but very seldom; and the reason which rendered it difficult for them to distinguish accurately between ecclesiastical and canonical books, has already been given. These pious men were generally unacquainted with Hebrew literature, and finding all these books in Greek, and frequently bound up in the same volume as the canonical scriptures, and observing that they contained excellent rules for the direction of life and the regulation of morals, they sometimes referred to them, and cited passages from them, and permitted them to be read in the church for the instruction and edification of the people.

But the more learned of the fathers, who examined into the authority of the sacred books with unceasing diligence, clearly marked the distinction between such books as were canonical, and such as were merely human compositions. And some of them even disapproved of the reading of these apocryphal books by the people; and some councils warned the churches against them. It was with this single view that so many catalogues of the canonical books were prepared and published.

Notwithstanding that we have taken so much pains to show that the books called Apocrypha are not canonical, we wish to avoid the opposite extreme of regarding them as useless or injurious. Some of these books are important for the historical information they contain; and especially as the facts recorded in them are, in some instances, the fulfilment of remarkable prophecies.

Others of them are replete with sacred, moral, and prudential maxims, very useful to aid in the regulation of life and manners; but even with these, are interspersed sentiments, which are not perfectly accordant with the Word of God. In short, these books are of very different value, but in the best of them there is so much error and imperfection, as to convince us that they are human productions, and should be used as such; not as an infallible rule, but as useful helps in the attainment of knowledge, and in the practice of virtue. Therefore, when we would exclude them from a place in the Bible, we would not proscribe them as unfit to read, but we would have them published in a separate volume, and studied much more carefully than they commonly have been.

And while we would dissent from the practice of reading lessons from these books, as scriptural lessons are read in the church, we would cordially recommend the frequent perusal, in private, of the first of Maccabees, the Wisdom of Solomon, and above all, Ecclesiasticus.

It is a dishonour to God, and a disparagement of his Word, to place other books, in any respect, on a level with the Divine Oracles; but it is a privilege to be permitted to have access to the writings of men eminent for their wisdom and piety. And it is also a matter of curious instruction to learn what were the opinions of men in ages long past, and in countries far remote.—Alexander on the Canon, and Henderson on Inspiration, Lect. ix. p. 489.

Besides the Apocryphal books attached to the Old Testament, there is also a considerable number of spurious works, pretending to belong to the Nov. Test. They have been collected by Fabricius, in his Codex Apocryphus New Testament. Of these, forty are apocryphal gospels, a considerable number of acts and epistles, including the supposititious correspondence between Paul and Seneca; and twelve spurious Revelations.

APOLLINARIANS, heretics, who maintained that the Logos holds in Christ the place of the rational soul, and consequently, that in him God was united with the human body and the sensitive soul. Apollinaris, the author of this opinion, was from A.D. 362, to at least 382, bishop of Laodicea, Syria, and a zealous opposer of the Arians. As a man and a scholar he was highly esteemed, and was among the most popular authors of his time. When the Emperor Julian forbade Christians the use of schools and the study of the Greek classics, Apollinaris, with his father of the same name, a teacher of languages, and a presbyter, composed imitations of them, for the use of the Christians: for instance, heroic poems and tragedies, from the historical matter of the Old Testament, and dialogues, in imitation of Plato's, from portions of the New. None of these works are now extant.

The doctrine of Apollinaris was first broached in the year 371, and has since been condemned as heretical by various councils since A.D. 375; among others, by the Ecumenical Council of Constantinople in 381. Apollinaris, however, formed a congregation of his adherents at Antioch, and made Vitalis their bishop. The Apollinarians or Vitalians, as their followers are called, soon spread their sentiments in Syria and the neighbouring countries, established several societies, over which he appointed bishops, and founded one even in Constantinople itself; but after the death of their leader, between the years 382 and 392, they separated into two parties, one adhering to the doctrine of Apollinaris, and the other, the Polemians, asserting that God and the body of Christ became one substance, and consequently paying divine honours to the human nature; for which reason they were called Sarcotatra, and because they admitted the union of both natures in Christ, Synousians. They were forbidden, by imperial edicts in 388 and 397, to hold religious assemblies, and in 428, to have pastors, or dwell in cities. They were never numerous, and afterwards disappeared, partly among the orthodox, and partly among the Monothelites.

APOLOGY, a defence of any person or thing that is accused. The word, which was used in this sense by the profane Greek writers, passed over to Christian authors, who having before been orators or philosophers, borrowed it as a technical term for the courts of justice. They gave the name of apologies to the writings which were designed to defend Christianity against the attacks and accusations of its enemies, particularly the Pagan philosophers, and to justify its professors before the emperors. Of this description were those of Justin Martyr, Athenagoras, Tertullian, Tatian, and others which were lost, written by Quadratus, Aristides, Melito, Miltiades, and Theophilus. To these might be added several works of Origen, Clement of Alexandria, and Eusebius; and among the Latins, those of Lactantius, Arnobius, Minucius Felix, and Augustine, though they are published under another title. In modern times, we have Watson's Apologies for the Bible, Christianity, &c.; and the defence of particular sects, as Barclay's Apology for the Quakers.

APOSTASY, a forsaking or renouncing our religion, either by an open declaration in words, or a virtual declaration of it by our actions. The primitive Christian church distinguished several kinds of apostasy; the first of those who went entirely from Christianity to Judaism; the second, of those who complied so far with the Jews, as to communicate with them in many of their unlawful practices, without making a formal profession of their religion; thirdly, of those who mingled Judaism and Christianity together; and fourthly, of those who voluntarily relapsed into paganism. Apostasy may be further considered as, 1. Original, in which we have all participated, Rom. iii. 23;—2. National, when a kingdom relinquishes the profession of Christianity;—3. Personal, when an individual backslides from God, Heb. x. 38;—4. Final, when men are given up to judicial hardness of heart, as Judas. See BACKSLIDING, and Owen on Apostasy.

APOSTATE, one who openly abandons the true religion. The term is, in church history, applied by way of eminence to the Emperor Julian, who though he had only been nominally a Christian, when he came to the throne, fairly renounced the Christian religion, and did every thing in his power to re-establish paganism in the empire. Severe penal laws were anciently in force against apostates; and even by the statutes 9 and 10 of William III. c. 32, any person educated in, or having made profession of the Christian religion, who shall deny it to be true, shall be rendered incapable of holding any office, for the first offence; and for the second, shall be made incapable of bringing any action, of being guardian, executor, legatee, or purchaser of lands, and shall suffer three years' imprisonment without bail. The punishment of the first offence, however, is remissible on the delinquent's publicly renouncing his error in open court, within four months after conviction.

APOSTLE, properly signifies a messenger or person sent by another upon some business. It is particularly applied to those whom our Saviour commissioned to found his religion in the world. It was essential to their office: 1. That they should personally have seen the Son of God, John xv. 12; Acts i. 21, 22. 1 Cor. ix. 1; xv. 8. 2. That they should have been immediately called and chosen by Christ himself, Luke vi. 13. Acts ix. 6; xxiv. 16—18. Gal. i. 1. 3. That they should have been divinely inspired, so as to be secured against all mistakes in teaching divine truth, and fully instructed in the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven, John xvi. 13. 1 Cor. xiv. 37. 1 Thess. ii. 13. 4. That they should have the power of working miracles in attestation of their commission, and of the truth of their doctrine. Their charge was universal, and not restricted, like that of bishops or pastors, to any particular church. They had no successors in office.—2. The appellation was also given to the ordinary travelling ministers of the church, Rom. xvi. 7. Phil. ii. 25; though in our translation the last is rendered messenger.—3. Apostle, in the Greek liturgy, is used for a book containing the epistles of St. Paul, printed in the order wherein they are to be read in churches through the course of the year.—4. It is likewise given to those persons who first planted the Christian faith in any place. Thus Dionysius of Corinth is called the Apostle of France, Xavier the Apostle of the Indies, &c.

APOSTLES' CREED. A formula, or summary, of the Christian faith, drawn up, according to Rufinus, by the apostles themselves; who, during their stay at Jerusalem, soon after our Lord's ascension, agreed upon this Creed, as a rule of faith, and as a word of distinction, by which they were to know friends from foes. Baronius, and some other authors, conjecture that they did not compose it till the second year of the reign of Claudius, a little before their dispersion. As to their manner of composing it, some fancy that each apostle pronounced his article, which is the reason of its being called Symbolum Apostolicum, it being made up of sentences jointly contributed after the manner of persons paying each their club, (symbolum,) or share of a reckoning.

But there is no reason to induce us to believe that the apostles ever composed any such creed. For first, neither Luke, in the Acts, nor any ecclesiastical writer before the fifth century, makes any mention of an assembly of the apostles in order to the composing of a creed. Secondly, the fathers of the three first centuries, in disputing against the heretics, endeavour to prove that the doctrine contained in this creed was the same which the apostles taught; but they never pretend that the apostles composed it. Thirdly, if the apostles had made this creed, it would have been the same in all churches and in all ages; and all authors would have cited it after the same manner. But the case is quite otherwise. In the second and third ages of the church, there were as many creeds as authors, and one and the same author sets down the creed after a different manner in several places of his works; which is an evidence that there was not at that time any creed, which was reputed to be the apostles'. In the fourth century, Rufinus compares together the three ancient creeds of the churches of Aquileia, Rome, and the East, which differ very considerable in the terms.

Besides, these creeds differed not only in the terms and expressions, but even in the articles, some of which were omitted in one or other of them, such as those of the descent into Hell, the communion of saints, and the life everlasting. From these reasons it may be gathered, that though this creed may be said to be that of the apostles, in regard to the doctrines it contains, yet is it not to be referred to them as the authors and first composers of it. Who was the true author of it, is not so easy to determine; though its great antiquity may be inferred from hence, that the whole form, as it now stands in the English Liturgy, is to be found in the works of Ambrose and Rufinus, the former of whom flourished in the third, and the latter in the fourth century. Peter Gnapheus, bishop of Antioch in the fifth century, first ordered the constant repetition of it in the church service.

APOSTOLATE, in a general sense, is used for mission; but it more properly denotes the dignity or office of an apostle of Christ. It is also used in ancient writers for the office of a bishop. But as the title apostolicus has been appropriated to the pope, so that of apostolate became at length restrained to the sole dignity of the popedom.

APOSTOLIC, apostolical; something that relates to the apostles, or descends from them. Thus we say, the apostolical age, apostolical doctrine, apostolical character, constitutions, traditions, &c.

APOSTOLIC, an appellation anciently given to all such churches as were supposed to have been founded by the apostles; and even to the bishops of those churches, as being the reputed successors of the apostles. These were confined to four, viz. Rome, Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem. In after times, the other churches assumed the same quality, on account, principally, of the supposed conformity of their doctrine with that of the churches which were apostolical by foundation, and because all bishops held themselves successors of the apostles, or acted in their dioceses with the authority of apostles.

The first time the term apostolical is attributed to bishops, as such, is in a letter of Clovis to the council of Orleans, held in 511, though that king does not there expressly denominate them apostolical, but apostolica sede dignissimi, highly worthy of the apostolical see. In 581, Guntram calls the bishops, met at the council of Macon, apostolical pontiffs, apostolici pontifices.

In progress of time, the bishop of Rome growing in power above the rest, and the three patriarchates of Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem, falling into the hands of the Saracens, the title apostolical was restrained to the pope and his church alone; though some of the popes, and St. Gregory the Great, not contented to hold the title by this tenure, began at length to insist that it belonged to them by another and peculiar right, as being the successors of St. Peter. The council of Rheims, in 1049, declared that the pope was the sole apostolical primate of the universal church. And hence a great number of apostolicals: apostolical see, apostolical nuncio, apostolical notary, apostolical brief, apostolical chamber, apostolical vicar, apostolical blessing. The king of Hungary is styled apostolical king, apostolical majesty. Pope Sylvester II. bestowed this title on Stephen I., duke of Hungary, A.D. 1000, because he not only greatly promoted the faith in Hungary, but also, in imitation of the apostles, preached himself. Clement XIII. renewed the memory of this occurrence by giving the Empress-queen, Maria Theresa, the title of apostolical queen, in 1758.

APOSTOLIC FATHERS, an appellation usually given to the writers of the first century, who employed their pens in the cause of Christianity: their names are Clement, Barnabas, Ignatius, Polycarp, and Hermas. Of these writers, Cotelierius, and after him Le Clerc, have published a collection in two volumes, accompanied both with their own annotations, and the remarks of other learned men. The genuine epistles of the apostolic fathers, were translated by Abp. Wake, who also prefixed to his translation a learned preliminary dissertation. Lond. 1693, 8vo.

APOSTOLICAL CONSTITUTIONS, a collection of regulations attributed to the apostles, and supposed to have been collected by Clement, whose name they likewise bear. It is the general opinion, however, that they are spurious, and that Clement had no hand in them. They appeared first in the fourth century, but have been much changed and corrupted since. There are so many things in them different from and even contrary to the genius and design of the New Testament writers, that no wise man would believe, without the most convincing and irresistible proof, that both could come from the same hand. They were published both in Greek and English, by William Whiston, who contended vehemently for their Divine authority. See Whiston's Primitive Christianity, Lond. 1711; Grabe's Answer to Whiston; Saurin's Ser. vol. ii. p. 185; Lardner's Cred. vol. iii. p. 11. ch. ult.; Doddridge's Lect. lecture 119.

APOSTOLICI, or APOSTOLICS; the name of three sects who professed to imitate the manners and practice of the apostles. 1. The first flourished at the close of the second century. They had all things in common. Little else is known of their peculiar tenets. 2. Another existed in the twelfth century. It was composed of people of the lower classes. They were numerous; and their lives, as Bernard admits, were exemplary. Their peculiarities were as follows:—They held it to be unlawful to take oaths; they suffered their hair and beards to grow to an enormous length; they preferred celibacy to wedlock, calling themselves the chaste brethren and sisters; each man, however, had a spiritual sister, with whom he lived in a domestic relation. 3. The third sect was founded about 1260, by Gerhard Sagarelli. They went bare-footed, begging, preaching, and singing throughout Italy, Switzerland, and France; announced the coming of the kingdom of heaven and of purer times; had females in their retinue, with whom they were suspected of unlawful intimacy. This society never received the papal confirmation: on the contrary, it was abolished, A.D. 1286, by Honorius IV. But though they were persecuted by the Inquisition, they continued in existence, perpetually wandering about; and when Sagarelli was burnt as a heretic in 1300, another leader appeared—Dolcino, a learned man of Milan, who encouraged the sect, now increased to fourteen hundred men, with his prophetic promises. To defend themselves against persecution, they were compelled, about the year 1304, to station themselves in fortified places, whence they might resist attacks. In the plundering habits which they were forced to adopt, they wholly lost their original character, and after having devastated a large tract of country belonging to Milan, they were subdued, in 1307, by the troops of Bishop Raynerius, in their fortress Zebello, in Vercelli, and almost all destroyed. Dolcino was burnt. Their survivors afterwards appeared in Lombardy, and in the south of France, as late as 1368. Their heresy consisted in their opposition to the corruptions of the clergy, and the unfounded pretensions of the pope of Rome.

APOTACTICÆ, an ancient sect, who affected to follow the example of the apostles, and renounced all their effects and possessions. It does not appear that they held any errors at first; but afterwards they taught that the renouncing of all riches was not only a matter of counsel and advice, but of precept and necessity.

APPELLANTS, a term specially applied to those of the French clergy, and others, who appealed from the Pope's authority in the matter of the Bull Unigenitus, to a general council.

APPROBATION, a state or disposition of the mind, wherein we put a value upon, or become pleased with, some person or thing. Moralists are divided on the principle of approbation, or the motive which determines us to approve or disapprove. The Epicureans will have it to be only self-interest: according to them, that which determines any agent to approve his own action, is its apparent tendency to his private happiness; and even the approbation of another's action, flows from no other cause but an opinion of its tendency to the happiness of the approver, either immediately or remotely. Others resolve approbation into a moral sense, or a principle of benevolence, by which we are determined to approve every kind affection either in ourselves or others, and all publicly useful actions which we imagine to flow from such affections, without any view therein to our own private happiness.

But may we not add, that a true Christian's approbation arises from his perception of the will of God? See OBLIGATION.

APPROPRIATION, the annexing a benefice to the proper and perpetual use of some religious house. It is a term also often used in the religious world, as referring to that act of the mind by which we apply the blessings of the Gospel to ourselves. This appropriation is real when we are enabled to believe in, feel, and obey the truth; but merely nominal and delusive when there are no fruits of righteousness and true holiness. See ASSURANCE.

AQUARIANS, those who consecrated water in the eucharist instead of wine, partly for fear the smell of wine should discover them to the heathens, and partly because they deemed it unlawful to drink it. Another branch of them approved of wine in the sacrament, when received at the evening: they likewise mixed water with the wine.

AQUILA. See BIBLE, ancient versions, (Greek.)

AQUINAS, THOMAS, commonly called the Angelic Doctor, a celebrated scholastic divine, whose authority has always stood very high with the Roman Catholics. He was descended from the kings of Sicily and Arragon, and born at the castle of Aquino, in Italy, about the year 1244; received the rudiments of his education at an early age, from the monks of Mount Cassino; and, notwithstanding the obstacles thrown in his way by his parents, and the measures to which they had recourse to prevent his associating with the Dominicans, he made rapid progress, under their direction, in the theology of the day. Having prosecuted his studies at Naples, Rome, and Cologne, he proceeded to Paris, where he read lectures with great applause on the Book of Sentences, and was created doctor in divinity in 1255. About 1263, he returned to Italy, and was appointed definitor of his order for the province of Rome; and after teaching his divinity at most of the Italian universities, finally settled at Naples, where he exclusively addicted himself to study, the delivery of lectures, and devotional exercises. So free was he from the influence of worldly honours and wealth, that he refused to accept the Neapolitan archbishopric, when offered him by Clement IV. He was a man of great metaphysical acumen, subtilty in disputation, zeal for the doctrines and corruptions of the Church, and confessedly unrivalled among the divines of that age. His works, amounting to seventeen folio volumes, were first published at Venice in 1490, and have been frequently reprinted. They principally consist of commentaries on Scripture, the Works of Aristotle, and the Books of Sentences; but his most celebrated work is the "Summa Theologiae," which was almost universally received, placed on an equality with Lombard's celebrated writings, and admitted as the standard of truth, and the model according to which it is to be studied and propounded: they gave rise to the sect of the Thomists, which see. He died in 1274, and was canonized by John XXII., in 1323. Besides the title of angelic doctor, he received those of the angel of the schools, the eagle of divines, and the fifth doctor of the church.

ARABIC LANGUAGE, one of the principal of the dialects commonly called Oriental, or Semitic, and the most productive and important extraneous source from which to elucidate and corroborate the philology of the Hebrew language, with which it is closely allied by the tie of cognate relationship. It is one of the richest and most cultivated languages in the world, and is rendered specially remarkable by the extent of territory in which it is spoken, and the vast and valuable literary treasures in which it abounds. Our acquaintance with it begins at the time of the commencement of its literature, a little before the time of Mohammed, by whom the northern dialect, spoken about Mecca, was elevated to be the medium of written as well as of colloquial communication. The Koran, which is composed in this dialect, is regarded by the Musselmans as inimitably sublime. The language abounds in works of poetry, history, geography, mathematics, philosophy, and natural science. We also possess in it several Jewish and Christian versions of the sacred Scriptures; and several of the most eminent of the rabbinical commentators were well acquainted with it as their vernacular tongue, and availed themselves of its aid in their interpretations of the Hebrew text. The best grammars are those of Rosenmüller and De Sacy, and the best lexicon is that of Golius, in folio, a new and greatly improved edition of which, in quarto, has just been published by Freytag.

ARABICI, a sect that sprang up in the former half of the third century in Arabia, whose distinguishing tenet was, that the human soul dies, decays, and rises again at the same time with the body. Origen refuted their error, and prevailed on them to abandon it in the year 426. It originated in an opinion then held by many, that the soul is material.

ARAMEAN, ARAMAIC, properly whatever belongs to the people or language of Aram; and as this term comprehends not only Syria, but also Mesopotamia, and other adjacent eastern regions, the adjective is used in works of biblical criticism, to denote two cognate Semitic dialects—the Western Aramean, or Syriac; and the Eastern Aramean, or Chaldee. The first intimation that we have of the existence of any such dialect is in Gen. xxxi. 47. It was the Eastern Aramean which the Jews learned during the exile in Babylon, which they brought with them on their return to Palestine, and in which certain portions of the books of Ezra, and Daniel, and the Targums, are written. In the Western, or Syriac, we possess a most venerable, and truly valuable and important version of the Old and New Testament, besides other versions of a later date of the New Testament, or of single portions of the sacred volume.

ARCHANGEL, one of those composing the higher order of celestial spirits. It is used indefinitely, 1 Thess. iv. 6; and with the definite article of Michael, Jude 9, who is, no doubt, the same that is spoken of, Dan. xii. 1. The term implies superiority of rank and authority over other angels, and quite accords with the representations which are made in various passages of the New Testament, respecting the different orders and subordination of the angelic hosts. The opinion of Bishop Horsley and some others—that it is exclusively characteristic of Christ, as the champion and defender of his people—seems more fanciful than founded in truth.

ARCHBISHOP, a metropolitan prelate, having several suffragan bishops under him.

The bishops in the primitive Church, were all vested with the same office and authority, but as the profession of Christianity increased, the episcopal power was enlarged. As before there was at least one bishop placed in every city, so now, in every metropolis, as the Romans called it, or mother city of every province, wherein were courts of civil judicature, there was a metropolitan, or Archbishop, who had ecclesiastical jurisdiction over all the bishops of that province. His jurisdiction consisted in ordaining or ratifying the elections and ordinations of all other bishops; and once a year he was to summon them all to a synod, in which he presided, to inquire into their conduct, to censure with suspension, or deprivation, and to hear and determine causes between contending bishops.

Dr. Bingham is of opinion, that archbishop was originally but another name for patriarch, though in process of time their jurisdiction became distinct.

The first establishment of Archbishoprics in England (if we may credit Bede, one of the most ancient writers of the English nation) was in the time of Lucius, said to be the first Christian king of England; who, after the conversion of his subjects, erected three archbishoprics at London, York, and Llandaff, then called Caerleon. The dignity of archbishop continued in the see of London one hundred and eighty years, till, in the time of the Saxons, it was translated to Canterbury; where it has continued ever since. York remains a metropolitan see to this day.

Augustin, the monk, who was sent by Pope Gregory to convert the English nation, in the reign of Ethelbert, King of Kent, was the first Bishop of Canterbury; but Theodore, the sixth in succession after him, was the first archbishop of that see. The archbishop of Canterbury had anciently the primacy, not only over England, but Ireland also, and all the bishops of the latter were consecrated by him. He was styled by Pope Urban II. Alterius Orbis Papa: he had a perpetual legatine power annexed to his archbishopric: he had some marks of royalty, such as the power of coining money, &c. Since the Reformation, he is styled Primate and Metropolitan of all England. Archbishop Cramer was the first who bore this title. As to precedence, there have been ancient contests about it, as also about the oath of canonical obedience, between the two archiepiscopal sees. Some antiquarians will have it, that the Archbishop of York was originally primate of the British church; for London never was a Roman colony, or the seat of the Roman emperors, as York was, where both Severus and Constantius Chlorus lived and died, and where Constantine the Great was born; and from hence they infer, that, where the Emperors resided was the most likely place to have pre-eminence above the rest. However it be, in the reign of Henry I., William Corbel, Archbishop of Canterbury, obtained from the Pope the character of legate, by which he secured to himself a superiority over the see of York, which he visited jure legationis. But after his death, the contest still continued; for we find that, in the reign of Henry II., a synod being called at Westminster by the Pope's legate, the Archbishop of Canterbury coming first, seated himself at the right hand of the legate; but York, coming afterwards, refused to take the seat on the left hand, and demanded Canterbury's place, which the latter refusing, York sat down in his lap. This occasioned the synod to break up in disorder, and both parties appealing to the Pope, the contest was decided in favour of the see of Canterbury, which enjoys the precedence to this day.

The privileges of the Archbishop of Canterbury, are, among others, to crown the Kings of England; to have prelates for his officers—as the Bishop of London his provincial dean; the Bishop of Winchester his chancellor; the Bishop of Lincoln his vice-chancellor; the Bishop of Salisbury his precentor; the Bishop of Worcester his chaplain; and the Bishop of Rochester his cross-bearer; which last office, since the times of popery, has ceased. He is also the first peer of England next to the royal family.

The Archbishop of Canterbury hath the supreme government of ecclesiastical matters next under the king. Upon the death of any suffragan bishop, the custody of his see devolves upon the archbishop: he hath a power of censuring any bishop in his province: he hath an ancient right to preside in all provincial councils of his suffragans, which formerly were held once a year, but have been discontinued a long time; so that his power of examining things throughout his province is devolved to his courts, of which he holds several,—as the Court of Arches, Prerogative Court, Court of Peculiars, &c., and he has the probate of wills.

As to the Archbishop of York, he is now styled Primate and Metropolitan of England, and takes place of all peers, except the Archbishop of Canterbury, and the Lord Chancellor. He had originally the primacy, not only over twelve English sees, but likewise over all the bishoprics of Scotland. But Scotland has disowned his prerogative many years since, and the archbishopric itself hath swallowed up several of the smaller and more inconsiderable bishoprics; so that the whole province is now reduced to four sees—Durham, Chester, Carlisle and Man.

Scotland, whilst episcopacy prevailed in that country, had two archbishops—of St. Andrews and Glasgow—the former of whom was Primate of all Scotland.

Wales likewise anciently boasted of an archbishop, whose see (as has been observed) was established at Caerleon, and was afterwards translated to St. David's. But the plague raging very much in that country, the archiepiscopal see was again removed to Doll, in Bretagne, where this dignity ended. Notwithstanding which, in after ages, the Britons, or Welsh, commenced an action on that account against the Archbishop of Canterbury, but were cast.

Ireland has four archbishops—of Armagh, Dublin, Cashel, and Tuam—of whom the Archbishop of Armagh is Primate of all Ireland.

In the United States there is an archbishop of the Roman Catholic church, whose see is at Baltimore, and whose spiritual jurisdiction extends over all the States. There is as yet no archbishop of the Protestant Episcopal church, though there are several bishops. In the year 1828, Pope Leo XII. appointed, after much delay, an archbishop in Columbia, whom Bolivar had proposed. Perhaps the two most important archbishops in history were those of Cologne and Mentz. They were sovereigns of a considerable country, electors of the German empire, and the two highest officers under the emperor. Till Napoleon dissolved the German empire, they played a conspicuous part in the history of the continent. In France, there are now nine archbishops; in Spain eight; in Portugal two; in Hungary three; in Italy thirty-eight. See BISHOP, PATRIARCH, and PRIMATE.

ARCHDEACON, an ecclesiastical officer under the bishop. Though archdeacons, in these last ages of the church, have usually been of the order of presbyters, or priests, yet anciently they were no more than deacons, as the name imports. But how the archdeacon came by his honour, and after what manner he was invested, is a matter of some dispute among learned men. Salmasius, and some others, are of opinion, that originally he was no more than the senior deacon. Others think the dignity was always elective, and in the breast of the bishop; but Jerome plainly asserts that the office went not by seniority but by election.

The office of archdeacon was always a place of great honour and reputation; for he was the bishop's constant attendant and assistant; by which means he commonly gained such an interest, as to get himself chosen, before the presbyters, to succeed the bishop. His business was, 1. To attend the bishop at the altar, and to administer the cup when the bishop celebrated the eucharist. He was to order all things relating to the inferior clergy, such as to appoint readers, acolythists, sub-deacons, &c. 2. He was to assist the bishop in managing the church revenues, assigning their several portions to the poor, orphans, widows, &c. Upon which account, Prudentius, describing the offices of St. Laurence, whom he makes to be archdeacon of Rome, among other things assigns him the keys of the church's treasure, and the care of dispensing the oblations of the people: and he introduces the heathen persecutor demanding of him those treasures; which he promising to do, in a short time brought before him the poor, the lame, the blind, and the infirm, telling him, those were the riches which he had in his custody. 3. Another part of his office was to assist the bishop in preaching, and in ordaining the inferior clergy. 4. He was also invested with the power of censuring deacons, and the inferior clergy, but not presbyters. 5. As to his jurisdiction, it will admit of a dispute, whether it originally extended over the whole diocese, or was confined to the city or mother-church. In the middle ages of the church, there is no question but his power extended over the whole diocese. 6. Valesius observes, that the archdeacons were likewise called Cor-Episcopi. This may seem at first only a corruption of the Chorepiscopus, because, in later ages, the power of the ancient Chorepiscopi dwindled into that of the archdeacons. But when it is considered that the deacons anciently were called the bishop's eyes, ears, mouth, or heart, it will appear very probable that the archdeacon was called, by way of eminence, Cor-episcopi, i.e. the bishop's heart. There are sixty archdeacons in England, who visit every two years in three, when they inquire into the reparations and movables belonging to churches; reform abuses; suspend; excommunicate; in some places prove wills; and induct all clerks into benefices within their respective jurisdictions.

ARCHIMANDRITE, in the Greek church, an abbot, or general abbot, who has the superintendence of many abbots and convents; because, in the ancient Greek church, the abbots were called mandra. In Sicily, the abbots are thus called, because their convents were originally of Greek institution, and conform to the rules of St. Basil. The general-abbots of the united Greeks in Poland, Galicia, Transylvania, Hungary, and Venice, also bear this title.

ARCHONTICS, a sect about the year 160 or 203. Among many other extravagant notions, they held that the world was created by archangels; they also denied the resurrection of the body.

ARCH-PRESBYTER, or ARCH-PRIEST, a priest established in some dioceses with a superiority over the rest. He was anciently chosen out of the college of presbyters, at the pleasure of the bishop. The arch-presbyters were much of the same nature with our deans in cathedral churches.

ARGENTEUS, CODEX. See MSS. BIBLICAL.

ARIANS, followers of Arius, a presbyter of the church of Alexandria, about 315, who maintained that the Son of God was totally and essentially distinct from the Father; that he was the first and noblest of those beings whom God had created, the instrument by whose subordinate operation he formed the universe; and, therefore, inferior to the Father both in nature and dignity; also, that the Holy Ghost was not God, but created by the power of the Son. The Arians owned that the Son was the Word; but denied that Word to have been eternal. They held that Christ had nothing of man in him but the flesh, to which the Λογος, or Word, was joined, which was the same as the soul in us. The Arians were first condemned and anathematised by a council at Alexandria, in 320, under Alexander, bishop of that city, who accused Arius of impiety, and caused him to be expelled from the communion of the church; and afterwards by 380 fathers in the general council of Nice, assembled by Constantine, in 325. His doctrine, however, was not extinguished; on the contrary, it became the reigning religion, especially in the East. Arius was recalled from banishment by Constantine in two or three years after the council of Nice, and the laws that had been enacted against him were repealed. Notwithstanding this, Athanasius, then bishop of Alexandria, refused to admit him and his followers to communion. This so enraged them, that, by their interest at court, they procured that prelate to be deposed and banished; but the church of Alexandria still refusing to admit Arius into their communion, the emperor sent for him to Constantinople; where, upon delivering in a fresh confession of his faith in terms less offensive, the emperor commanded him to be received into their communion; but that very evening, it is said, Arius died, as his friends were conducting him in triumph to the great church of Constantinople. The Arian party, however, found a protector in Constantius, who succeeded his father in the East. They underwent various revolutions and prosecutions under succeeding emperors; till at length Theodosius the Great exerted every effort to suppress them. Their doctrine was carried, in the fifth century, into Africa, under the Vandals; and into Asia, under the Goths. Italy, Gaul, and Spain, were also deeply infected with it; and towards the commencement of the sixth century it was triumphant in many parts of Asia, Africa, and Europe: but it sunk almost at once, when the Vandals were driven out of Africa, and the Goths out of Italy, by the arms of Justinian. However, it revived again in Italy, under the protection of the Lombards, in the seventh century, and was not extinguished till about the end of the eighth. Arianism was again revived in the West by Servetus, in 1531, for which he suffered death. After this, the doctrine got footing in Geneva and in Poland; but at length degenerated, in a great measure, into Socinianism.

If the reader wish to enter at length into the history of Arianism from its rise to the period of the Reformation, he will find ample information in "Maimbourg's History of Arianism, showing its influence upon civil affairs, and the causes of the dissolution of the Roman Empire," translated into English by Webster, London, 1728, 2 vols. 4to.; only it is not always to be depended upon for its accuracy. History of the Arians and the Council of Nice, translated from the French of Sebastian de Tillemont, by Deacon, London, 1721, 2 vols. 8vo., is chiefly a compilation by the original authors, but throws considerable light on many of the circumstances in the period of about seventy years, which it embraces. Whitaker's Origin of Arianism.

ARIANISM, progress of, in England, and controversy respecting.—Although references are frequently made by our ecclesiastical writers to Arian sentiments, as held and propagated by various individuals in England after the Reformation, there is so much vagueness and inaccuracy in the way in which they speak about them, that little dependence can be placed on most of the allegations. They were probably held by individuals from time to time, and had made an incipient progress before they were much noticed or avowed; but nothing of importance took place till the beginning of the last century, when they were openly brought forward and defended by William Whiston, Professor of Mathematics in the University of Cambridge. This he did in his Primitive Christianity Revived, London, 1711, 4 vols. 8vo., the last volume of which contains an account of what he considered the primitive faith in the person of Christ, and the doctrine of the Trinity, and the first volume an historical account of the proceedings of the University and Convocation against him. His sentiments were declared heretical, and he was ejected from his chair at Cambridge. He still, however, went on to write, and produced a fifth volume of his Primitive Christianity Revived, in 1712; his Council of Nice Vindicated from the Athanasian Heresy, in 1713; his Letter to the Earl of Nottingham, on the Eternity of the Son of God and the Holy Ghost, 1719: to this Lord Nottingham replied, in 1720, with considerable ability, and for which he received the thanks of the Universities. Whiston rejoined in a preface to his subsequent editions of this Letter. Whiston went on to the end of his life occasionally publishing on the subject; but in the meantime it was taken up by a man of more eminence, though not of more honesty, in the church, Dr. Samuel Clarke, who published, in 1712, The Scripture Doctrine of the Trinity, in which he endeavours to show, in a commentary on forty texts of Scripture, the subordination of the Son to the Father. This created a great flame. Clarke was replied to by Robert Nelson, in The Doctrine of the Trinity Vindicated; by Bishop Gastrel, in Some Considerations on Dr. Clarke's Doctrine of the Trinity; and by various others. The Convocation fell upon Dr. Clarke, also, who shuffled and retained his living. He published, on the same side, a reply to Nelson and to Gastrel, who wrote anonymously; besides some other things without his name.

The grand opponent of Dr. Clarke was Waterland, who published, at different times, A Vindication of Christ's Divinity,—A Second Vindication,—A Defence of the Divinity of Christ, in Eight Sermons,—The Case of Arian Subscription considered,—A Critical History of the Athanasian Creed, and The Importance of the Doctrine of the Trinity Asserted; making six volumes 8vo., besides smaller pieces. On the other side, and in answer to Waterland, Whitby wrote his Disquisitiones Modeste, in Latin; his Reply to Dr. Waterland's objections against them, in two parts, with an Appendix, 1720-21. An anonymous country clergyman produced A Reply to Dr. Waterland's Defence of his Queries, 1722, entering very largely into the controversy. Dr. Sykes wrote several pamphlets on the subject. Bishop Hoadly, Sir Isaac Newton, and some other eminent men of that period, it is well known, leaned to the side of Arianism.

The Arian controversy commenced about the same time among the Dissenters, and raged as fiercely, and more destructively among them, than in the church. It began in the west, with James Peirce, of Exeter, who, with his colleague, Joseph Hallet, were learned Presbyterian ministers in Exeter. Being suspected by some of their congregation, and asked to explain themselves on the doctrine of the Trinity, they refused or evaded; in consequence of which a separation took place. The flame spread to London, and occasioned the celebrated Salter's Hall controversy, and led to the most dismal effects on the Presbyterian body. The books and pamphlets written on the subject are innumerable. The principal, on the Arian side, are the following:—The Case of the Ejected Ministers of Exon; Defence of ditto; The Western Inquisition, by Peirce; The Case of Martin Tompkins, 1719. The writings of Emlyn, a Presbyterian minister in Dublin, contributed to diffuse and carry on the controversy both in Ireland and England. They are all collected together in his works, published by his son, with an account of the author's treatment for his sentiments, which was both unrighteous and cruel; Works, London, 1746, 3 vols. 8vo. On the other side, Dr. Calamy published nineteen sermons concerning the Doctrine of the Trinity, 1722; in which the controversy is discussed with considerable ability and learning. The doctrine of the Trinity Stated and Defended, by some London Ministers; viz. Long, Robinson, Smith and Reynolds.

The controversy was revived again in the church by Dr. Clayton, Bishop of Clogher, and for a while carried on with considerable warmth. He published, in 1751, An Essay on Spirit, in which the Doctrine of the Trinity is considered, &c. This pamphlet was not, in reality, the bishop's, but the production of a young clergyman, whose cause and sentiments, however, he identified himself with. It produced more than from twenty to thirty writers, in the way of attack or defence. Among these, besides anonymous writers, were Kirkly, Knowles, Jones, Rudd, Scott, Randolph, McDonough, and Archdeacon Blackburn. The ablest of the orthodox defenders were William Jones, in his Full Answer to the Essay on Spirit; and afterwards in his Catholic Doctrine of the Trinity; and the Vindication of the Doctrine of the Trinity, by Dr. Randolph.

At the present day, Arianism has almost become extinct in England, having merged into one or other of the various grades of Socinianism; and is only to be found, in anything like a systematic form, among the Presbyterians in the North of Ireland, especially those of the Synod of Munster.

ARISTOTELIANS, a distinguished officer at the court of Ptolemy Philadelphus, King of Egypt, whom that monarch is said to have sent to Eliezer, the Jewish high priest, to obtain a copy of the Hebrew Scriptures, and whose name is celebrated in connexion with the version of the Septuagint, which see.

ARISTOTELIANS, the followers of Aristotle. They believed in the eternity of the world, and represented the Deity as somewhat similar to a principle of power giving motion to a machine; and as happy in the contemplation of himself, but regardless of human affairs. They were uncertain as to the immortality of the soul. As this was rather a philosophical than a religious sect, we shall not enlarge on it.

ARK, or NOAH'S ARK, a floating vessel built by Noah for the preservation of his family, and the several species of animals, during the deluge. The form of the ark was an oblong, with a flat bottom and a sloped roof, raised to a cubit in the middle; it had neither sails nor rudder; nor was it sharp at the ends for cutting the water. This form was admirably calculated to make it lie steady on the water, without rolling, which might have endangered the lives of the animals within.

The length of this ark was 300 cubits, which, according to Dr. Arbuthnot's calculation, amount to a little more than 547 feet; its breadth, 50 cubits, or 91-2 feet; its height, 30 cubits, or 54-72 feet; and its solid contents, 2,730-782 solid feet, sufficient for a carriage of 81,062 tons. It consisted of three stories, each of which, abating the thickness of the floors, might be about 18 feet high, and no doubt was partitioned into a great many rooms or apartments. This vessel was doubtless so contrived as to admit the air and the light on all, though the particular construction of the windows is not mentioned.

ARK OF THE COVENANT, a small chest or coffer, three feet nine inches in length, two feet three inches in breadth, and two feet three inches in height, in which were contained the golden pot that had manna, Aaron's rod, and the tables of the covenant. The ark was repositied in the holiest place of the tabernacle. It was taken by the Philistines, and detained twenty (some say forty) years at Kirjath-jearim; but, the people being afflicted with emerods on account of it, returned it with divers presents. It was afterwards placed in the temple.

The lid or covering of the ark was called the propitiatory or mercy-seat: over which two figures were placed called cherubims, with expanded wings of a peculiar form. Here the Shechinah rested both in the tabernacle and temple, in a visible cloud: hence were issued the Divine oracles by an audible voice; and the high priest appeared before this mercy-seat once every year on the great day of expiation; and the Jews, wherever they worshipped, turned their faces towards the place where the ark stood.

In the second temple there was also an ark, made of the same shape and dimensions with the first, and put in the same place, but without any of its contents and peculiar honours. It was used as a representative of the former on the day of expiation, and a repository of the original copy of the holy Scriptures, collected by Ezra and the men of the great synagogue after the captivity; and, in imitation of this, the Jews, to this day, have a kind of ark in their synagogues, wherein their sacred books are kept.

ARMENIANS, one of the most ancient people of the civilized world, and who have maintained their cultivation amidst all those revolutions which barbarism, despotism, and war have occasioned in Western Asia, from the days of Assyria, Greece, and Rome, down to the period of Mongolian, Turkish, and Persian dominion. During so many ages they have faithfully preserved not only their historical traditions, reaching back to the periods of many parts of Hebrew history, but also their national character, both in a physical and moral point of view. The region around mount Ararat, their original abode, is still the centre of their religious and political union. Commerce has scattered them, like the Jews, among several of the nations of Europe, and through most of those of Asia.

ARMENIAN CHURCH. See CHURCH, ARMENIAN.

ARMENIAN MONKS.—The religious of the Armenian church are very numerous. Some follow the order of St. Anthony, others that of St. Basil. Those of St. Anthony live in solitudes and deserts, where the austerities they practise surpass those of all other religious orders in Europe; their monasteries are very considerable: they eat no meat, nor drink any wine, except on Easter-day; they fast all the year, even on Sundays, and eat but once a day: they live upon roots and herbs, abstaining from fish, milk, and oil, though they are permitted to eat olives: they never go out of their monastery, nor speak a word to any person whatever; and if a stranger has any thing to say to one of these solitaries, he tells it to the porter, who communicates it to the monk, and reports his answer: they live in separate cells, employing themselves in some work, excepting at the hours of prayer: they are all laymen, excepting five or six, and sometimes eight priests in each monastery: their office is very long; they repeat every night in the choir, the 150 Psalms, leaning upon a kind of walking-staff or crutch.

It is not known who first introduced the order of St. Anthony into Armenia, but that of St. Basil was first established in that country by the Patriarch Nierces Gheldea, who died in the year 1173. The religious of this order are not such exact observers of their rules as those of the order of St. Anthony, who live in the deserts, for the monks of the order of St. Basil often eat meat, and their monasteries are situated in towns, and the most frequented places. Their principal monastery is that of Etchmiazin, which is as it were the centre of the Armenian religion, and the rule of discipline to all the rest.

The habit of the Armenian monks consists of a long vest or cassock, tied about with a leathern girdle. Over this cassock they put on a kind of gown, with very large sleeves, and a cloak, both of black stuff; as also a cowl of the same, which is sharp-pointed, like that of the bare-footed Augustines, over which they wear a turban. The difference in the habits of the two orders of St. Anthony and St. Basil consists in this: that the former, who are solitaries, wear a coarser kind of stuff, and a cassock with very strait sleeves; and that their cloak is nearly like that of the Minims. The religious of the order of St. Anthony never quit their habit; but those of the order of St. Basil quit it whenever they please, by the toleration of their superiors; but this is an abuse of their rules.

Some of the Armenian religious do not reside in the monasteries, as those at Jerusalem, who live by their labour, and by the alms they receive from the pilgrims of their nation, who come out of devotion to visit the holy sepulchre, and Calvary. These alms are very large, amounting sometimes to a thousand crowns. This makes them very rich, and they employ the money in gaining the Turks, and obtaining from them what they desire. They gave at once eight thousand sequins to the pasha and kadi of Jerusalem for leave to place two lamps amongst those of the Latins, which are at the stable of Bethlehem.

About the end of the last century, some Armenians, of the order of St. Anthony, having quitted the peculiar tenets of their church, settled in the Morea, where the republic of Venice gave them a monastery in the town of Modon. These religious, besides the three vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience, make a fourth, which is, to obey those who are deputed by their superiors to teach them the truths of the Catholic religion. They live upon alms, and conform to the abstinences and fasts of the Romish church. Nevertheless, they follow the Armenian rite, and consecrate in unleaven bread. The habit is composed of a black gown tied about with a leathern girdle; a tunic or cassock shorter than the gown, and open before; and a cloak and cowl, both black. They likewise wear over their habit, on the right side, a red cross, with some characters, which signify the desire they have to shed their blood for the faith of Jesus Christ.

The principal establishment of those Armenians who have submitted to the Roman see is at Venice, where they occupy the celebrated monastery of St. Lazarus, at which they have printed editions of the Bible, and various works of a high literary character.

ARMENIAN VERSION. See BIBLE VERSIONS.

ARMINIANS, persons who follow the doctrines of Arminius; also called Remonstrants, because, in 1611, they presented a remonstrance to the States-general, wherein they state their grievances and pray for relief.

The distinguishing tenets of the Arminians may be comprised in the five following articles relative to predestination, universal redemption, the corruption of man, conversion, and perseverance, viz. —

I. That God, from all eternity, determined to bestow salvation on those who he foresaw would persevere unto the end: and to inflict everlasting punishments on those who should continue in their unbelief, and resist his divine succours; so that election was conditional, and reprobation in like manner the result of foreseen infidelity and persevering wickedness.

II. That Jesus Christ, by his sufferings and death, made an atonement for the sins of all mankind in general, and of every individual in particular; that, however, none but those who believe in him can be partakers of divine benefits.

III. That true faith cannot proceed from the exercise of our natural faculties and powers, nor from the force and operation of free will; since man, in consequence of his natural corruption, is incapable either of thinking or doing any good thing; and that therefore, it is necessary, in order to his conversion and salvation, that he be regenerated and renewed by the operation of the Holy Ghost, which is the gift of God through Jesus Christ.

IV. That this divine grace or energy of the Holy Ghost begins and perfects every thing that can be called good in man, and consequently, all good works are to be attributed to God alone; that, nevertheless, this grace is offered to all, and does not force men to act against their inclinations, but may be resisted and rendered ineffectual by the perverse will of the impenitent sinner. Some modern Arminians interpret this and the last article with a greater latitude.

V. That God gives to the truly faithful, who are regenerated by his grace, the means of preserving themselves in this state. The first Arminians, indeed, had some doubt with respect to the closing part of this article; but their followers uniformly maintain "that the regenerate may lose true justifying faith, fall from a state of grace, and die in their sins."

After the appointment of Arminius to the theological chair at Leyden, he thought it his duty to avow and vindicate the principles which he had embraced; and the freedom with which he published and defended them, exposed him to the resentment of those that adhered to the theological system of Geneva, which then prevailed in Holland; but his principal opponent was Gomar, his colleague. The controversy which was thus begun became more general after the death of Arminius, in the year 1609, and threatened to involve the United Provinces in civil discord. The Arminian tenets gained ground under the mild and favourable treatment of the magistrates of Holland, and were adopted by several persons of merit and distinction. The Calvinists, or Gomarists, as they were now called, appealed to a national synod; accordingly the synod of Dort was convened, by order of the States-general, in 1618, and was composed of ecclesiastic deputies from the United Provinces, as well as from the reformed churches of England, Hesse, Bremen, Switzerland, and the Palatinate. The principal advocate in favour of the Arminians was Episcopius, who at that time was professor of divinity at Leyden. It was first proposed to discuss the principal subjects in dispute, that the Arminians should be allowed to state and vindicate the grounds on which their opinions were founded; but some difference arising as to the proper mode of conducting the debate, the Arminians were excluded from the assembly, their case was tried in their absence, and they were pronounced guilty of pestilential errors, and condemned as corrupters of the true religion. A curious account of the proceedings of the above synod may be seen in a series of letters written by Mr. John Hales, who was present on the occasion.

In consequence of the above-mentioned decision, the Arminians were considered as enemies to their country and its established religion, and were much persecuted. They were treated with great severity, and deprived of all their posts and employments; their ministers were silenced, and their congregations were suppressed. The great Barneveldt was beheaded on a scaffold; and the learned Grotius, being condemned to perpetual imprisonment, fled, and took refuge in France.

After the death of Prince Maurice, who had been a violent partizan in favour of the Gomarists, in the year 1625, the Arminian exiles were restored to their former reputation and tranquillity; and, under the toleration of the state, they erected churches, and founded a college at Amsterdam, appointing Episcopius the first theological professor. The Arminian system has very much prevailed in England since the time of Archbishop Laud, and its votaries in other countries are very numerous. It is generally allowed that a majority of the clergy in both the established churches of Great Britain favour the Arminian system, notwithstanding their articles are strictly Calvinistic.

For the early history of Arminianism, the reader may consult—Acta Synodi Dordrechtii, Lug. Bat. fol. 1620, which gives the Calvinistic account of it; and, Acta et Scripta Synodalia Dordrechtiana, Werder, 1620, 4to, which gives the Arminian account; Scott's Articles of the Synod of Dort, Lond.; and Nichols's Calvinism and Arminianism Compared, Lond., 1824, 2 vols. 8vo, a work strangely put together, but which, apart from the violence of the author, contains a great deal of information.

Some of the principal writers on the side of the Arminians have been Arminius, Episcopius, Vorstius, Grotius, Curcellæus, Limborch, Le Clerc, Welstein, Goodwin, Whitby, Taylor, Fletcher, &c.

Some of the principal writers on the other side have been Polhill, in his Book on the Decrees; John Edwards in his Veritas Reduz; Cole in his Sovereignty of God; Edwards on the Will, and Original Sin; Dr. Owen in his Display of Arminianism, and on Particular Redemption; Gill in his Cause of God and Truth; and Toplady in almost all his works.

ARMINIUS, JAMES, the founder of the sect called Arminians, was born at Oude-water, in Holland, in 1560. Having lost his father when very young, a clergyman kindly undertook his education, during the first few years of his life, till he went to the university at Utrecht. There he staid till death deprived him of his protector; and then he would have been entirely friendless, had not another gentleman kindly become his patron, and took him to Marpurg, in 1575. He had not arrived at that place long when he heard that his country had been sacked by the Spaniards. The circumstance deprived him at once of a mother, brothers, and a sister, besides the inhabitants, who had all fallen victims. He was sent, in 1583, to Geneva, to perfect himself in his various studies, and there he applied himself chiefly to the lectures of the distinguished Theodore Beza, who was at that time explaining the Epistle to the Romans. Being compelled to retire to Basil, on account of his embracing the doctrines of Ramus in public, he acquired so great a reputation, that the faculty of divinity offered him the degree of doctor, without his incurring any expense, but which he modestly refused. Arminius had a great desire to visit Italy, and to hear the philosophical lectures of the famous James Zabarella, at Padua. That desire he gratified, and spent six or seven months on the journey. On his return to Geneva and Amsterdam, he was much reprobated for going to Italy; but this in time he overcame, and was ordained minister at Amsterdam in 1588, and very soon distinguished himself by the excellence of his sermons, which were remarkable for their judgment and piety. His ministry was much followed, and he was greatly beloved. Martin Lydius, professor of divinity at Franeker, thought him very capable of refuting the contents of a work wherein the doctrine of predestination had been attacked by some ministers of Delft. He accordingly undertook the task, but on weighing the arguments on both sides, he embraced the very opinions he meant to confute. In 1603, he was called to the professorship of Leyden, and began his lectures with three elegant orations: the first, on the object of the theology; the second, on the author and end of it; and the third, on the certainty of it: and then proceeded to the exposition of the prophet Jonah. In all his lectures he was attended by a numerous audience, who admired the strength of his arguments, and were astonished at the great learning which he displayed. This exposed him to the envy of his brethren, who treated him with harshness and cruelty. Disputes on the doctrines of grace were at that time kindling into a flame in the university, and the states of the province were obliged to appoint conferences between Arminius and his adversaries. Gomarus was his greatest opponent. In 1607, he, however, wrote a letter to the ambassador of the Elector Palatine, to vindicate his conduct with regard to the contests he was engaged in. These controversies, however, his continual labour, and his uneasiness at seeing his reputation blasted by aspersions and slanders, threw him into a fit of illness, which terminated his life on the 19th of October, 1609. Arminius was an energetic minister. His voice was firm, but moderately low; and his conversation such as became a Christian. While it was pious and judicious, it was intermixed with that politeness of conduct and elegance of manners which delights the young, and insures the approbation and esteem of the aged. His enemies, indeed, endeavoured to represent him in the most disadvantageous light; but his memory has been sufficiently vindicated by men of the greatest distinction and eminence; and in spite of all the malevolence and enmity of his antagonists, his character was in very many points highly commendable, and deserving of imitation.

ARNDT, JOHN, a Lutheran minister, of distinguished piety, whose work, entitled True Christianity, has been translated into many languages, and obtained a most extensive circulation. He was born at Ballenstedt in Anhalt, in 1555, and died in 1621, at Zelle, after having officiated in various places, and suffered persecution both from the Lutherans and the Calvinists. A few hours before his death, he preached from Ps. cxxvi. 5, "They that sow in tears shall reap in joy;" and on arriving at his house, he spoke of it as his funeral sermon. The influence of his writings, in fostering a spirit of seriousness in religion, is perhaps unequalled.

ARNOBIUS, about A.D. 300, a teacher of rhetoric at Sicca Veneria, in Numidia; and in 303, became a Christian. While yet a catechumen, he wrote seven books, Adversus Gentes, in which he defended the Christian religion, and showed the folly and absurdity of heathenism, with great spirit and learning, though his knowledge of the truth appears to have been somewhat defective.

ARNOLDISTS, the followers of Arnold of Brescia, in the twelfth century, who was a great declaimer against the wealth and vices of the clergy. He is also charged with preaching against baptism and the eucharist. He was burnt at Rome in 1155, and his ashes cast into the Tiber.

ARRHABONARI, a sect who held that the eucharist is neither the real flesh or blood of Christ, nor yet the sign of them, but only the pledge or earnest thereof.

ARTEMON, a heretic of the third century, who denied the divinity of Christ, and declared that he was nothing more than a mere man. His adherents, chiefly at Rome, in the diocese of which he lived, seem also to have spread in Syria; but in the latter half of the century they were confounded with other opponents of the doctrine of the Trinity. The name Artemonius was assumed, in 1726, by Samuel Crell, an antagonist of the same doctrine, and one of the Polish Brethren; but he retracted his errors before his death.

ARTEMONITES, those who held the tenets of Artemon, and sometimes those generally who are Socinian in the views which they entertain respecting the nature of Christ.

ARTICLE OF FAITH, is a point of Christian doctrine which we are obliged to believe as having been revealed by God, and which is generally allowed and established as such. See CONFESSIONS.

ARTICLES, FIVE, OF PERTH, to which James I., by intrigues and threatenings, procured the sanction of the General Assembly and the Scottish Parliament. They were,—1st. Kneeling at the sacrament. 2d. Private communion. 3d. Private baptism. 4th. Confirmation of children; and, 5th. The observation of holydays.

ARTICLES OF SMALCALT, certain articles drawn up at that place by Luther, on occasion of the meeting of the electors, princes, and states. They were principally designed to show how far the Lutherans were disposed to go in order to avoid a final rupture, and in what sense they were willing to adopt the doctrine of Christ's presence in the eucharist. The terms in which they are expressed are somewhat dubious, and not so harsh and irritating as those employed in the Confession, the Apology, and the Form of Concord.

ARTICLES, LAMBETH.—The Lambeth articles were so called, because drawn up at Lambeth palace, under the eye and with the assistance of Archbishop Whitgift, Bishop Bancroft, Bishop Vaughan, and other eminent dignitaries of the church. That the reader may judge how Calvinistic the clergy were under the reign of Queen Elizabeth, we shall here insert them. "1. God hath, from eternity, predestinated certain persons to life, and hath reprobated certain persons unto death.

2. The moving or efficient cause of predestination unto life is not the foresight of faith, or of perseverance, or of good works, or of any thing that is in the persons predestinated; but the alone will of God's good pleasure.

3. The predestinati are a predetermined and certain number, which can neither be lessened nor increased. 4. Such as are not predestinated to salvation shall inevitably be condemned on account of their sins. 5. The true, lively, and justifying faith, and the Spirit of God justifying, is not extinguished, doth not utterly fail, doth not vanish away in the elect, either finally or totally.

6. A true believer, that is, one who is endued with justifying faith, is certified by the full assurance of faith that his sins are forgiven, and that he shall be everlastingly saved by Christ. 7. Saving grace is not allowed, is not imparted, is not granted to all men, by which they may be saved if they will. 8. No man is able to come to Christ, unless it be given him, and unless the Father draw him; and all men are not drawn by the Father, that they may come to his Son. 9. It is not in the will or power of every man to be saved."

What gave occasion to the framing these articles was this:—Some persons had distinguished themselves at the university of Cambridge by opposing predestination. Alarmed at the opinions that were vented, the above-mentioned archbishop, with others, composed these articles, to prevent the belief of a contrary doctrine. These, when completed, were sent down to Cambridge, to which the scholars were strictly enjoined to conform.

ARTICLES, SIX, an act which passed both houses of parliament, and obtained the assent of Henry VIII., by which the whole body of popery was restored, and which consisted of the following points:—That in the sacrament of the altar, after the consecration, there remaineth no substance of bread and wine, but the natural body and blood of Christ; that communion in both kinds is not necessary; that priests, according to the law of God, may not marry; that vows of chastity ought to be observed; that private masses ought to be continued; and that auricular confession is expedient and necessary, and ought to be retained in the church. Archbishop Cramer made a noble stand against this act while it was passing the House of Lords, and disputed every inch of ground, but all his efforts were ineffectual.

ARTICLES, THIRTY-NINE, of the church of England, were founded, for the most part, upon a body of articles compiled and published in the reign of Edward VI. They were first passed in the convocation, and confirmed by royal authority in 1562. They were ratified anew in 1571, and again by Charles I. To these the law requires the subscription of all persons ordained to be de-cons or priests (13 Eliz. cap. 12); of all clergymen inducted to any ecclesiastical living (by the same statute); of licensed lecturers and curates (13 Eliz. cap. 12 and 13; and 14 Ch. II. cap. 4); of the heads of colleges, of chancellors, officials and commissaries, and of schoolmasters. By stat. William III. cap. 10, dissenting teachers are to subscribe to all except the 34th, 35th, 36th, and part of the 20th; and in the case of Anabaptists, except also part of the 27th. By the 19th Geo. III., cap. 44, however, dissenting preachers need only profess in writing to be Christians and Protestants, and that they believe the Scriptures to be the revealed will of God; and schoolmasters need neither sign the articles nor such professions.

ARTOTYRITES, a Christian sect in the primitive church, who celebrated the eucharist with bread and cheese. The word is derived from apros, "bread," and typos, "cheese." The Artotyrites admitted women to the priesthood and episcopacy; and Epiphanius tells us that it was a common thing to see seven girls at once enter into their church, robed in white, and holding a torch in their hand; where they wept and bewailed the wretchedness of human nature, and the miseries of this life.

ASCENSION DAY, a festival in memory of Jesus Christ's ascending up into heaven, after his resurrection, in his human nature, and in the presence of his disciples. The Cappadocian Christians called this festival by the name of Episozomene, perhaps because on that day our salvation was perfected, Jesus Christ having finished the business of his mission, and returned back to heaven. The ancient church was a stranger to the ridiculous pagantry mentioned by Hospinian to have been used in some places, to represent Christ's ascension into heaven; namely, the drawing up an image of Christ to the roof of the church, and then casting down the image of Satan, in flames, to represent his falling as lightning from heaven.

The ceremonies on the festival of the Ascension, in the Romish church, are as follows:—After the gospel, the paschal taper is put out, to denote that on that day our Saviour left the earth, and returned to heaven. The altar is adorned with flowers, images, and relics; upon which occasion the officiating priest, and his attendants, are robed in their white ornaments. The blessing which the pope pronounces on that day is one of the three solemn ones: anciently he used to excommunicate the heretics on this day, but that ceremony is now confined to Holy Thursday.

Eusebius relates, as a received tradition, that near the place from whence our Saviour ascended into heaven (which was the highest part of the mount of Olives) there was a cave in which our Lord communicated the most hidden mysteries of his doctrine to his disciples before his ascension.

The author of the treatise (under the name of Jerome) on the places mentioned in the Acts, affirms that Jesus Christ, when he ascended up into heaven, left the print of his feet on the ground, and that the marks continued ever after, notwithstanding that the faithful every day carried away the earth of that place to preserve it out of devotion. And Austin affirms, that the Christians used to travel into Judea, to adore the footsteps of Jesus Christ, at the place from whence he ascended into heaven.

To this pretended miracle another is added,—which is, that the Empress Helena having built the magnificent church of the Ascension, in the midst of which is this spot of ground, when the workmen would have covered it with a marble pavement like the rest, they could not effect it, whatever they laid upon the place immediately quitting it.

This festival was celebrated at Jerusalem in the eighth century, with so great a number of lights, in this church of the Ascension, that it seemed as if the whole mount of Olives was on fire. Bede, who relates this, adds, that on this festival, there always came so strong a wind after the mass, that it threw down all who were at that time in the church. What will not credulity believe?

ASCETICS, such as injured themselves to greater degrees of abstinence and fasting than other men; as those mentioned by Origen, who abstained from flesh and living creatures, in order to mortify and subdue their passions. Such abstinence the apostolical canons call ἀσκησις, the exercise of an ascetic life. So that all who abstained from flesh, on account of mortification, not out of an opinion of its uncleanness (as some heretics did), were called Ascetics. The same appellation was given to those, who were more than ordinarily intent on the exercises of prayer and devotion. Accordingly Cyril of Jerusalem calls the prophetess Anna, who departed not from the temple, but served God night and day, Ἀσκήτρια εὐλαβιστάτη, the most religious ascetic. In short, every kind of uncommon piety and virtue laid claim to the name. Whence it appears that the ascetics were not originally the same with monks, as Baronius, and the generality of the Romish writers pretend they were. Ascetics had been long in the church; but the monastic life was not known till towards the fourth century. The difference between ascetics and monks is this:—1. The monks were men who retired from the business and conversation of the world to some distant mountain, or desert wilderness; but the first ascetics were men of an active life, living in cities as other men, and differing from them only in the heights to which they carried their virtue. 2. The monks were to be only laymen; but the ascetics were indifferently of any order. 3. The monks were tied up to certain rules and laws of discipline; but the ancient ascetics were governed by no laws but those of the gospel. In short, though every monk is an ascetic, every ascetic is not a monk; the former appellation being of a more general import than the latter.

A monastery has sometimes the name Asceterium given it. The college of Undertakers (Funerarii), founded by the emperor Anastasius, in which eight monks, and three acolythists, were employed in burying the dead, was also called by this name; as appears from the confirmation of it by the emperor Justinian.

ASCODROGITES, a denomination which arose about the year 181. They brought into their churches bags or skins filled with new wine, to represent the new bottles filled with new wine, mentioned by Christ. They danced round these bags or skins, and, it is said, intoxicated themselves with the wine.

ASCOODRUTES, a sect, in the second century, who rejected the use of all symbols and sacraments on this principle, that incorporeal things cannot be communicated by things corporeal, nor divine mysteries by any thing visible.

ASH-WEDNESDAY, the first day of Lent. It is so called from the custom observed in the ancient church, of penitents expressing their humiliation at this time, by appearing in sackcloth and ashes. But it is not certain that this was always done precisely on Ash-Wednesday, there being a perfect silence in the most ancient writers about it. The discipline used towards penitents in Lent, as described by Gratian, differed from their treatment at other times; for on Ash-Wednesday they were presented to the bishop, clothed in sackcloth, and barefooted: then the seven penitential psalms were sung; after which the bishop laid his hands on them, sprinkled them with holy water, and poured ashes upon their heads; declaring to them that as Adam was cast out of paradise, so they, for their sins, were cast out of the church. Then the inferior ministers expelled them out of the doors of the church. In the end of Lent, on the Thursday before Easter, they were again presented for reconciliation by the deacons and presbyters at the gates of the church. But this method of treating penitents in Lent carries with it the marks of a more modern practice; for there was no use of holy water in the ancient discipline; nor seven penitential psalms in their service, but only one, viz. the fifty-first. Neither was Ash-Wednesday anciently the first day of Lent, till Gregory the Great first added it to Lent, to make the number of fasting days completely forty, which before were but thirty-six. Nor does it appear that anciently the time of imposing penance was confined to the beginning of Lent, but was granted at all times, whenever the bishop thought the penitent qualified for it. In Rome the spectacle on this occasion is most ridiculous. After giving themselves up to all kinds of gaiety and licentiousness, during the carnival, till twelve o'clock on the Tuesday night, the people go on Ash-Wednesday morning into the churches, when the officiating priests put ashes on their heads, repeating the words, "Dust thou art, and unto dust thou shalt return."

The want of this discipline in the English church is at present supplied by reading publicly, on Ash-Wednesday, the curses denounced in the holy Scriptures against several sorts of sins, the people repeating, after each curse, Amen.

ASMONÆAN DYNASTY, the family of the Maccabees, who, after successfully opposing the kings of Syria, established the independence of their country; and, uniting in the persons of their princes the pontifical and kingly dignity, conducted the affairs of the regenerated state for a period of a hundred and twenty-six years. It lost its influence in the year 39 B.C., when Judea was reduced by the Romans to a military province.

ASSEMBLIES OF THE CLERGY are called convocations, synods, councils. The annual meeting of the church of Scotland is called a General Assembly. In this assembly his Majesty is represented by his commissioner, who dissolves one meeting and calls another in the name of the king, while the moderator does the same in the name of Jesus Christ. See CONVOCATION, PRESBYTERIANS.

ASSEMBLY OF DIVINES, a synod convoked at Westminster on the first of July, 1643, by an "ordinance of the Lords and Commons in Parliament; for settling the government and liturgy of the church of England." It consisted of a hundred and twenty clergymen, and sixty laymen, chosen from the most learned and pious persons in the nation. Commissioners were sent from the General Assembly of the church of Scotland to co-operate with them. There existing among them great unanimity as to doctrinal sentiments, they agreed to publish the celebrated Confession of Faith, and Larger and Shorter Catechisms, which were ratified and adopted by the kirk of Scotland, and continue to be its standards to the present day. The latter are also used for the instruction of children by a large proportion of English Dissenters. On subjects of church government and discipline the members of the Assembly differed so widely from each other, that they could agree on no common system: some being jure divino prelatists, some solemn-league-and-covenant presbyterians, some tolerating independents, and some latitudinarian erastians. It, therefore, broke up without accomplishing the principal end for which it was convened.

ASSENT, that act of the mind whereby it takes or acknowledges any proposition to be true or false. There are three degrees of assent :—conjecture, opinion, and belief. Conjecture is but a slight and weak inclination to assent to the thing proposed, by reason of the weighty objections that lie against it. Opinion is a more steady and fixed assent, when a man is almost certain, though yet some fear of the contrary remains with him. Belief is a more full and assured assent to the truth. See BELIEF.

ASSUMPTION, a festival in the Romish church, in honour of the pretended miraculous ascent of the Virgin, body and soul, into heaven. It was established in the seventh century, and fixed to the 15th of August. The assumption of Mary was not always a point of faith; the ancient martyrologies speak of it with very great reserve, as a thing not fully ascertained; yet is it at present universally believed in the Romish church, and a divine who should deny it would be obliged to retract.

Some authors relate that the apostles, who had separated in order to propagate the gospel, met all together at the solemnity of the Virgin's funeral. The pretended Dionysius Areopagita gives us a list of all those who were present. Juvenal, bishop of Jerusalem, Andreas Cretensis, and John Damascene, believed that the apostles were wrapped in a cloud and wafted through the air by an angel, and set down at Gethsemane, the place of her interment. After she had been buried three days, Thomas, happening to come thither from Ethiopia, desired to see the Virgin's face one more; but, when the grave-stone, to satisfy his curiosity, was removed, they found nothing but clothes; which made them conclude that our Saviour had rescued this holy body from the state of corruption, and given it the privilege of immortality.

The Greek church celebrates the festival of the Assumption on the 15th of August: concerning the original of which festival, the Greeks relate the following story.

Three days after the sleeping of the Mother of God, (for the Greeks call this festival Dormitio Deipara), the apostles being assembled together, according to a custom established among them from the day of their Lord's ascension, deposited a piece of bread on a cushion, to distinguish both the dignity and seat of their master. While they were assembled together, the room on a sudden was filled with an unusual light, and the Virgin appeared to them, surrounded with rays of glory, and attended by a numerous host of angels. At her entrance, she paid her respects to the apostles, and said to them, "God be with you; I will never leave you, nor forsake you." The apostles, surprised and transported, replied, "O, ever blessed Virgin-Mother of God, grant us thy aid!" After that the Virgin vanished out of their sight. The apostles thereupon cried out, "The Queen is ascended into heaven, and there sits on the right hand of her Son!"

In commemoration of this event, the Greeks, on this festival, deliver a loaf, three lighted wax-tapers, some incense, and fire, into the hands of the priest, who cuts off the crust of the loaf in the form of a triangle, sets the three wax tapers upon the crust, and then thurifies, and blesses the bread. Afterwards he delivers the bread to the youngest person then present, who distributes it among the whole congregation.

On this festival likewise, they perform the ceremony of the benediction of their lands, by virtue of a small bough, with three leaves upon it, some gum, a little wax, and a sprig of a strawberry herb, blessed by the priest, and planted afterwards in the middle of their grounds.

There was an apocryphal book, intitled The Assumption of Moses. It was written in Hebrew, and contains an account of the death of Moses, and the conveyance of his soul to paradise. It is believed that the particulars of the angel Michael's contention with the devil about the body of Moses was taken from this work.

There was also an apocryphal book, intitled The Assumption of the Virgin, of which John the Evangelist was said to be the author.

ASSURANCE is the firm persuasion we have of the certainty of any thing, or a certain expectation of something future.

Assurance of the Understanding is a well-grounded knowledge of divine things founded on God's word. Col. ii. 2.—Assurance of Faith does not relate to our personal interest in Christ, but consists in a firm belief of the revelation that God has given us of Christ in his word, with an entire dependence on him. Heb. x. 22.—Assurance of Hope is a firm expectation that God will grant us the complete enjoyment of what he has promised. Heb. vi. 11.

The doctrine of assurance, i. e. the belief that we have a personal or actual interest in the Divine favour, has afforded matter for dispute among divines. Some have asserted that it is not to be obtained in the present state, allowing that persons may be in a hopeful way to salvation, but that they have no real or absolute assurance of it; but this is clearly refuted by fact as well as by Scripture. That it is to be obtained is evident, for we have reason to believe many persons have actually obtained it. Job xix. 25. Psal. xvii. 15. 2 Tim. i. 12. The Scriptures exhort us to obtain it. 2 Cor. xiii. 5. Heb. vi. 11. 1 Thess. v. 21. The Holy Spirit is said to bear witness of it. Rom. viii. 16. The exercise of the Christian graces is considered as a proof of it. 1 John ii. 3; iii. 14. We must, however, guard against presumption; for a mere persuasion that Christ is ours, is no proof that he is so. We must have evidence before we can have genuine assurance. It is necessary to observe also, that it is not a duty imposed upon all mankind, so that every one, in whatsoever state he may be, ought to be fully persuaded of his salvation. "We do not affirm," says Saurin, "that Christians, of whose sincerity there may be some doubt, have a right to assurance; that backsliders, as such, ought to persuade themselves that they shall be saved; nor do we say that Christians who have arrived to the highest degree of holiness can be persuaded of the certainty of their salvation in every period of their lives; nor, if left to their own efforts, can they enjoy it; but believers, supported by the Divine aid, who walk in all good conscience before him, these only have ground to expect this privilege."

Some divines have maintained that assurance is included in the very essence of faith, so that a man cannot have faith without assurance; but we must distinguish between assurance and justifying faith. The apostle, indeed, speaks of the full assurance of faith; but then this is a full and firm persuasion of what the Gospel reveals; whereas the assurance we are speaking of relates to our personal interest in Christ, and is an effect of this faith, and not faith itself. Faith in Christ certainly includes some idea of assurance; for except we be assured that he is the Saviour, we shall never go to or rely upon him as such: but faith in Christ does not imply an assurance of our interest in him; for there may be faith long before the assurance of personal interest commences. The confounding of these ideas has been the cause of presumption on the one hand, and despair on the other. When men have been taught that faith consists in believing that Christ died for them, and been assured that if they can only believe so, all is well, and that then they are immediately pardoned and justified, the consequence has been, that the bold and self-conceited have soon wrought themselves up to such a persuasion, without any ground for it, to their own deception; whilst the dejected, humble, and poor in spirit, not being able to work themselves to such a pitch of confidence, have concluded that they have not the faith of God's elect, and must inevitably be lost.

The means to attain assurance are not those of an extraordinary kind, as some people imagine; such as visions, dreams, voices, &c., but such as are ordinary: self-examination, humble and constant prayer, consulting the sacred oracles, Christian communication, attendance on the divine ordinances, and perseverance in the path of duty; without which all our assurance is but presumption, and our profession but hypocrisy.

Assurance may be lost for a season through bodily diseases which depress the spirits, unwatchfulness, falling into sin, manifold temptations, worldly cares, and neglect of private duty. Let him, therefore, who would wish to enjoy this privilege, cultivate communion with God, exercise a watchful spirit against his spiritual enemies, and give himself unreservedly to Him whose he is, and whom he professes to serve. ASSURANCE, THE, a test fixed by the parliament in 1680, when it repealed the Act of Supremacy in Scotland, and established presbytery, by which all that should be elected to fill any vacancy that should happen in parliament, were obliged to declare before God, that they believed William and Mary to be King and Queen de jure as well as de facto, and engaged to defend their title as such. The same, together with the oath of Allegiance, was required to be signed by all in any public trust or office, civil, military, or ecclesiastical.

ASYLUM, a place of refuge among the ancients, such as the temples and statues of the gods, from which it was deemed an act of impiety forcibly to remove any who had fled to it for protection. The custom passed over into the professedly Christian world. Under Constantine the Great, all the churches were asylums for those who were pursued by the officers of justice or the violence of their enemies. The younger Theodosius extended the privilege to all courts, gardens, walks, and houses belonging to the churches. The Franks confirmed the privilege; and in 681 the Synod of Toledo extended the limits to thirty paces from every church. This ecclesiastical privilege has since prevailed in all Catholic countries. It remained inviolate at least in Italy, while the papal government retained its independence; but in modern times it has been abolished in most countries. The late Pope Leo X., however, on his accession to the apostolical see, re-established the asylums, which had been put down by his predecessor, Pius VII.; the principal consequence of which was, the affording to the robbers in the papal dominions a better opportunity to escape the pursuit of the Austrian troops.

ATHANASIAN CREED. A formulary, or confession of faith, said to have been drawn up by Athanasius, bishop of Alexandria, in the fourth century, to justify himself against the calumnies of his Arian enemies. Gregory Nazianzen calls it a royal gift, which he presented to the emperor, received with great veneration both in the East and West.

Most writers, before Vossius, took it for granted that this creed was really Athanasius's, but that learned critic endeavoured to show that it was not his; that it was originally a Latin composition, and by a Latin author; that it cannot be carried higher than the year 600; and that the first time it was cited as Athanasius's was by the legates of Gregory IX. at Constantinople, in the year 1233. But the learned Usher contends, that it was cited as Athanasius's almost 400 years before the time of Pope Gregory's legates; and he scrupled not to set the date of it higher than the year 447. Paschasius Quesnel, an eminent French divine, ascribes this creed to Vigilius Tapsensis, the African, in the fifth century; in which opinion he has almost drawn the whole learned world after him. However it be, and whoever was the author of it, that this creed is of great antiquity appears from a cloud of ancient testimonies.

As to its reception in the Christian churches, we find that it obtained in France in the time of Hincmar, or about 850; that it was received in Spain about a hundred years later than in France, and in Germany much about the same time. As to our own country, we have clear and positive proofs of its being sung alternately in the churches in the tenth century. It was in common use in some parts of Italy, particularly in the diocese of Verona, about the year 960, and was received at Rome about the year 1014. As to the Greek and Oriental churches, it has been questioned whether any of them received it at all; though some very considerable writers are of a contrary persuasion.

Dr. Waterland, after endeavouring to show that this creed must have been composed earlier than the times of Nestorius, or the Ephesine council of the year 431,—because, among other reasons, it does not condemn the Nestorian heresy in such full, direct, and critical terms as the Catholics found to be necessary against the wiles and subtleties of those men,—thinks none more likely to compose such a creed, than Hilary, bishop of Arles, a celebrated man of that time, and of chief repute in the Gallican church. His reasons are, 1. Because Hilary was made bishop in Gaul about the year 429. 2. He was a man of great parts and capacity. 3. Honoratus of Marseilles, the writer of his life, tells us that Hilary composed an Exposition of the Creed; a more proper title for the Athanasian, than that of Creed, simply, which it now bears. 4. Hilary was a great admirer and follower of Austin; and the whole composition of this creed is in a manner upon Austin's plan, both with respect to the Trinity and incarnation. 5. It is agreeable to the style of Hilary, as far as we can judge from the little that is left of his works. He concludes from these reasons, that Hilary, bishop of Arles, about the year 430, composed The Exposition of Faith, which now bears the name of the Athanasian Creed, for the use of the Gallican clergy, and particularly those of the diocese of Arles:

that about the year 570, it became famous enough to be commented upon; but that all this while, and for several years lower, it had not yet acquired the name of Athanasian, but was simply styled The Catholic Faith; that before 670, Athanasius's admired name came in to recommend and adorn it, being in itself an excellent system of the Athanasian principles of the Trinity and incarnation, in opposition chiefly to the Arians, Macedonians, and Apollinarians.

ATHANASIUS, the reputed author of the above creed, and the celebrated defender and advocate of the orthodox doctrine of the Trinity. He was born in Alexandria, about the year 290, where he had a Christian education, and came into the family of Alexander, afterwards archbishop of Alexandria, who appointed him to be his secretary. He next went to St. Anthony, with whom he led for some time an ascetic life, but at length returned to Alexandria, where he became a deacon. By Alexander he was taken to the Council of Nice, where he acquired the highest esteem of the fathers there assembled, by the talents which he displayed in the Arian controversy. He had a great hand in the decrees that were then passed, which circumstance brought on him the hatred of the Arians. In the course of six months he was appointed the successor of Alexander; but the complaints and accusations of his enemies induced the Emperor Constantine to summon him, in 334, before the Councils of Tyre and Jerusalem. Having brought to light the iniquitous arts which had been practised against him, he threw his judges, who were likewise his enemies, into such confusion, that the imperial deputies could, with difficulty, rescue him from their anger. But they could only formally suspend him from his office. He continued to perform its duties till the emperor, deceived by new falsehoods, banished him to Treves. The death, however, of Constantine put an end to this banishment, at the end of one year and a few months. He was recalled by Constantius, and his entrance into Alexandria resembled a triumph. Having again been condemned by an assembly of ninety Arian bishops, assembled at Antioch, his cause was taken up, and he was declared innocent by a hundred orthodox bishops, who met at Alexandria:—a sentence which was confirmed by Pope Julius, in conjunction with more than three hundred bishops, both of the east and the west, assembled at Sardis. In the reign of Constans, he was condemned a third time in the councils of Arles and Milan, and obliged to flee into the remotest part of the Egyptian deserts, where he addicted himself to study, and composed most of his writings. He returned again under Julian the Apostate, who had given liberty to the exiled orthodox bishops to return to their dioceses; but was soon re-banished; was brought back on the accession of Jovian, but once more compelled to flee, in the reign of Valens, when he concealed himself four months in the tomb of his father, till, the influence of the inhabitants of Alexandria at length prevailing, he was permitted to return, and after a life of perpetual vicissitude, to spend his few remaining days in tranquillity. He died in 373, after filling the episcopal office forty-six years.

Athanasius was certainly one of the greatest men of whom orthodoxy can boast. His penetrating mind, his noble and generous disposition, his invincible courage, his living faith, his unbounded benevolence, sincere humility, lofty eloquence, and strictly virtuous life, procured him the esteem and love of all, excepting those whose bigoted attachment to the tenets which he opposed prevented them from perceiving or acknowledging his excellences. His writings are on polemical, historical, and moral subjects. The polemical treat chiefly of the doctrines of the Trinity, the incarnation of Christ, and the divinity of the Holy Spirit. His style is distinguished, considering the age in which he wrote, by its perspicuity and moderation. His Apology, addressed to Constantine, is a masterpiece. The best edition of his works is that of Montfaucon, 3 vols. fol. Paris, 1698.

ATHEIST, from the Greek a, privative, and theos, God, one who denies the existence of God:—this is called speculative atheism. Professing to believe in God, and yet acting contrary to this belief, is called practical atheism. Absurd and irrational as atheism is, it has had its votaries and martyrs. In the seventeenth century, Spinoza, a foreigner, was its noted defender. Lucilio Vanini, a native of Naples, also publicly taught atheism in France; and being convicted of it at Toulouse, was, in the spirit of the times, condemned and executed in 1619. It has been questioned, however, whether any man ever seriously adopted such a principle. The pretensions to it have been generally founded on pride or affectation; and it has always been found to prevail most in degenerate times, as among the Greeks, after Pericles, and among the Romans, after Augustus. The open avowal of atheism too by several of the leading members of the French Convention, seems to have been an extraordinary moral phenomenon, but may be traced to similar causes. It was, however, too vague and uncomfortable a principle to last long. Archbishop Tillotson justly observes, that speculative atheism is unreasonable upon five accounts:—1. Because it gives no tolerable account of the existence of the world. 2. It does not give any reasonable account of the universal consent of mankind in this apprehension, that there is a God. 3. It requires more evidence for things than they are capable of giving. 4. The atheist pretends to know that which no man can know. 5. Atheism contradicts itself. Under the first of these he thus argues:—"I appeal to any man of reason whether any thing can be more unreasonable than obstinately to impute an effect to chance which carries in the very face of it all the arguments and characters of a wise design and contrivance? Was ever any considerable work, in which there was required a great variety of parts, and a regular and orderly disposition of those parts, done by chance? Will chance fit means to ends, and that in ten thousand instances, and not fail in any one? How often might a man, after he had jumbled a set of letters in a bag, fling them out upon the ground before they would fall into an exact poem—yea, or so much as make a good discourse in prose? and may not a little book be as easily made by chance as the great volume of the world? How long might a man be in sprinkling colours upon canvas with a careless hand, before they would happen to make the exact picture of a man? And is a man easier made by chance than his picture? How long might twenty thousand blind men, who should be sent out from several remote parts of England, wander up and down before they would all meet on Salisbury Plain, and fall into rank and file in the exact order of an army? And, yet, this is much more easy to be imagined than how the innumerable blind parts of matter should rendezvous themselves into a world. A man that sees Henry the Seventh's Chapel at Westminster, might with as good reason maintain (yea, with much better, considering the vast difference between that little structure and the huge fabric of the world) that it was never contrived or built by any means, but that the stones did by chance grow into those curious figures into which they seem to have been cut and graven; and that upon a time (as tales usually begin) the materials of that building, the stone, mortar, timber, iron, lead, and glass, happily met together, and very fortunately ranged themselves into that delicate order in which we see them now so closely compacted, that it must be a very great chance that parts them again. What would the world think of a man that should advance such an opinion as this, and write a book for it? If they would do him right, they ought to look upon him as mad; but yet with a little more reason than any man can have, to say that the world was made by chance, or that the first men grew up out of the earth as plants do now. For can any thing be more ridiculous, and against all reason, than to ascribe the production of men to the first fruitfulness of the earth, without so much as one instance or experiment, in any age or history, to countenance so monstrous a supposition? The thing is, at first sight, so gross and palpable, that no discourse about it can make it more apparent. And yet, these shameful beggars of principles give this precarious account of the original of things; assume to themselves to be the men of reason, the great wits of the world, the only cautious and wary persons that hate to be imposed upon, that must have convincing evidence for every thing, and can admit of nothing without a clear demonstration of it!" See EXISTENCE of GOD.

Some of the principal writers on the existence of a Deity have been Newton, Boyle, Cheyne, Locke, Newwentyt, Derham, Bentley, Ray, Cudworth, Samuel and John Clarke, Abernethy, Balguy, Baxter, Fenelon, &c. &c. See also the Bridgewater Treatises. Tillotson's sermon on the subject, as quoted above, has been considered as one of the best in the English language. See Ser. i. vol. 1.

ΑΤΗΟΣ, a mountain in the province of Salonica, in European Turkey, about 5000 feet in height, the sides of which are covered with about twenty monasteries, and a vast multitude of hermitages, which contain more than six thousand monks, mostly Russian, of the order of St. Basil. Here they live in a state of complete abstraction from the world; and so strict are their regulations, that they do not tolerate any female being, not even of the class of domestic animals, among them. They are now chiefly occupied in carving little images of the saints, which they send down to the market-town of Kareis, where a weekly market is held, and where purchases are made for various parts, especially Russia; but formerly they were occupied with the nobler work of transcription. The holy mountain (ἅγιον ὄρος) is considered one of the most important seminaries for instruction among the Greeks; and the libraries of the monasteries are particularly rich in MSS. and other literary treasures, partly procured from Constantinople before its conquest by the Turks, and partly copied by the laborious monks. Many works have, of late years, been purchased by travellers, and have thus found their way into various libraries of Europe. The monasteries and churches on this mountain are the only ones in the Ottoman empire that have bells.

ATONEMENT. The atonement made by the death of Christ is an essential article in the plan of redemption revealed in the Scriptures—an article that forms the grand peculiarity of the gospel, and without which we cannot understand the New Testament, or attain to correct views, either of the ways of God, or of the duties of man. To comprehend the character, and see the importance of the atonement of Christ, it is first necessary that we should have distinct views of the nature of sin, and the character in which Jehovah demands and accepts of substitution. From the neglect of these points, have arisen most of the objections urged against the atonement, as well as the absurd conclusions which the doctrine has been supposed to afford. Sin has been represented merely as a personal insult to God; and the atonement, as a suffering required before that offence could be forgiven. Such an idea seems unworthy of the Supreme Being. Others have considered sin purely as a debt, and the atonement as the payment of a sum equivalent to it, and by which the prisoners are liberated; this of necessity excludes the grace of pardon; and since the pardon of sin is uniformly represented in Scripture an act of free grace and infinite mercy, a scheme that supersedes the grace of pardon we must necessarily reject as unscriptural. Besides these and other partial views of sin, Jehovah has been regarded merely as an absolute sovereign, which has occasioned much confusion, and naturally provoked such objections as these: "Why is not pardon dispensed freely, unconditionally? What evil consequences could ensue? Jehovah cannot be injured by any of his creatures; what need of atonement?" To obviate these difficulties, we are then particularly to consider,—1. That sin is the transgression of a law, which like all laws, in order to be supported and rendered efficient, must be strictly regarded in its penalties; and 2. That Jehovah, in demanding an atonement, acts not as an absolute sovereign; but as a just governor, directed not by sovereign will, but by the laws of the constitution. From these views of sin, and of the divine character, it appears, that the atonement supports the dignity of the law, and leaves it, though the criminal be pardoned, as efficient as if its utmost penalties were inflicted, as honourable as if its precepts had never been violated. From this view of the nature of the atonement, we see its necessity. Had sin, as already observed, been no other than an insult or a debt to God, as the absolute Lord of all, he might, as far as we can judge, in the exercise of his infinite mercy, pardon sin without an atonement. But sin being a transgression of law, whatever penalty this law threatens for its violation must be inflicted, or the law itself be destroyed. Let the penalties of a code be disregarded, and the law is transgressed with impunity; it is no longer of any service to the state, it secures neither the throne of the sovereign, nor the rights of the subject. The law which man hath transgressed is the moral law—the law which embodies principles that must characterise the divine government of all intelligent beings throughout all worlds. To pardon sin, therefore, without an atonement, would destroy this law—would loose the bands of this government; nothing but confusion and ruin would reign through heaven, earth, and hell. The language of every self-willed creature would be, "let every creature's will be the rule of his conduct. We have a law to direct our conduct, but there is no penalty to enforce obedience; what is described a penalty is only an empty threat; death and misery are indeed denounced; man has transgressed, yet he lives and is happy." The individual is spared, but the community is sacrificed, and the whole system of moral government subverted. Now, substitute the atonement; let all that are subject to the moral law consider well its enactments; let them gaze with astonishment at the inflexible justice of this "stern guardian of the public weal." Where is it best displayed? Not in the sufferings of the criminal, but in the death of the substitute—not in the sufferings of guilty man, but in the death of the Son of God! Surely, at this sight apostate angels must feel their despair increase tenfold! Seeing the law which they have violated spares not the Son of God, must not holy angels, and all intelligent, accountable beings, through the universe of God, be struck with astonishment at the unyielding strictness of the law, and be deeply impressed with the conviction that the law is inviolable and must be obeyed. This is all that was necessary. Sovereign grace may, yes, may pardon, for now there is no compulsion; evil results will not follow, for the exercise of grace is maintained; the bands of moral government are strengthened a hundredfold. Why is the condemned criminal put to death? Not to pacify the legislature; for, as an individual, there exists no angry feeling towards him: not even to guard against his future delinquency; this might be done otherwise. Why then is he led to execution? He suffers to preserve the state from ruin. The well-being of the community is at stake, the penalty threatened by the law must be inflicted, or the law is destroyed—the bulwark of public protection is demolished. Now it appears, that should a substitute of equal rank in the kingdom voluntarily propose to die, and the legislature accept his offer, in that case, the death of a substitute (the criminal giving approved security for future conduct) would answer all the ends intended by the death of the criminal; for the penalty threatened is inflicted, and the subjects are taught that the law must be obeyed. The illustration fails, however, in two points—the substitute, in this case, being of equal rank with the criminal, to satisfy the law, the substitute must suffer the VERY SAME penalty that the criminal deserved: the law derives no support from the infinite superiority of the substitute; and also, man being no absolute proprietor of his life, substitution would be unlawful. The infinite superiority of the Redeemer, and the power he had to lay down his life, need no proof, or the necessary consequences therefrom resulting any explanation. Hence (for further illustration) from what partial and erroneous views proceeds the sentiment, "God is too merciful to punish sinners eternally." Upon the same principle it might be said, "There will be no more criminals executed in England—his Majesty is too compassionate." Did it depend on his Majesty's compassion, we would grant it; but his Majesty rules England, not by his feelings, but by the laws of the constitution. Jehovah, as a just governor, regarding with the strictest exactness, with infinite concern, the laws of the constitution, will, from love to justice, and for the security and happiness of his government, inflict on every criminal the utmost threatenings of the law, except, as in the case of repenting sinners, he be freely pardoned, through the atoning merits of an approved substitute. Hence it is evident, 1. The extent of the atonement is unlimited. The atonement is not something commensurate with the crime, neither more nor less—exactly measured by the malignity and number of sins to be pardoned; such is not its nature. Its design, as above stated, is to enable the law, on certain terms, to suspend its penalties: and if the law can, on any terms, honourably suspend its threatenings in one case, it can, unquestionably, on the same terms, suspend them in a thousand cases. The terms are made known—there is no calculating of crimes—the offer is, Return to the Lord, he will have mercy; believe, and you are saved. 2. Salvation is of grace. The error that limits the atonement, brings this consequence necessarily in its train, that "Salvation is of debt." Jehovah is conceived bound to pardon, as an act of justice, to the full extent of the atonement, which has led some impiously to say, "The elect, by the death of Christ, stand on higher grounds than God—the Lord is their debtor." And such is the necessary, the inevitable consequence of considering the atonement as a mere payment of debt. But is it not so represented in Scripture? In this respect only. The debtor whose account is paid is liberated from the consequence of his debt; so is the pardoned sinner from the consequence of his sins. There is no PARDONING the debtor whose account is paid—his liberation is a matter of right; but there is, and there must be, if saved, pardon for the sinner, though an atonement is made. The atonement removes the obstacles. Sovereign grace that would pardon, now runs unchecked in its own channel, and mercy is as amply displayed, as if an atonement had never been made. 3. Our unbelief cannot cause Christ to have died in vain. The two grand articles immediately connected with the life and death of Christ—the honour of the law, and the glory of the divine perfections, are equally secured, whether we believe or disbelieve. If, through the death of Christ, Jehovah displays his love and mercy in offering pardon to rebellious man, they are equally conspicuous, whether the pardon be accepted or not. The love and grace of God cannot possibly be either lessened or magnified by our conduct. In the death of the Saviour, and the offer of pardon, they are, independently of our conduct, infinitely displayed and infallibly established. Notwithstanding, there is absolute certainty the Saviour shall see of the travail of his soul; but the certainty is not in Jehovah's being bound to pardon, but in the infinity of his grace, and the immutability of his counsels. Finally, We must repent and believe or be lost. The atonement, though complete, secures not the salvation of one single impenitent, unbelieving sinner. The nature of the atonement proves this, and the uniform language of Scripture is, "He that believeth not is condemned already, but whosoever believeth, and he only, shall not perish but have life everlasting." *Cong. ATTRIBUTES OF GOD are the several qualities or perfections of the Divine nature. Some distinguish them into the negative, and positive or affirmative. The negative are such as remove from him whatever is imperfect in creatures;—such are infinity, immutability, immortality, &c. The positive are such as assert some perfection in God, which is in and of himself, and which in the creatures, in any measure, is from him. This distinction is now mostly discarded. Some distinguish them into absolute and relative: absolute ones are such as agree with the essence of God—as Jehovah, Jah, &c.: relative ones are such as agree with him in time, with some respect to his creatures, as Creator, Governor, Preserver, Redeemer, &c. But the more commonly-received distinction of the attributes of God is into communicable and incommunicable ones. The communicable ones are those of which there is some resemblance in men—as goodness, holiness, wisdom, &c.: the incommunicable ones are such as there is no appearance or shadow of in men—as independence, immutability, immensity, and eternity. See those different articles in this work; and Bates, Charnock, Abernethy, Saurin on the Divine Perfections, H. F. Burder, Dwight, and Dick.

ATTRITION. The casuists of the church of Rome have made a distinction between a perfect and an imperfect contrition. The latter they call attrition; which is the lowest degree of repentance, or a sorrow for sin arising from a sense of shame, or any temporal inconvenience attending the commission of it, or merely from fear of the punishment due to it, without any resolution to sin no more. In consequence of which doctrine, they teach that, after a wicked and flagitious course of life, a man may be reconciled to God, and his sins forgiven on his death-bed, by confessing them to the priest, with this imperfect degree of sorrow and repentance. This distinction was settled by the Council of Trent. It might, however, be easily shown that the mere sorrow for sin, because of its consequences, and not on account of its evil nature, is no more acceptable to God than hypocrisy itself can be.—Jeremy Taylor's Works, vol. ix. pp. 237, 267; vol. x. p. 190.

AUDIENCES, an order of catechumens in the primitive Christian church. They were so called from their being admitted to hear sermons and the Scriptures read in the church; but they were not allowed to be present at the prayers.

AUGMENTATION, a term in Scotch ecclesiastical law, denoting a portion of the ancient tithes, placed under the superintendence of the Court of Session, and granted by them to an incumbent, as they shall see cause. The ordinary way of obtaining it is to raise a process before the courts.

AUGSBURG CONFESSION, the celebrated confession of faith, presented by the Protestants, at the Diet of Augsburg, 1530, to the Emperor and the diet, and being signed by the Protestant states, was adopted as their creed. The original draught of it was made by Luther, at the command of John, Elector of Saxony, at Torgau, and consisted of seventeen articles; but as the style appeared to be too violent, it was altered by Melancthon, by order of the Elector, and in compliance with the wishes of the body of the Protestant princes and divines. Thus changed, it was presented and read in the diet, June 25th. The original document is still preserved in the imperial archives of Austria; and from this the edition of Wittenberg, 1531, was printed. Melancthon further altered some of its articles afterwards, and a new edition, with his changes, appeared in 1540, when a division arose between those who held by the original and those who held by the altered edition. The former is received by the Lutherans, and the latter by the German reformed, who thereby secured to themselves, at the religious peace of 1555, the privileges which extended only to the adherents of the Augsburg Confession.

AUGUSTINE MONKS, a religious order in the Church of Rome, who follow the pretended rule of Augustine prescribed them by Pope Alexander IV., in the year 1250. There had arisen several religious orders in the thirteenth century—as the Preaching Brothers, founded by Dominic Guzman; the Minims, by St. Francis Assisius; and others. Innocent IV. formed a design of uniting several of these orders into one; which design was executed by his successor, Alexander IV., who made one congregation of them, under the name of Augustine Hermits.

At present, the order is divided into several branches—as the Hermits of St. Paul, the Ieronimitans, the Monks of St. Bridget, and the Bare-footed Augustines, instituted by a Portuguese in 1574, and confirmed by Pope Clement VIII. in 1600. As to the rule of Augustine, which they pretended to follow, it is briefly this. The Monks are to have all things in common: the rich, who enter into the order, are to sell their possessions, and give them to the poor: nothing is to be received, without leave of the superior: if it happens that the Monks are obliged, through persecution, to retire, they are to betake themselves immediately to the place whither their superior is withdrawn: they are to employ the first part of the morning in labouring with their hands, and the rest in reading: they have Saturday allowed them to provide themselves with necessaries, and are permitted to drink wine on Sundays: when they go abroad, they must always go two in a company: they are never to eat but in their monastery: they are forbidden to harbour the least thought of women: they are to receive no letters or presents in secret. These, with several other precepts, relating to charity, modesty, chastity, and other Christian virtues, constitute what they call the Rule of Augustine, which is read in the presence of the Monks once every week. The Augustines are clothed in black. At Paris they are known under the name of the Religious of St. Genevieve, that abbey being the chief of the order. There are nuns likewise of this order. At the beginning of the eighteenth century, the order numbered forty-two provinces; but their convents are now fewer. They are found in Italy, Spain, Portugal, Austria, and America. In 1817, Augustine nuns again appeared in Paris. Their number is thirty-two: they support themselves by their industry, educate two hundred poor children, and possess no landed property.

AUGUSTINE, St., one of the most renowned fathers of the Christian Church, was born at Tagaste, a small city in Africa, Nov. 13, 354. Patricius, his father, sent him to Madaura, to learn the classics, and afterwards to Carthage, to study rhetoric; but such were his idle and dissolute habits of life, that he greatly disappointed his expectations, and almost broke the heart of his pious mother, Monica, who nevertheless persevered in prayer for his conversion to God. After making himself master of the predicaments of Aristotle, and obtaining considerable knowledge of the liberal sciences, he began to teach rhetoric at Carthage, and met with great applause. Falling in with a book of Cicero's, called Hortensius, he was led to study philosophy; but not satisfied either with this or with himself, he went over to the sect of the Manichees, among whom he remained nine years, but without finding tranquillity either of mind or heart. Having abandoned this connexion, he went to Rome, where he taught rhetoric, and in 383 he was appointed public professor of the art at Milan, where he had an opportunity of becoming acquainted with, and hearing, the celebrated Ambrose, bishop of that city, whose eloquence made so deep an impression upon him, that he publicly embraced the Catholic faith, and experienced a partial reformation of character. It was not, however, till in consequence of having his attention particularly drawn to a copy of the Epistles of Paul, that a saving change of heart was effected. The passage which first struck him, and which appears from its applicability to his past life, to have been the means of his conversion, was Rom. xiii. 13, 14. Having renounced his professorship, he returned to Africa, where, in the year 391, he was ordained priest by Valerius, Bishop of Hippo; and, in 395, he was raised to be himself bishop of that see. He died in 430, in the seventy-sixth year of his age.

The "Confessions" of Augustine have long been celebrated for the developments of human nature which they contain; and his "City of God" is one of the greatest efforts of genius and learning; but what has most tended to give celebrity to his name, was his opposition to Pelagius, whose opinions on the subject of original sin and free will he considered to be subversive of the Scripture doctrines of salvation. In this controversy he was led to take up, and treat at large, the subjects of predestination, the depravity of human nature, and the operation of divine grace, respecting which his views are substantially those called Calvinistic; and, according to Petavius, such has been his authority in the Church, that not only all the fathers and doctors who came after him, but even the popes themselves, and the councils of other bishops, have maintained his doctrine as certain and catholic, and have all been of opinion that it was a sufficient proof of the truth of any dogma that Augustine had taught it.

He was a man of great diligence in his Christian profession, profound humility, sublime genius, and extensive learning. Though far inferior to Jerome, his contemporary and correspondent, in his knowledge of Biblical criticism, yet he was no contemptible critic; and in his interpretation of Scripture he frequently discovers a pertinency and soundness of judgment which we seldom meet with in that age. He was acquainted with the Greek, in which language he studied the Scriptures, and bestowed considerable pains in endeavouring to procure a better translation into Latin, though, from his ignorance of Hebrew, he was not capable of appreciating the true nature of the changes that were required in the common version.

AURICULAR, what is spoken into the ear, or privately—a term commonly applied to the private confession made to a priest. See CONFESSION.

AUSTIN (or AUGUSTINE), commonly called the Apostle of the English, flourished at the close of the sixth century, and was sent, with forty monks, by Gregory, to introduce the Catholic faith into the Saxon kingdoms. He was kindly received by Ethelbert, King of Kent, whom he soon converted; and such is the astonishing success which he is reported to have had, that he is said to have baptized ten thousand persons in one day. He was made Archbishop of Canterbury, in the cathedral of which see his relics were long preserved.

As the Bishop of Hippo and this missionary are both referred to by the names of Augustine or Austin, it is necessary that the reader should guard against confounding them.

AUTHENTICITY of the Scriptures, a term employed in a more general and extended sense, to denote that they really are what they profess to be—a revelation from God; but applied to the several books of which the inspired volume is composed, it denotes that these books were actually written by the persons whose names they bear, or to whom they are ascribed. In treating of the evidences, the proofs of authenticity first claim to be regarded; and then the proofs of credibility, it being perfectly obvious that a work may not in any degree be entitled to our belief as it regards its contents, which is furnished with the most incontestable evidence that it is the genuine production of the author. See EVIDENCES, and Marsh's Divin. Lect. xxiii. p. 2-5.

AUTHORITY, in matters religious and ecclesiastical, an assumed right of dictation, attributed to certain fathers, councils, or church courts. On this subject Bishop Headley writes—"Authority is the greatest and most irreconcilable enemy to truth and argument that this world ever furnished. All the sophistry, all the colour of plausibility, all the artifice and cunning of the subtlest disputer in the world may be laid open and turned to the advantage of that very truth which they are designed to hide; but against authority there is no defence." He shows that it was authority which crushed the noble sentiments of Socrates and others: and that by authority, the Jews and heathens combated the truth of the Gospel; and that, when Christians increased into a majority, and came to think the same method to be the only proper one for the advantage of their cause which had been the enemy and destroyer of it, then it was the authority of Christians, which, by degrees, not only laid waste the honour of Christianity, but well nigh extinguished it amongst men. It was authority which would have prevented all reformation where it is, and which has put a barrier against it wherever it is not.

The remark of Charles II. is worthy of notice—That those of the established faith make much of the authority of the Church in their disputes with dissenters; but that they take it all away when they deal with papists.

AUTO DA FE. See ACT OF FAITH.

AUTOCEPHALI (Gr.), persons who have no superior, or acknowledge no head. It is derived from αὐτός and κεφάλη, sui ipsius caput, his own head or chief. This denomination was given by the primitive Church to such bishops as were exempted from the jurisdiction of others. Before the setting up of patriarchs, all metropolitans were αὐτοκέφαλοι, being accountable to no superior but a synod; and, even after the advancement of patriarchs, several metropolitans continued thus independent—as the Archbishop of Cyprus, who, by a general decree of the Council of Ephesus, was freed from the jurisdiction of the Patriarch of Antioch; as also the metropolitans of Iberia and Armenia. This was likewise a privilege of the ancient British Church, before the coming of Austin the Monk, when the seven British bishops, which were all that then remained, paid obedience to the Archbishop of Caer-Leon, and acknowledged no superior in spirituals above him. And Dinotus, the learned Abbot of Bangor, told Austin, in the name of all the Britannie churches, that they owed no other obedience to the Pope than they did to every godly Christian.

Besides these, there was another sort of αὐτοκέφαλοι; namely—such bishops as were subject to no metropolitan, but only to the patriarch of the diocese. There were thirty-nine such bishops in the large patriarchate of Constantinople, twenty-five in that of Jerusalem, and sixteen in that of Antioch; but at what time this sort of independent bishoprics was first set up is uncertain. Valesius mentions another sort of αὐτοκέφαλοι, which were such bishops as were wholly independent of all others, having neither suffragans under them, nor metropolitans over them. Of these, the Bishop of Tomis in Scythia is an instance, who was the only bishop of all the cities of that province; but instances of this sort are very uncommon. Valesius, by mistake, and, in contradiction to Jerome, reckons the bishops of Jerusalem before they were advanced to the patriarchal dignity, among this sort of αὐτοκέφαλοι.

AUTOGRAPHS of the prophecies, gospels, &c. the identical or original documents written by the respective authors of the books of Scripture. Copies taken from these are termed apographs. None of these original MSS. are now remaining, nor could their preservation be expected, without the intervention of a miracle, during the space of nearly eighteen centuries. It seems exceedingly probable that Divine Providence permitted them to be early withdrawn from public inspection, lest, like other relics, they should become objects of idolatrous veneration. It is even asserted by Peter, Bishop of Alexandria, in the fourth century, that an original of John's Gospel was not only preserved, but worshipped, at Ephesus.—Michaelis, Introd. i. p. 250.

AVATAR, in Indian mythology, an incarnation of the Deity. According to the Hindoos, innumerable incarnations have taken place; but ten are particularly distinguished, and four of them are the subjects of Puranas, or sacred poems: these ten are the incarnations of Vishnu, the supreme god. The first was in the form of a fish; the second in that of a tortoise; the third in that of a boar; the fourth in that of a monster—half man, half lion; the fifth in that of a dwarf; the sixth as the son of Iarmadagni. All these took place in the satya yuga, or golden age: the others are more recent. The seventh is the descent of Vishnu, to destroy a giant; the eighth was to chastise other giants; the ninth had a similar object; and the tenth, which is yet to come, will take place at the end of the kali yuga, or the iron age of the world.

AVE-MARY or AVE-MARIA, (Hail Mary!) the Angel Gabriel's salutation of the Virgin Mary, when he brought her tidings of the incarnation. It is become a prayer, or form of devotion in the Romish Church. Their chaplets and rosaries are divided into so many Ave-Maries, and so many Pater Nosters. The Papists ascribe a wonderful efficacy to their Ave-Maries.

Dr. Bingham observes, that, among all the short prayers used by the ancients before their sermons, there is not the least mention of an Ave-Mary; and that its original can be carried no higher than the beginning of the fifteenth century. Vincentius Ferrerius was the first ecclesiastical writer that ever used it before his sermons; from whose example (he being a celebrated preacher in that age) it gained such authority, as not only to be prefixed to all their sermons, but to be joined with the Lord's-prayer, in the Roman Breviary.

AZYMITES, Christians who administer the eucharist, or holy communion with unleavened bread. The word is derived from the Greek ἄζυμος, sine fermento, which is compounded of the privative ἀ and ζύμη, fermentum. This practice occasioned great disputes, and at length a rupture, between the Latin and Greek churches.

The learned Dr. Bingham is of opinion that the use of wafers and unleavened bread was not known in the church till the eleventh or twelfth centuries, when the oblations of common bread began to be left off by the people; for so long as the people continued to offer bread and wine, the elements, for the use of the eucharist, were usually taken out of them; and, consequently, so long the bread was the common leavened bread, made use of upon other occasions. And he tells the following story in confirmation of this:—As Gregory the Great was administering the bread to a certain woman, in the usual form, The body of our Lord Jesus Christ, &c., she fell a laughing, and being asked the reason, said it was because he called that the body of Jesus Christ, which she knew to be bread that she had made with her own hands. Besides, the ancients say expressly, that their bread was common bread, such as they made for their own use upon other occasions; and it is further observable, that neither Photius, nor any other Greek writer, before Michael Cerularius, A. 1051, ever objected to the use of unleavened bread in the Romish Church; which they would no doubt have done, had that practice prevailed at the time they wrote.

But the schoolmen, who maintain that, during the first ages of the church, none but unleavened bread was used in the eucharist, say the primitive church did it in imitation of our Saviour himself, who celebrated the last supper with unleavened bread; but that, when the Ebionites arose, who held that all the observances prescribed by the Mosaic law were still in force, both the Eastern and Western churches took up the use of leavened bread, and, after the extinction of that heresy, the Western church returned to the azymus, the Eastern obstinately adhering to the former usage.

B.

BAAL (Heb. בַּעַל,) the name originally given to the tutelary god of the Phœnicians and Syrians, but afterwards extended to the gods of other nations, such as the Chaldeans, Babylonians, &c. It occurs frequently in Scripture, from which it appears that the Hebrews were peculiarly exposed to be seduced, and actually were often led away, by the worship of this idol. It is also preserved on Phœnician monuments and medals, and in many Punic names, as Hannibal, Hasdrubal, Adherbal, &c. Some have supposed that Baal, or Bel, was an extraordinary man, who founded Babylon, caused the country about it to be cultivated, and surrounded it with a wall; and, according to tradition, his son Ninus, the great conqueror, declared him a god after his death, and ordered divine honours to be paid him. Others are of opinion that the sun was worshipped under this name.

To this idol a vast number of temples and altars were erected, and generally on eminences; and numerous priests conducted the worship, which consisted in part of human victims.

BACCHUS, the name of a pagan deity, or the god of wine, whose statue was set up, in the reign of Julian the Apostate, in the great church of Emessa in Palestine, and in that of Epiphania; and the Chronicle of Alexandria relates that Eustathius, bishop of the church in that city, hearing the sound of instruments employed in the worship of Bacchus, and being told that they were played in his church, instantly expired, after having prayed that he might rather die than witness such abomination.

BACKBITING. See DETRACTION and SLANDER.

BACKSLIDING, the act of turning from the path of duty. It may be considered as partial, when applied to true believers, who do not backslide with the whole bent of their will; as voluntary, when applied to those who, after professing to know the truth, wilfully turn from it, and live in the practice of sin; as final, when the mind is given up to judicial hardness, as in the case of Judas. Partial backsliding must be distinguished from hypocrisy, as the former may exist where there are gracious intentions on the whole; but the latter is a studied profession of appearing to be what we are not.

The causes of backsliding are—the cares of the world; improper connexions; inattention to secret or closet duties; self-conceit and dependence; indulgence; listening to and parleying with temptations. A backsliding state is manifested by indifference to prayer and self-examination; trifling or unprofitable conversation; neglect of public ordinances; shunning the people of God; associating with the world; thinking lightly of sin; neglect of the Bible; and often by gross immorality. The consequences of this awful state are—loss of character; loss of comfort; loss of usefulness; and, as long as any remain in this state, a loss of a well-grounded hope of future happiness. To avoid this state, or recover from it, we should beware of the first appearance of sin; be much in prayer; attend the ordinances; and unite with the people of God. We should consider the awful instances of apostasy, as Saul, Judas, Demas, &c.; the many warnings we have of it, Matt. xxiv. 13. Heb. x. 38. Luke ix. 62; how it grieves the Holy Spirit; and how wretched it makes us; above all things, our dependence should be on God, that we may always be directed by his Spirit, and kept by his power. See APOSTASY.

BAD MESSIAH, (Pers.) the wind, or breath, of the Messiah. So the Persians call the power which Jesus Christ had of working miracles; for they say, that by his breath alone he not only raised the dead, but gave life to things inanimate. They have, in their language, a book of the infancy of Jesus Christ, (which was current likewise in the first ages of the church among the Christians,) in which it is said that Jesus Christ, when a child, formed birds out of the earth, and with his breath alone made them fly.

The Orientalists, and particularly the Mussulmans, when they would extol the ability of a physician, say he has the breath of the Messiah; by which they would express, that he is capable of raising the dead.

BAIRAM, the Mohammedan Easter, which follows immediately after the Ramadan or Lent, and lasts three days. Both feasts begin as soon as the new moon is announced by persons appointed for the purpose, and during the course of thirty-three years, take place in all the seasons and months of the year—the Turks reckoning by lunar years. It is the custom at this feast for inferiors to make presents to their superiors. This custom extended formerly to Europeans, who were obliged to make presents to men of rank, to the pashas and cadis. The Grand Seigneur is also in the habit of distributing favours at this time. Sixty days after this first great festival, there is a second, called the Little Bairam: these are the only two feasts which the Mohammedan religion absolutely prescribes to the faithful.

BALCHRISTY-PEOPLE, a small party of strict Independents, formed in the village of Balchristy in Scotland, by Mr. Smith, who, with Mr. Ferrier, both regular clergymen of the Scottish church, left the Establishment about the time that the Glassites first appeared. From the statistical accounts published by Sir J. Sinclair, it would appear there is still a church of this name in the town of Perth.

BANGORIAN CONTROVERSY, so called from Bangor, or the bishop thereof. Bishop Hoadley, the bishop of that diocese, preaching before George I., asserted, from the text, "My kingdom is not of this world," the supreme authority of Christ, as king in his own kingdom; and that he had not delegated his power like temporal lawgivers during their absence from their kingdom, to any persons, as his vicegerents or deputies. This important sermon may be seen reprinted in the Liverpool Theological Repository, vol. v. p. 301. In 1717, he also published his Preservative, in which he advanced some positions contrary to temporal and spiritual tyranny, and in behalf of the civil and religious liberties of mankind: upon which he was violently opposed, accused, and persecuted by the advocates for church power: but he was defended and supported by the civil powers, and his abilities and meekness gained him the plaudits of many.

countries. They are professedly designed for the benefit of the poor, but really intended to promote the interests of the church. They are in fact spiritual pawn-broking establishments, conducted on the usual principles of these institutions, but the profits of which go to the papal treasury. They were approved by the fifth Lateran council.

BAPTISM, an ordinance of Christ consisting in the application of water to a person, in the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, by which he is initiated into the visible church. Baptism exhibits to us the blessings of pardon, salvation through Jesus Christ, union to, and communion with him, the outpouring of the Spirit, regeneration, and sanctification. From baptism results the obligation of repentance, love to Christ, and perpetual devotedness to his praise. Baptism does not constitute a visible subject, but only recognizes one. It is an ordinance binding on all who have been given up to God in it; and to be perpetuated to the end of the world. It is not, however, essential to salvation; for mere participation of ordinances cannot qualify men for heaven: many have real grace, consequently were in a saved state, before they were baptized: besides, to suppose it essential is to put it in the place of that which it signifies.

Baptism has been supposed by many learned persons to have had its origin from the Jewish church; in which, they maintain, it was the practice, long before Christ's time, to baptize proselytes or converts to their faith, as part of the ceremony of their admission. "It is strange to me," says Dr. Doddridge, "that any should doubt of this, when it is plain, from express passages in the Jewish law, that no Jew who had lived like a Gentile for one day could be restored to the communion of this church without it. Compare Num. xix. 19 and 20, and many other precepts relating to ceremonial pollutions, in which may be seen that the Jews were rendered incapable of appearing before God in the tabernacle or temple, till they were washed either by bathing or sprinkling." Others, however, insist, that the Jewish proselyte baptism is not by far so ancient; and that John the Baptist was the first administrator of baptism among the Jews.

The baptism of John, and that of our Saviour and his apostles, have been supposed to be the same; because they agree, it is said, in their subjects, form, and end. But it must be observed, that though there be an agreement in some particulars, yet there is not in all. The immediate institutor of John's baptism was God the Father, John i. 33; but the immediate institutor of the Christian baptism was Christ, Matt. xxviii. 19. John's baptism was a preparatory rite, referring the subjects to Christ, who was about to confer on them spiritual blessings, Matt.

iii. 11. John's baptism was confined to the Jews; but the Christian was common to Jews and Gentiles, Matt. iii. 5, 7; Matt. xxviii. 19. It does not appear that John had any formula of administration; but the Christian baptism has, viz. "In the name," &c. The baptism of John was the concluding scene of the legal dispensation, and, in fact, part of it; and to be considered as one of those "divers washings" among the Jews: for he did not attempt to make any alteration in the Jewish religion, nor did the persons he baptized cease to be members of the Jewish church on account of their baptism; but Christian baptism is the regular entrance into, and is a part of, the evangelical dispensation, Gal. iii. 27. It does not appear from the inspired narrative (however probable from inferential reasoning) that any but John himself was engaged as operator in his baptism; whereas Christ himself baptized none; but his disciples, by his authority, and in his name, John iv. 2. What clearly proves that the two baptisms were not the same is the fact recorded, Acts xix. 1—5, that certain persons, who had submitted to John's baptism, were afterwards, on their being taught the Christian doctrine, baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus.

BAPTISM OF THE DEAD, a custom which anciently prevailed among some people in Africa, of giving baptism to the dead. The third council of Carthage speaks of it as a thing that ignorant Christians are fond of: Gregory Nazianzen also takes notice of the same superstitious opinion. The practice seems to be grounded on a vain idea, that when men had neglected to receive baptism in their lifetime some compensation might be made for this default by receiving it after death.

BAPTISM FOR THE DEAD, a practice formerly in use, when a person dying without baptism, another was baptized in his stead: thus supposing that God would accept the baptism of the proxy, as though it had been administered to the principal. Chrysostom says, this was practised among the Marcionites with a great deal of ridiculous ceremony, which he thus describes:—After any catechumen was dead, they hid a living man under the bed of the deceased; then coming to the dead man, they asked him whether he would receive baptism; and he making no answer, the other answered for him, and said he would be baptized in his stead; and so they baptized the living for the dead. If it can be proved (as some think it can) that this practice was as early as the days of the apostle Paul, it might probably form a solution of those remarkable words in 1 Cor. xv. 29: "If the dead rise not at all, what shall they do who are baptized for the dead?" The allusion of the apostle to this practice, however, is rejected by some, and especially by Dr. Doddridge, who thinks it too early; he thus paraphrases the passage: "Such are our views and hopes as Christians; else, if it were not so, what should they do who are baptized in token of their embracing the Christian faith, in the room of the dead, who are just fallen in the cause of Christ, but are yet supported by a succession of new converts, who immediately offer themselves to fill up their places, as ranks of soldiers that advance to the combat in the room of their companions who have just been slain in their sight?"

BAPTISM, LAY, we find to have been permitted by both the common prayer-books of King Edward and Queen Elizabeth, when an infant was in immediate danger of death, and a lawful minister could not be had. This was founded on a mistaken notion of the impossibility of salvation without the sacrament of baptism; but afterwards, when they came to have clearer notions of the sacraments, it was unanimously resolved, in a convocation held in 1575, that even private baptism in a case of necessity, was only to be administered by a lawful minister.

BAPTISM, METAPHORICAL. In Scripture the term baptism is used as referring to the work of the Spirit on the heart, Matt. iii. 11; also to the sufferings of Christ, Matt. xx. 22; and to so much of the Gospel as John the Baptist taught his disciples, Acts xviii. 25.

BAPTISTS, a name assumed by those who maintain that baptism is to be administered to adults only, and that by immersion, and not by sprinkling, but obviously allowed them as a matter of courtesy by their opponents, who hold that they are baptists no less than the former; and that their more appropriate designation is that of Antipædobaptists, which see.

BARCLAY, ROBERT, the celebrated apologist of the Quakers, was born in 1648, at Gordons-town, in the shire of Moray, in Scotland, of an ancient and honourable family. The troubles of the country induced his father, Colonel Barclay, to send him to Paris, to be educated under the care of his uncle, who was Principal of the Scotch College in that city. Under his influence he was easily induced to become a convert to the Roman Catholic faith, on which his father sent for him to return home, and soon after turning a Quaker, young Robert followed his example. Uniting all the advantages of a learned education to great natural abilities, it was not long ere he distinguished himself by his talents and zeal, in support of his new opinions. His first work, published in 1670, entitled, Truth cleared of Calumnies, &c., was an answer to an attack on the Quakers by a Scotch minister of the name of Mitchel. It is written with great spirit and vigour, and tended greatly to remove from the body the opprobrium under which they lay with government. The book, however, which has fixed his celebrity, is his Apology for the True Christian Divinity, as the same is preached and held forth by the people in scorn called Quakers. It was originally published in Latin, and soon reprinted at Amsterdam, and translated into German, Dutch, French, and Spanish, and, by the author himself, into English. It received many answers, but they are now almost forgotten. The author afterwards accompanied William Penn through the greater part of England, Holland, and Germany, for the purpose of propagating their sentiments, and acquired great respect wherever he went. He had however, after this, his own share of persecution, and was more than once imprisoned; but spent the latter part of his life in the bosom of a large family, and died in 1690, in the forty-second year of his age.

BARDESANES, one of the ancient heretics. He flourished about the year 170, and was a native of Edessa, in Mesopotamia. According to Eusebius, he was intimately acquainted with the Chaldean philosophy, and is said also to have been well skilled in the Greek and Syrian languages. He wrote against Marcion and other heretics, but afterwards fell into some of the errors of the Valentinian school. Yet though this was the case, it would be unjust to class his tenets indiscriminately with those of Valentinus. He received the whole of the Old Testament. He believed that God, who was the Father of Jesus Christ, was the creator of the world; and he even held that the Word of God, or his Son, co-operated in this creation. He held, however, that the body of Jesus was a delusive image which came down from heaven; in which point, and that of the denial of the resurrection of the body, he agreed with Valentinus. It is also stated to have been one of his opinions, that the devil was not created by God. He appears to have lived to retract some of his errors, and to abjure the doctrines of Valentinus. The fullest account of his life and doctrines is given by Beausobre, vol. ii. p. 128. See also Dr. Burton on the Early Heresies, note 13.

BARDESANISTS, those who held the opinions of Bardesanes.

BARLAAMITES, the followers of Barlaam, in the fourteenth century, who was a very zealous champion in behalf of the Greek against the Latin church. It is said that he adopted the sentiments and precepts of the Stoics, with respect to the obligations of morality, and the duties of life; and digested them into a work of his, which is known by the title of Ethica ex Stoicis.

BARNABAS'S EPISTLE. Barnabas, according to Jerom, wrote a letter full of edification for the church. It is frequently cited by Clement of Alexandria and Origen. Eusebius and Jerom reckon it among the apocryphal or uncanonical writings; but neither of them deny that it belongs to Barnabas. But he could not be author of a work so full of forced allegories, extravagant and unwarrantable explications of scripture, together with stories concerning beasts, and such like conceits, as make up the first part of this epistle. It is uncertain to whom this epistle was addressed, because we have not the superscription: but it seems to have been written to the converted Jews, who were too zealously addicted to the observance of the law of Moses. It is divided into two parts. In the first he shows the unprofitableness of the old law, and the necessity of the incarnation and death of Jesus Christ. He cites, and explains allegorically, several passages relating to the ceremonies and precepts of the law of Moses, applying them to Jesus Christ and his law. The second part is a moral instruction, handled under the notion of two ways, the one of light, the other of darkness, the one under the conduct of the angels of God, the other under the guidance of the angels of Satan. The way of light is a summary of what a Christian is to do, in order to obtain eternal happiness; and the way of darkness is a representation of those particular sins which exclude men from the kingdom of God.

This epistle was first published in Greek, from a copy of Father Hugh Menard, a Benedictine monk. An ancient version of it was found in a manuscript of the Abbey of Corbey, near a thousand years old. Vossius published it in the year 1656, together with the epistles of Ignatius.

BARNABAS'S GOSPEL, an apocryphal work ascribed to Barnabas, the apostle, wherein the history of Jesus Christ is related in a manner very different from the account given us by the four evangelists. The Mohammedans have this gospel in Arabic, and it corresponds very well with those traditions which Mohammed followed in his Koran. It was probably a forgery of some nominal Christians, and afterwards altered and interpolated by the Mohammedans, the better to serve their purpose.

BARNABITES, a religious order, founded in the sixteenth century, by three Italian gentlemen, who had been advised, by a famous preacher of those days, to read carefully the Epistles of St. Paul. Hence they were called clerks of St. Paul; and Barnabites, because they performed their first exercise in a church of St. Barnabas at Milan. They dress in black, like the secular clergy, and devote themselves to missions, preaching, and the instruction of youth; and in Italy, where they taught theology in the academies of Milan and Pavia, in France, Austria, and Spain, they had houses which they called colleges. In France and Austria, they were employed to convert the Protestants. The order only exists at present in Spain, and some parts of Italy.

BARTHOLOMEW'S DAY, a feast held on the 24th of August, in honour of Bartholomew, but awfully memorable as the day of the horrid slaughter of the Huguenots in France, in the year 1572, when, at midnight, not only was a signal given to massacre all who were found in Paris, but orders were issued that the massacre should extend through the whole kingdom; in consequence of which, in the space of thirty days, upwards of 30,000 victims are calculated to have been slain. See PERSÉCUTION, FRANCE.

BARTHOLOMITES, a religious order founded at Genoa in 1307; but, the monks leading irregular lives, it was suppressed in 1650, and their effects confiscated. In the church of the monastery of this order at Genoa, is preserved the image which, it is pretended, Christ sent to king Abgarus.

BARUCH, THE PROPHECY OF, one of the apocryphal books of the Old Testament.

BASILIAN MONKS, religious of the order of Basil, in the fourth century, who, having retired into a desert in the province of Pontus, founded a monastery, and drew up rules to the amount of some hundreds, for his disciples. This new society soon spread all over the East; nor was it long before it passed into the West. Some pretend that Basil saw himself the spiritual father of more than 90,000 monks in the East only; but this order, which flourished for more than three centuries, was considerably diminished by heresy, schism, and a change of empire; but the number is still considerable, and some are found even in America. The historians of this order say that it has produced 14 popes, 1805 bishops, 3010 abbots, and 11,085 martyrs, besides an infinite number of confessors and virgins. This order likewise boasts of several emperors, kings, and princes, who have embraced its rule.

BASILICA, properly a royal palace; but in the first centuries of Rome, the basilicas were splendid public buildings, of an oblong shape, and four-cornered, and commonly adorned with Corinthian columns and statues, where the citizens collected to consult for their common welfare, transact mercantile business, and hear the young orators exercise themselves in declamation. Some of them having been given by Constantine to the Roman Christians for their worship, the first buildings appropriated to this purpose obtained the name of basilica, and afterwards, when new churches were built, the shape of the ancient basilica was retained.

BASILIDES, author of the heresy described in the following article. Different opinions have been entertained as to the time at which he lived; but if he was a disciple of Menander, who was a disciple of Simon Magus, he must have lived about the beginning of the second century, and may have spread his doctrines in the reign of the Emperor Trajan. He studied at Alexandria, and is said to have been also in Persia; but whether he learned his views of Gnosticism there is uncertain.

BASILIDIANS, those who adopted the principles of Basilides, who, when overpowered by the divine lustre of Christianity, had been induced to enrol himself among the number of its votaries, made it his study to bend and interpret its principles in such a way as that they might appear rather to support than to militate against his philosophical tenets. The cause of Christ's advent he maintained to be the defection of the founders and governors of this world from the Supreme Deity, the contentions and wars among themselves, in which they were continually engaged, and the consequent utter depravity and miserable situation of the whole human race. Those eminently powerful genii, he asserted, who both created and governed the world, being endowed with the most perfect freedom of will as to the choice of either good or evil, inclined by degrees to the latter, and endeavoured to root out and obliterate all knowledge of the true God, with a view to get themselves regarded and worshipped by mankind as gods in his stead. They then engaged in wars among themselves, each one striving to extend the sphere of his own power. The president or ruler of the Jewish nation, in particular, the chief angel of the whole, aimed at nothing short of universal sovereignty, his efforts being directed to the entire subjugation of his associates, and the various regions of the earth over which they respectively presided. The consequences produced by this perturbed state of things were, that the true religion sunk into oblivion, men resigned themselves wholly to the dominion of depraved appetites and lusts, and every part of the earth groaned under an accumulation of calamities, crimes, and wretchedness. Touched with compassion on beholding souls of a divine origin involved in so much misery and distress, the Supreme Deity directed his Son, that is, Noos, the first of the seven Æons, begotten of himself, to descend on earth for the purpose of putting an end to the dominion of these presiding angels, particularly that of their superlatively proud and arrogant chief, whom the Jewish nation had learnt to venerate as a god. Having accomplished this, he was to revive amongst men the long-lost knowledge of his Father, and teach them to subdue the force of those turbulent and irregular appetites which war against the soul. Taking upon himself, therefore, the form and semblance of a man, but without assuming a real body, the Son made his appearance amongst the Jews, and entered on the duties of the function that had thus been assigned him by his Father, confirming the truth of his doctrine by miracles of the most stupendous nature. Enraged at this invasion of his dominion, the god of the Jews caused Christ to be apprehended, and condemned to suffer death; but the latter not being clothed with a real body of his own, adopted that of Simon the Cyrenian, who had been compelled to bear his cross, and transferred his form to Simon; so that instead of Christ, it was Simon the Cyrenian whom the Jews crucified. The souls that paid obedience to the precepts and injunctions thus communicated to them from above, might expect, upon the dissolution of the body, to regain their original seats in the blissful mansions above; but those who neglected availing themselves of the proffered instruction, were destined to migrate into other bodies, either of men or brute animals, until their impurities should be wholly purged away. As for the body, a mass of corrupt and vitiated matter, no hope was to be entertained of its being ever restored to life again. Of the books of the Old Testament, which he conceived to have been composed in part by command of the prince of the Jewish nation, and in part at the instance of the other angels, Basilides could not, of course, have made any great account. What the books of the New Testament might be, of which he approved, is not at present known.

He wrote a long explanatory comment, indeed, on the gospel; but whether the gospel which he thus took upon him to expound, was one of those which we recognise as genuine, or a different one, is not altogether certain.

The moral discipline prescribed by Basilides, although founded, in some degree, in superstition, and supported rather by vain and empty subtleties than any true or solid principles, yet held out no encouragement to the irregular appetites and vices of mankind. The soul, he maintained, was possessed of a sufficient power or energy to overcome every incitement to evil, internal as well as external: and, consequently, that no man could become wicked except through his own fault. God, he asserted, would forgive no other offences but those which had been unknowingly and unwillingly committed, and considered even a propensity or leaning towards any sin, in one and the same light with the actual commission of such sin. All this is so obviously repugnant to a licentious course of life and action, that it is impossible for us to place any faith in the accounts of those ancient authors who represent Basilides as having countenanced the utmost laxity of manners amongst his followers. The unfavourable suspicions that were entertained by many respecting the nature of his moral discipline, appear to have been excited in part by the infamous lives led by some of his disciples, and in part by the objectionable opinions which he maintained in regard to the lawfulness of concealing one's religion, of denying Christ in times of peril, of partaking of the flesh of victims offered to idols, of disparaging the estimation and authority of the martyrs, and peradventure as to various other points. The Basilidian sect flourished for a considerable time, and had not become altogether extinct so late as the fourth century. — Mosheim de Rebus.

BASLE, COUNCIL OF, which commenced its sittings, December 14, 1431, under the presidency of the cardinal legate Julianus Cassarini of St. Angelo, and after holding not fewer than forty-five, terminated its labours May 16, 1443. Its objects, which were partly attained, were to extirpate heresies, limit the power of the pope, effect a reformation of the clergy, and consolidate the interests of the church. Its decrees are not admitted into any of the Roman collections, and are considered of no authority by the Roman lawyers. They are, however, recognized in points of canon law in France and Germany; and though some later concordats have modified the application of them, they have never been formally and entirely annulled.

BATANISTS, or ASSASSINS, a famous heretical sect of murderers among the Mohammedans, who settled in Persia about 1090. Their head and chief seems to have been Hassan Sabah, who made fanatical slaves of his subjects. Their religion was a compound of that of the Magi, the Jews, the Christians, and the Mohammedans. They believed the Holy Ghost resided in their chief; that his orders proceeded from God himself, and were real declarations of his will.

This chief, from his exalted residence on Mount Lebanon, was called the old man of the mountain; who, like a vindictive deity, with the thunderbolt in his hand, sent inevitable death to all quarters, so that even kings trembled at his sanguinary power. His subjects would prostrate themselves at the foot of his throne, requesting to die by his hand, or order, as a favour by which they were sure of passing into paradise. "Are your subjects," said the old man of the mountain to the son-in-law of Amoury, king of Jerusalem, "as ready in their submission as mine?" and without staying for an answer, made a sign with his hand, when ten young men in white, who were standing on an adjacent tower, instantly threw themselves down. To one of his guards he said, "Draw your dagger, and plunge it into your breast;" which was no sooner said than obeyed. At the command of their chief, they made no difficulty of stabbing any prince, even on his throne; and for that purpose conformed to the dress and religion of the country, that they might be less suspected. To animate them in such attempts, the scheik previously indulged them with a foretaste of the delights of paradise. Delicious soporific drinks were given them; and while they lay asleep they were carried into beautiful gardens, where, awaking as it were in paradise, and inflamed with views of perpetual enjoyments, they sallied forth to perform assassinations of the blackest dye.

It is said they once thought of embracing the Christian religion; and some have thought the Druses a remnant of this singular race of barbarians.

BATH-COL. [Hebr.] The daughter of a voice. After the death of Malachi, the spirit of prophecy ceasing among the Jews, they pretended to a new kind of revelation, which they called Bath-col, the daughter of a voice, because it succeeded the oracular voice, delivered from the Mercy-seat, when they consulted God by Urim and Thummim. They pretended, that it was a voice from heaven; and some tell us it was attended with a clap of thunder. To give an instance, out of the Talmud, of this kind of oracle:—Rabbi Jochanan, and Rabbi Simeon Ben Lachish, desiring to see the face of Rabbi Samuel, a Babylonish doctor, said, Let us follow the hearing of Bath-col. Travelling therefore near a school, they heard the voice of a boy, reading these words out of the first book of Samuel,—And Samuel died. From hence they inferred, that their friend Samuel was dead; and accordingly so it happened; for Samuel of Babylon was just then dead.

From hence it appears that the Bath-col was a fantastical way of divination, invented by the Jews themselves, not unlike the Sortes Virgilianæ of the heathens. For as, with them, the first words they happened to dip into, in the works of that poet, were a kind of oracle, whereby they predicted future events; so with the Jews, when they appealed to Bath-col, the first words they heard from any one's mouth were looked upon as a voice from heaven, directing them in the matter they inquired about.

BAXTER, RICHARD, was born at Rowton, in Shropshire, November 12, 1615. He was one of the great nonconformist divines; and though he, in the early part of his life, laboured under many and great disadvantages, owing to the irreligion and ignorance of those under whose care he was placed, he was afterwards one of the greatest men of the age in which he lived. During the first few years of his life he was much addicted to lying, covetousness in play, fondness for romances, &c.; but, fortunately for him, his father directed his attention to the historical part of the Bible, which much interested him, and inspired him with a desire to peruse those parts which were more doctrinal. In consequence of such determination, by the perusal of the Bible and other religious books, and the conversations of his father, his mind became illuminated, and his soul converted to God. After having been for some time under the care of Mr. John Owen, schoolmaster of the free school at Wroxeter, his parents accepted of a proposal for placing him under the care of Mr. Richard Wickstead, chaplain to the council of Ludlow. This gentleman proved to be very incompetent to under the superintendence of Abbot Benedict, by whom, and his successor Ceolfrid, he was educated for twelve years. When he had arrived at the age of nineteen, he was ordained deacon by Bishop Beverley. In a short time, by his diligence and application, he became a proficient in general knowledge, and in classical literature. He was so strongly attached to a monastic life, that when Pope Sergius wrote to Abbot Ceolfrid, in a very urgent manner, to send him to Rome to give his opinion on some important points, Bede would not accept it. Several years were spent by him in making collections for his celebrated work on ecclesiastical history, the materials for which he collected from the lives of eminent persons, annals in convents, and such chronicles as were written before his time. Nearly all the knowledge we possess of the early state of Christianity in this country is derived from this work. That work was published in the year 731, when he was fifty-nine years of age. It gained him such universal applause, that the most profound prelates conversed with him, and solicited his advice on the most important subjects; particularly Egbert, bishop of York, a man of very extensive learning; and to whom he wrote a long, learned, and judicious letter, which furnished the world with such an account of the state of the church at that time, as cannot be met with in any other history. He had then every symptom of consumption, which at last proved to be the case. This affliction he supported with incredible firmness of mind; and though this lingering complaint was united with asthma, he was never heard to complain, but was always calm and resigned. Though his body was much afflicted, his mind was buoyant and active; and he continued, with great assiduity, to translate the Gospel of John into the Saxon language, and also some passages which he was then extracting from the works of Isidore. He had just time to finish his translation on the day, and at the very hour, of his death. He also took his usual interest in the education and improvement of some monks whom he was instructing. His piety and virtue, united to his lengthened days, entitled him to the appellation of venerable. England scarcely ever produced a greater scholar or divine. Bayle says, that "there is scarcely any thing in all antiquity worthy to be read, which is not to be found in Bede, though he travelled not out of his own country;" and that "if he had lived in the times of St. Augustine, St. Jerome, or Chrysostom, he would undoubtedly have equalled them, since, even in the midst of a superstitious age, he wrote so many excellent treatises." Bede died at the age of sixty-three, A.D. 735. His remains were interred, first in the church of his own monastery, but afterwards removed to Durham, and placed in the same coffin with those of St. Cuthbert. There were several epitaphs composed in honour of him, but none considered suitable to his virtues and talents. As an author, he excelled in the purity and elegance of his style; and, as a man, he was eminent for those virtues and graces which adorn human nature.

BEGHARDS, or BEGUARDS, a sect that arose in Germany in the thirteenth century, and took St. Begghe for their patroness. They employed themselves in making linen cloth, each supporting himself by his labour, and were united only by the bonds of charity, without having any particular rule; but when Pope Nicholas IV. had confirmed that of the third order of St. Francis, in 1289, they embraced it the year following.

BEGUINES, a congregation of nuns, founded either by St. Begghe or by Lambert le Bègue. They were established, first at Liege, and afterwards at Neville, in 1207; and from this last settlement sprang the great number of Beguinages which are spread over all Flanders, and have passed from Flanders into Germany. In the latter country some of them fell into extravagant errors, persuading themselves that it was possible, in the present life, to arrive to the highest perfection, even to impeccability, and a clear view of God; in short, to so eminent a degree of contemplation, that there was no necessity, after this, to submit to the laws of mortal men, civil or ecclesiastical. The council of Vienna condemned these errors; permitting, nevertheless, those among them who continued in the true faith, to live in charity and penitence, either with or without vows. There still subsists, or at least subsisted till lately, many communities of them in Flanders. Their grand rule of conduct was universal charity, and their only motive the love of God.

BEHMEN, or BOEHME, JACOB, a celebrated mystic writer, born in the year 1575, at Old Seidenburgh, near Gorlitz, in Upper Lusatia; he was a shoemaker by trade. He is described as having been thoughtful and religious from his youth, taking peculiar pleasure in frequenting public worship. At length seriously considering within himself that speech of our Saviour, My Father which is in heaven will give the Holy Spirit to them that ask him, he was thereby thoroughly awakened in himself, and set forward to desire that promised Comforter; and, continuing in that earnestness, he was at last, to use his own expression, "surrounded with a divine light for seven days, and stood in the highest contemplation and kingdom of joys!" After this, about the year 1600, he was again surrounded by the divine light, and replenished with the heavenly knowledge; insomuch that, going abroad into the fields, and viewing the herbs and grass, by his inward light he saw into their essences, use and properties, which were discovered to him by their lineaments, figures, and signatures. In the year 1610, he had a third special illumination, wherein still further mysteries were revealed to him. It was not till the year 1612 that Behmen committed these revelations to writing. His first treatise is entitled Aurora, which was seized on and withheld from him by the senate of Gorlitz (who persecuted him at the instigation of the primate of that place) before it was finished, and he never afterwards proceeded with it, further than by adding some explanatory notes. The next production of his pen is called The Three Principles. In this work he more fully illustrates the subjects treated of in the former, and supplies what is wanting in that work. The contents of these two treatises may be divided as follows: 1. How all things came from a working will of the holy triune incomprehensible God, manifesting himself as Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, through an outward perceptible working triune power of fire, light, and spirit, in the kingdom of heaven. 2. How and what angels and men were in their creation; that they are in and from God, his real offspring; that their life began in and from this divine fire, which is the Father of light, generating a birth of light in their souls; from both which proceeds the Holy Spirit, or breath of divine love in the triune creature, as it does in the triune Creator. 3. How some angels, and all men, are fallen from God, and their first state of a divine triune life in him; what they are in their fallen state, and the difference between the fall of angels and that of man. 4. How the earth, stars, and elements were created in consequence of the fallen angels. 5. Whence there is good and evil in all this temporal world, in all its creatures, animate and inanimate; and what is meant by the curse that dwells every where in it. 6. Of the kingdom of Christ; how it is set in opposition to, and fights and strives against the kingdom of hell. 7. How man, through faith in Christ, is able to overcome the kingdom of hell, and triumph over it in the divine power, and thereby obtain eternal salvation; also how, through working in the hellish quality or principle, he casts himself into perdition. 8. How and why sin and misery, wrath and death, shall only reign for a time, till the love, the wisdom, and the power of God shall in a supernatural way (the mystery of God made man) triumph over sin, misery, and death; and make fallen man rise to the glory of angels, and this material system shake off its curse, and enter into an everlasting union with that heaven from whence it fell.

The year after he wrote his Three Principles,—by which are to be understood, the dark world, or hell, in which the devils live;—the light world, or heaven, in which the angels live;—the external and visible world, which has proceeded from the internal and spiritual worlds, in which man, as to his bodily life, lives, —Behmen produced his Threefold Life of Man according to the Three Principles. In this work he treats more largely of the state of man in this world: 1. That he has that immortal spark of life which is common to angels and devils. 2. That divine life of the light and spirit of God, which makes the essential difference between an angel and a devil, the last having extinguished this divine life in himself; but that man can only attain unto this heavenly life of the second principle through the new birth in Christ Jesus. The life of the third principle, or of this external and visible world. Thus the life of the first and third principles is common to all men; but the life of the second principle only to a true Christian or a child of God.

Behmen wrote several other treatises, besides the three already enumerated; but these three being, as it were, the basis of all his other writings, it was thought proper to notice them particularly. His conceptions are often clothed under allegorical symbols; and in his latter works he has frequently adopted chemical and Latin phrases to express his ideas, which phrases he borrowed from conversation with learned men, the education he had received being too illiterate to furnish him with them: but as to the matter contained in his writings, he disclaimed having borrowed it either from men or books. He died in the year 1624. His last words were—"Now I go hence into Paradise."

Some of Behmen's principles were adopted by the late ingenious and pious William Law, who has clothed them in a more modern dress and in a less obscure style.—See Behmen's Works; Okeley's Memoirs of Behmen.

BELLARMINE, CARDINAL, a great Roman Catholic oracle and Jesuit, born at Monte Puleiano, in Tuscany, in 1542. He was most assiduous in his opposition to the Protestants, and was sent into the Low Countries to arrest their progress. The talent which he displayed in his controversies, called forth the most able men on the other side; and, for a number of years, no eminent divine among the Reformers failed to make his arguments a particular subject of refutation. His principal work was A Body of Controversy, written in Latin, the style of which is perspicuous and precise, without any pretension to purity and elegance. He displays very considerable acquaintance with the Scriptures, and is deeply versed in the doctrine and practice of the church. He was, on the points of predestination and efficacious grace, more a disciple of Augustine than a Jesuit. As his book did not assert that the Popes had a direct power over temporal things, it was placed by Sixtus V. among the prohibited books; which, with the differences that were found among the Catholics themselves, gave the Protestants no small advantage. At his death, the Cardinal bequeathed one half of his soul to the Virgin Mary, and the other to Jesus Christ.

BELIEF, in its general and natural sense, denotes a persuasion or an assent of the mind to the truth of any proposition. In this sense belief has no relation to any particular kind of means or arguments, but may be produced by any means whatever: thus we are said to believe our senses, to believe our reason, to believe a witness. Belief, in its more restrained sense, denotes that kind of assent which is grounded only on the authority or testimony of some person. In this sense belief stands opposed to knowledge and science. We do not say that we believe snow is white, but we know it to be so. But when a thing is propounded to us, of which we ourselves have no knowledge, but which appears to us to be true from the testimony given to it by another, this is what we call belief. See Faith.

BELIEVERS, an appellation by which the disciples of Christ were first called; but toward the close of the first century, those Christians were thus designated who had been admitted into the church by baptism, and instructed in all the mysteries of religion, in contradistinction to the catechumens who had not been baptized, and were debarred from those privileges. Among us it is often used synonymously with Christian. See CHRISTIAN.

BEL AND THE DRAGON, HISTORY OF, an apocryphal and uncanonical book of Scripture. It was always rejected by the Jewish church, and is extant neither in the Hebrew nor the Chaldee language; nor is there any proof that it ever was so. Jerom gives it no better title than "the fable of Bel and the Dragon."

Selden thinks this little history ought rather to be considered as a sacred poem, or fiction, than a true account. As to the Dragon, he observes, that serpents (dracones) made a part of the hidden mysteries of the Pagan religion; as appears from Clemens Alexandrinus, Julius Firmicus, Justin Martyr, and others. And Aristotle relates, that in Mesopotamia there were serpents which would not hurt the natives of the country, and infested only strangers. Whence it is not improbable that both the Mesopotamians themselves, and the neighbouring people, might worship a serpent, the former to avert the evil arising from those reptiles, the latter out of a principle of gratitude. But of this there is no clear proof; nor is it certain that the Babylonians worshipped a dragon or serpent.

BELLS are not to be reckoned among the ancient utensils of the Christian church, because they are known to be a modern invention. During the three first centuries, it is certain the Christians did not meet in their assemblies by the notice of any public signal; nor can it be imagined that, in an age of persecution, when they met privately in the night, they would as it were betray themselves by such notice to their enemies. Baronius, indeed, supposes there was an order of men appointed to give private notice of assembling to every particular member of a Christian congregation; but, for want of light, we can determine nothing about it.

In the following ages, we find several inventions before that of bells, for the calling religious assemblies together. In Egypt they seem to have used trumpets, after the manner of the Jews. And the same custom prevailed in the sixth century, in Palestine. But, in some monasteries they took the office by turns of going about to every one's cell, and calling the monks to their devotions with the stroke of a hammer; which instrument was from thence termed the night-signal, and awakening-mallet, ἡ νυκτιανή καὶ ἐγερτικόν. In the nunnery erected at Jerusalem by the famous Paula, a Roman lady, the usual signal was given by singing an Hallelujah. In the other parts of the East they made use of sounding instruments of wood, called Sacred Boards.

The use of bells was not known in the eastern church till the year 865, when Ursus Patrisiacus, duke of Venice, made a present of some to Michael the Greek emperor, who first built a tower to the church of Sancta Sophia, to hang them in. Who first brought bells into use in the Latin church, is a thing not yet determined; some ascribing them to Pope Sabinianus, successor of St. Gregory, A.D. 604; and others to Paulinus, bishop of Nola, contemporary with St. Jerom. But the latter opinion seems to be a vulgar error, and to have no better foundation than Paulinus's being bishop of Nola in Campania, where it is pretended bells were first invented, and thence called Nolæ and Campanæ. Cardinal Bona would have it thought that they began to be used in the Latin church immediately upon the conversion of the emperors to Christianity, because the tintinnabula, or lesser sort of bells, had been used before by the heathens to the like purpose: but there is no ancient author that countenances his conjecture.

The Turks, since they became masters of the Greek empire, have prohibited the use of bells among their Christian subjects; for which reason, "they hang by ropes, upon the branches of trees, several bent plates of iron, like those on our cart-wheels, of about half an inch thick, and three or four inches broad, with holes made in them lengthways. They chime upon these plates with little iron hammers, to call the monks to church. They have another sort of religious music, which they endeavour to bring into concert with these iron chimes. They hold a piece of board about four or five inches broad in one hand, and beat upon it with a wooden mallet in the other."

The Romish church has a great deal of superstition in relation to the use of bells. In the Roman ritual, they are said to represent the duration of the Gospel, the sound of which has been carried through all the earth, because they make themselves be heard by the faithful a great way off. They likewise represent the church exciting the faithful to praise God, and the pastors of the Gospel preaching the word of God. They have several other mysterious significations, to be found in the rituals. The Romanists believe that the sound of bells keeps the powers of the air at a distance; in this not much unlike the ancient Lacedemonians, who thought the sound of brass would drive away evil spirits: for which reason, at the death of their kings, they beat upon brass kettles.

The ceremony of the benediction, or blessing of bells, in the Romish church, is a very remarkable piece of superstition. It is supposed to consecrate them to God's service, to the end that he may bestow on them the power, not of striking the ear, but of touching the heart. When a bell is to receive benediction, it is hung up, and disposed in such a manner, as to leave room to walk round it. They prepare beforehand an holy-water pot, another for salt, napkins, a vessel of oil, incense, myrrh, cotton, a bason and ewer, and a crum of bread. They then proceed to sanctify the bell in the following manner:—A procession is made from the vestry, and the officiating priest, having seated himself near the bell, instructs the people in the holiness of the action he is going to perform, and then sings the miserere. Next, he blesses some salt and water, and puts up a prayer, that the bell may acquire the virtue of guarding Christians from the stratagems of Satan, of driving away ghosts, of breaking the force of tempests, and raising devotion in the heart, &c. He then mixes the salt and water, and crossing them thrice, in the name of the Father, the Son, and Holy Ghost, pronounces over each of them, "God be with you." This done he dips the aspergillum, or sprinkler, in the holy water, and with it washes the bell; during which ablution psalms are sung. After this a vessel, containing what they call oil for the infirm, is opened by the dean, into which the officiating priest dips the thumb of his right hand, and applies it to the middle of the bell, signing it with the sign of the cross. The 28th Psalm being then sung, the bell is marked with seven other crosses, during which the priest honours the bell with a sort of baptism, consecrating it in the name of the Trinity, and naming some particular saint, who stands godfather to the bell, which from that time bears his name. The bell, thus baptized, is perfumed with incense and myrrh, which, in a prayer used on that occasion, is called the dew of the Holy Ghost.

The rituals tell us, that the consecration of bells represents that of pastors; that the ablution, followed by unction, expresses the sanctification acquired by baptism; the seven crosses show that pastors should exceed the rest of Christians in the graces of the Holy Ghost; and that, as the smoke of the perfume rises in the bell, and fills it, so a pastor, adorned with the fulness of God's Spirit, receives the perfume of the vows and prayers of the faithful.

We likewise meet with, in a Catholic author, a kind of religious anatomy of a bell, and all its parts. The metal signifies the strength of the preacher's understanding, and the clapper his tongue; the stroke of the clapper, the tongue's censure of vice; and that, which holds the clapper, the moderation of the tongue. The wood on which the bell hangs denotes the wood of the cross; the pieces, to which the wood is fixed, the oracles of the prophets. The cramp-iron, fixing the bell to the wood, represents the preacher's attachment to the cross of Christ. The bell-rope likewise includes considerable mysteries: the three cords, for instance, of which it is made, are the three senses of the Scripture; viz. the historical, the moral, and the allegorical.

This practice of consecrating and baptizing bells is a very modern invention. Baronius carries it no higher than the time of John XIII. A.D. 968, who consecrated the great bell of the Lateran church, and gave it the name of John. Menardus and Cardinal Bona carry it up a little higher, namely, to the time of Charles the Great; and it is certain the practice prevailed at that time, because we find, in the capitulars of that prince, a censure and prohibition of it,—ut cloacas non baptisent.

That bells were an early invention, is evident from their use in the days of Moses, since it was enjoined on the high priest of the Israelites, that the lower hem of the robe in which he officiated should be ornamented with pomegranates and gold bells, set alternately, in order that he might minister therein, that his sound might be heard when he went into the holy place before the Lord, and when he came out, that he might not die. It seems to have been ordained as a mark of respect, that the high priest might give public notice of his entering before the Lord; and, perhaps, to prevent his being put to death by those who watched the temple, that its sacred precincts might not be violated; none but the high priest being permitted to enter into the holy place.

Viewed in this light, there appears nothing extraordinary in the use of bells, simply considered; but as sacred persons gave sanction, in the minds of people prone to wander from the simplicity of truth, to make everything about them, and even their dress, possess some sacred function, so these ornaments came to be held up to the people as something more than mere bells and pomegranates; and hence, Josephus informs us, that while the latter signified lightning, the former denoted thunder: and long before the days of Josephus, it appears that superstitious notions were attached to bells, which, according to the prophet Zecharias (ch. xiv. 20), were used as amulets. In illustration of this remark, accept the following extract from Burder's Oriental Customs, vol. ii. p. 291:—"Among the heathens of the East, the sun was called Baal, or Bel, from his supposed dominion over all things, whence the word came at last to denote a lord or master in general. He was considered as the author of vibratory motion, the source of musical sound; and such instruments as emit a sound by percussion, were called bells, from Bell or Bel, the name by which the sun was denoted among the Druids. For the same reason, a bell seems in very early times to have been made a sign or symbol of victory or dominion. Thus, as horses were employed in war, and are celebrated in the earliest antiquity, for their strength, stately port, and undaunted courage, bells became a part of their martial furniture." There is a striking proof of the antiquity of this custom among the heathen, which may be found in the Travels of Sir R. K. Porter (vol. i. pp. 615, 616), who, in describing the palace of the forty pillars, which forms part of the ruins of Persepolis, mentions, among the second group of sculptured figures, "an almost gigantic horse, whose ardour his attendant seems to check by the tightness with which he holds the bridle," as having round his neck a collar and a bell; and in the next page, the figure of a dromedary, so accurately sculptured, "as to give an appearance of almost actual movement to the animal," is similarly decorated; and these fine specimens of the art are referred by that enterprising traveller to a period contemporary with Cyrus.

Possibly, bells were also used as music, with equally superstitious notions. They are mentioned 1 Chron. xv. 19; and perhaps the sounding brass, coupled with the tinkling cymbal, was a sort of bell. Among the heathen, the use of bells in their religious ceremonies was common in ancient times. The sounding brass, in some shape or other, was struck in the sacred rites of the Dea Syria, and in those of Hecate. It was thought to be good for all kinds of expiation and purification. It had, moreover, some secret influence over the spirits of the departed. The priests of Proserpine at Athens, called Hierophants, rang a bell to call the people together to sacrifice; and one indispensable ceremony in the Indian Pooja is the ringing of a small bell by the officiating Brahmin. The women of the Idol, or dancing girls of the Pagoda, have little golden bells fastened to their feet, the soft harmonious tinkling of which vibrates in unison with the exquisite melody of their voices. Hence it appears probable, that the Jews derived much of their foolish notions respecting bells, as well as other things of more serious moment, from the heathen nations.

The rage for amalgamating the superstitions of the Pagan world with the outside of Christianity, through the falsely called liberality of persons pretending to be the abettors of truth, but who were in reality the worst enemies that Christianity ever had to contend with, together with the desire of the heathen themselves to uphold their old customs—those who, like too many of the present day, exerted all their influence in endeavouring to unite principles that must ever remain separated—this rage for mingling truth with error in the early ages of the church, when heathen usages could be made in any degree to correspond, or when coincidence between Pagan gods and goddesses, and Christian saints could, however remotely, be brought to bear, was the means of introducing a great variety of dogmas, in every respect contrary to that simplicity which becometh the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ; and among these, the adoption of bells was not omitted. Hence appears to have arisen the use of them in churches, now so universal among us; and had their use, without abuse, have served the purpose to which they were, perhaps, originally applied, it would have been well: but long before the Reformation in this country, the clergy had found means to delude the minds of themselves and their people with the most superstitious opinions respecting them; and, as if they felt anxious that their follies should be carried to future ages they thought right to inscribe the bells they erected with those opinions. Of these a few specimens will illustrate the subject. One set of bells in a parish church in Cambridgeshire was thus inscribed:—

Laudo deum verum.	I praise the true God.
Plebem voco.	I call the people.
Congrego clerum.	I assemble the clergy.
Defunctos ploro.	I lament the dead.
Pestem fugo.	I drive away infection.
Festa decoro.	I grace the festival.

Another—

Funera plango.	I bemoan the dead.
Fulgura frango.	I abate the lightning.
Sabbata pango.	I announce the sabbath.
Excito lentos.	I rouse the indolent.
Dissipo ventos.	I disperse the winds.
Paco cruentos.	I appease the revengeful.

Another—

Dulcis alisto melis	I am called a sweet-toned
Campana vocor Gabriella.	bell of the angel Gabrielle.

At Lonsborough in Yorkshire—

Sce Cwthberte ora pro nobis.
St. Cuthbert pray for us.

At Aldborough in Yorkshire—

Sce Jacobo ora pro nobis.
St. James pray for us.

These specimens show the influences attributed to bells; and it is almost incredible, so much had the notion of the sanctity of bells prevailed, that the ordinance of baptism was profanely applied to their consecration, by washing them inside and out, with water set apart, in the name of the Holy Trinity; the bishop adding holy oil, crosses, and exorcisms, the then usual forms of baptism; and, withal, appointing godfathers and godmothers, who, as they held the ropes, gave them their names, and engaged to answer on their behalf such questions as the bishop might ask the said bells; and besides all this, the bishop, whilst he anointed them, i. e. the bells, "prayed God to give his Holy Spirit to them, that they might become sanctified for the expelling of all the power, snares, and illusions of the devil—for the souls of the dead; and especially for the chasing away of storms, thunder and tempests."

In further proof of what is here advanced regarding the superstitious ideas attached to bells, the following two inscriptions, carefully copied from two bells, in Christchurch, Hampshire, are given; the church in which they are placed is supposed to have been erected in the reign of the successor of William, commonly called the Conqueror:—

TERTVS : CAMPARE : PACIAT : NOS :
VIVERE : SAKR : SIT : NOBIS : OMEN :
TOVEYNS : CVM : SIT : TIBI : NOMEN :

"May the virtue of the bell make us live well.—As thy name is Touzeyns [all saints,] may it be to us a token of good!"

ABIS : FESTIVS : PESTAS : DIVS :
VT : VTGET : AGNVS : MOX : AVGVSTIVS : MEC : DVM : RESONAT : PRECO : MAGNVS.

"O great Augustine! be kindly present I pray thee, that while this bell is ringing, the holy Lamb may speedily chase away all evil!"

These inscriptions appear direct and positive evidence of some of the mischiefs that have arisen from attempts, alas! too successful, to graft Christianity upon the old stock of Paganism, by the Romish church. Nor is improvement to be expected within her pale, since the same superstition remains in the countries under her influence; and no longer ago than the year 1819, one of our countrymen travelling through Italy, observed it customary to jingle the church bells whenever there was a thunderstorm; and upon inquiring of a peasant on one occasion the meaning of such disturbance, he was answered, "that it was done to drive away the devil." And a bell has, not long ago, been exhibited to the Society of Antiquaries, called the Bell of St. Caenon, (St. Kinnon,) of whose sanctity the people of that part of Ireland whence it was brought think so highly, as to imagine that the breach of an oath taken upon it, would be followed by instant death!

If such be the sentiments infused into the minds of the unlettered, by those who have the care of souls, over so large a part of what is called the Christian world, as the church of Rome embraces within its dominion, how thankful ought we, as Protestants, to be, that, by the blessing of God, we are in some measure drawn from the atmosphere of its influence! How dreadful must be the situation of those who, in matters of comparatively small importance, teach such diabolical opinions;—those who ought to watch over the church of God for good and not for evil! Let us take them as examples to avoid their practices, which are calculated to enslave the mind in ignorance and idolatry, and to call down the vengeance of Heaven on those who follow their wicked devices.

BEMA, (Gr.) a tribunal; the name of the bishop's throne, in the ancient church. This seat, or throne, together with those of the presbyters, were always fixed at the upper end of the chancel, in a semicircle above the altar. For anciently the seats of the bishops and presbyters were joined together, and both called thrones. The manner of their sitting is related by Gregory Nazianzen, in his description of the church of Anastasia, where he speaks of himself as bishop, sitting upon the high throne, and the presbyters on lower benches, on both sides about him. Some learned men think this was done in imitation of the Jewish synagogues, in which according to Maimonides, at the upper end, looking towards the holy land, the law was placed in the wall, in an arch, and on each side were seated the elders in a semicircle.

St. Austin tells Maximus, the Donatist bishop, that, "when bishops come to stand before the tribunal of Christ, at the last judgment, they will then have no tribunals, no lofty seats, or covered chairs; though such honours are granted them for a time in this world, for the benefit and advantage of the church." See CHURCH.

The bishop's throne was likewise called sedes and cathedra; whence come our English names cathedral and see, for a church where the bishop's chair or seat is fixed. See CATHEDRAL and SEE.

The term Bema was given by the Manichees to their altar, and to the day on which Manes was killed, because on that day they adorned their bema or altar with great magnificence.

BENEDICTINES, an order embracing almost all the monks in the West, from the sixth to the tenth century. They were so called because they followed the rule of St. Benedict of Norcia. The rules which the monasteries in France and Spain had received from their bishops, as well as that of St. Columba, were essentially the same as those of Benedict. He established himself in a monastery on Monte Cassino, near Naples, in 529, in a grove of Apollo, after the temple had been destroyed, and this monastery became the model of all the others. After this time the monks who had worn different dresses, now wore black. These monasteries were afterwards reformed by the Cluniacs, a branch of the Benedictines, who had their origin and name from the convent of Clugny, in Burgundy, founded in the year 910. In the twelfth century, the order contained 2,000 monasteries. In the middle ages, they were the asylums of literature and science; and in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, they had attached to them a considerable number of abbeys and priories in different parts of France. They are still found in Italy, Sicily, Spain, Germany, and Austria, but many of them are very lax in their rules.

BENEDICTINE FATHERS, celebrated editions of the writings of the Fathers, edited by some of the most learned of the Benedictine monks in France.

BENEDICTION, in a general sense, the act of blessing, or giving praise to God, or returning thanks for his favours. The Jews, it is said, are obliged to rehearse a hundred benedictions every day, of which eighty are to be spoken in the morning. It is usual to give a benediction to travellers on their taking leave, a practice which is still preserved among the monks. Benedictions were likewise given among the ancient Jews as well as Christians, by imposition of hands. And when at length the primitive simplicity of the Christian worship began to give way to ceremony, they added the sign of the cross, which was made with the hand as before, only elevated or extended. Hence benediction in the modern Romish Church (benedictio sacerdotalis) is used, in a more particular manner, to denote the sign of the cross made by a bishop or prelate, as conferring some grace on the people.

The pope gives a solemn benediction three times every year; viz. on Maunday Thursday, on Easter, and on Ascension day. The term is also employed to denote the blessing pronounced by the priest at the death-bed of the sick, when it is called benedictio beatifica.

Among Protestants, the word is commonly applied to the blessing implored by the minister and congregation at the close of public worship, only with this difference, that consistent Dissenters, instead of aping the Romish priest, who really professes to impart the blessing, use the form "be with us," instead of "be with you."

Benediction is also used for an ecclesiastical ceremony, whereby a thing is rendered sacred or venerable. In this sense benediction differs from consecration, as in the latter, unction is applied, which is not in the former: thus the chalice is consecrated, and the pix blessed; as the former, not the latter is anointed, though in the common usage these two words are applied promiscuously. The spirit of piety, or rather of superstition, has introduced into the Romish church benedictions for almost every thing: we read of forms of benedictions for wax candles, for boughs, for ashes, for church vessels, for ornaments, for flags or ensigns, arms, first-fruits, houses, ships, paschal eggs, cilicium, or the hair-cloth of penitents, churchyards, &c. In general these benedictions are performed by aspersions of holy water, signs of the cross, and prayers suitable to the nature of the ceremony. The forms of these benedictions are found in the Roman pontifical, in the Roman missal, in the book of ecclesiastical ceremonies, printed in Pope Leo X.'s time, and in the rituals and ceremonies of the different churches, which are found collected in Father Martene's work, on the Rites and Discipline of the Church.

BENEFICE, in the ecclesiastical sense of the word, means a church endowed with a revenue for the performance of divine service, or the revenue itself assigned to an ecclesiastical person, by way of stipend for the service he is to do that church.

As to the origin of the word, we find it as follows, in Alet's Ritual. "This word was anciently appropriated to the lands which kings used to bestow on those who had fought valiantly in the wars, and was not used in this particular signification but during the time that the Goths and Lombards reigned in Italy, under whom those fiefs were introduced which were peculiarly termed Benefices, and those who enjoyed them Beneficiarii or vassals; for though the Romans also bestowed lands on their captains and soldiers, yet those lands had not the name of Benefices appropriated to them, but the word Benefice was a general term which included all kinds of gifts or grants, according to the ancient signification of the Latin word. In imitation of the new sense in which that word was taken with regard to fiefs, it began to be employed in the church, when her temporalities began to be divided, and to be given to particular persons, by taking them out of those of the bishops. This the bishops themselves first introduced, purposely to reward merit, and assist such ecclesiastics as might be in necessity. However, this was soon carried to greater lengths, and at last became unlimited, as has since been manifest in the clericate and the monasteries. A benefice, therefore is not merely a right of receiving part of the temporalities of the church, for the service a person renders it; a right which is founded upon the Gospel, and has always subsisted since the apostolic age; but it is that of enjoying a part of the temporalities of the church, assigned and determined in a special form, so as that no other clergyman can lay any claim or pretension to it. And in this age it is not barely the right of enjoying a part of the temporalities of the church, but is likewise a fixed and permanent right, in such a manner that it devolves on another after the death of the incumbent, which anciently was otherwise; for, at the rise of benefices, they were indulged to clergymen only for a stated time, or for life; after which they reverted to the church.

It is not easy to determine when the effects of the church were first divided. It is certain, that in the fourth century, all the revenues were in the hands of the bishops, who distributed them by their Economi or Stewards; and they consisted chiefly in alms and voluntary contributions. When the church came to have inheritances, part of them were assigned for the maintenance of the clergy, of which we find some footsteps in the fifth and sixth centuries; but the allotment seems not to have been a fixed thing, but to have been absolutely discretionary, till the twelfth century.

Benefices are divided, by the canonists, into simple and sacerdotal. The first sort lays no obligation, but to read prayers, sing, &c. Such kind of Beneficiaries are canons, chaplains, chanters, &c. The second is charged with the cure of souls, the direction and guidance of consciences, &c. Such are rectories, vicarages, &c. The canonists likewise specify three ways of vacating a Benefice; viz. de jure, de facto, and by the sentence of a judge. A Benefice is void de jure, when a person is guilty of crimes for which he is disqualified by law to hold a Benefice: such are heresy, simony, &c. A Benefice is void both de facto and de jure, by the natural death or resignation of the incumbent. Lastly, a Benefice is vacated by sentence of the judge, when the incumbent is dispossessed of it, by way of punishment for immorality, or any crime against the state.

The Romanists, again, distinguish Benefices into regular and secular. Regular Benefices are those held by a religious or monk of any order, abbey, priory, or convent. Secular Benefices are those conferred on the secular priests, of which sort are most of their cures.

The church distinguishes between Dignities and Benefices. The former title is only applicable to bishoprics, deaneries, archdeacons, and prebends: the latter comprehends all ecclesiastical preferments under those degrees; as rectories and vicarages. It is essential to these latter, that they be bestowed freely, reserving nothing to the patron; that they be given as a provision for the clerk, who is only an usu-fructuary, and has no inheritance in them; and that all contracts concerning them be in their own nature void. See PLURALITIES, RESIDENCE, and SIMONY.

BENEFICIARY, a beneficed person, or one who receives and enjoys one or more benefices. He is not, however, the proprietor of the revenues of his church; he has only the administration of them, unaccountable for the same to any but God.

BENEFIT OF CLERGY, a privilege enjoyed by those in holy orders, which originated in a religious regard for the honour of the church by which the clergy of Roman Catholic countries were either partially or wholly exempted from the jurisdiction of lay tribunals. It extended, in England, only to cases of felony; and though it was intended to apply only to clerical felons or clerks, yet as every one who could read, was, by the laws of England, considered to be a clerk, when the rudiments of learning came to be diffused, almost every man in the community came to be entitled to this privilege. Peers were entitled to it, whether they could read or not; and by the statutes of 3 and 4 William and Mary, c. 9; and 4 and 5 William and Mary, c. 24, it was extended to women. In the earlier periods of the Catholic church in England, the clerk, on being convicted of felony, and claiming the benefit of clergy, was handed over to the ecclesiastical tribunal for a new trial or purgation, the pretty uniform result of which was his acquittal. This pretended trial of purgation gave rise to a great deal of abuse and perjury, so that at length the secular judges, instead of handing over the culprit to the ecclesiastics for purgation, ordered him to be detained in prison until he should be pardoned by the king. By the statute of 18 Eliz. c. 7, persons convicted of felony, and entitled to benefit of clergy, were to be discharged from prison, being first branded in the thumb as laymen; it being left to the discretion of the judge to detain them in prison not exceeding one year; and by the statute of 5 Anne, c. 6, it was enacted, that it should no longer be requisite that a person should be able to read in order to be entitled to the privilege; so that from the passing of this act, a felon was no more liable to be hanged because of his deficiency in learning. The statutes formerly made specific provisions, that, in particular cases, the culprit should not be entitled to benefit of clergy; but the statute of 7 and 8 Geo. IV. c. 28, provides, that "benefit of clergy, with respect to persons convicted of felony, shall be abolished." In North America, this privilege has been formally abolished in some of the States, and allowed only in one or two cases in others; while in others, again, it does not appear to have been known at all. By the Act of Congress of April 30, 1790, it is enacted, that "benefit of clergy shall not be used or allowed, upon conviction of any crime, for which, by any statute of the United States, the punishment is or shall be declared to be death."—Encyclo. Amer.

BENCKL, or BENCKLIUS, JOHN ALBERT, a distinguished pious German theologian, and a celebrated biblical critic. He was born at Winneden, in Wurtemberg, 1687, studied at Stuttgart and Tübingen, and in 1713 became preacher and professor at Denkendorf. In 1741, he was made councillor and dean of the cloister Herbrechtingen; and, in 1749, he was created abbot or prelate of Alpirsbach, where he died, November 2, 1752. His chief studies were the New Testament and the Fathers. He was the first Lutheran divine who applied to the criticism of the New Testament a grasp of mind which embraced the subject in its whole extent, and a patience of investigation which the study required. While a student, he was much perplexed by the various readings, which led him to form the determination of making a text for himself, which he executed in a very careful and scrupulous manner, according to very rational and critical rules, excepting that he would not admit any reading into the text which had not been previously printed in some edition. In the book of Revelations alone, he deviated from this rule. His conscientious piety greatly tended to allay the fears which had been excited among the clergy with respect to various readings; and to him belongs the honour of having struck out that path which has since been trod with so much eclat by Wetstein, Griesbach, and others.

Besides his Greek New Testament, printed at Tübingen, 1734 and 1763, 4to, Bengel published a Gnomon which is highly esteemed, and an exposition of the Apocalypse, which laid the foundation of a prophetic school in Germany, which exists at this day. According to his system, the end of the forty-two months, and of the number of the beast, was May 21, 1810; and the destruction of the beast was to take place June 18, 1836.

BEREANS, a sect of Protestant dissenters from the church of Scotland, who take their title from, and profess to follow the example of, the ancient Bereans, in building their system of faith and practice upon the Scriptures alone, without regard to any human authority whatever.

As to the origin of this sect, we find that the Bereans first assembled as a separate society of Christians, in the city of Edinburgh, in the autumn of 1773, and soon after, in the parish of Fettercairn. The opponents of the Berean doctrines allege that this new system of faith would never have been heard of had not Mr. Barclay, the founder of it, been disappointed of a settlement in the church of Scotland. But the Bereans, in answer to this charge, appeal not only to Mr. Barclay's doctrine, uniformly preached in the church of Fettercairn, and many other places in that neighbourhood, for fourteen years before that benefice became vacant, but likewise to two different treatises, containing the same doctrines, published by him about ten or twelve years before that period. They admit, indeed, that previous to May, 1773, when the General Assembly, by sustaining the king's presentation in favour of Mr. Foote, excluded Mr. Barclay from succeeding to the church of Fettercairn, (notwithstanding the almost unanimous desire of the parishioners,) the Bereans had not left the established church, or attempted to erect themselves into a distinct society; but they add that this was by no means necessary on their part, until, by the Assembly's decision, they were in danger of being not only deprived of his instructions, but of being scattered as sheep without a shepherd. And they add, that it was Mr. Barclay's open and public avowal, both from the pulpit and the press, of those peculiar sentiments which now distinguish the Bereans, that was the first and principal, if not the only, cause of the opposition set on foot against his settlement in Fettercairn.

The Bereans agree with the great majority of Christians respecting the doctrine of the Trinity, which they hold as a fundamental article; and they also agree, in a great measure, with the professed principles of both our established churches respecting predestination and election, though they allege that these doctrines are not consistently taught in either church. But they differ from the majority of all sects of Christians in various other important particulars, such as, 1. Respecting our knowledge of the Deity. Upon this subject they say, the majority of professed Christians stumble at the very threshold of revelation; and, by admitting the doctrine of natural religion, natural conscience, natural notices, &c. not founded upon revelation, or derived from it by tradition, they give up the cause of Christianity at once to the infidels; who may justly argue, as Mr. Paine in fact does, in his Age of Reason, that there is no occasion for any revelation or word of God, if man can discover his nature and perfections from his works alone. But this the Bereans argue is beyond the powers of human reason; and therefore our knowledge of God is from revelation alone; and that without revelation man would never have entertained an idea of his existence. 2. With regard to faith in Christ, and assurance of salvation through his merits, they differ from almost all other sects whatsoever. These they reckon inseparable, or rather the same, because, say they, "God hath expressly declared, he that believeth shall be saved; and therefore it is not only absurd, but impious, and in a manner calling God a liar, for a man to say, I believe the gospel, but have doubts, nevertheless, of my own salvation." With regard to the various distinctions and definitions that have been given of different kinds of faith, they argue that there is nothing incomprehensible or obscure in the meaning of this word as used in Scripture; but that as faith, when applied to human testimony, signifies neither more nor less than the mere simple belief of that testimony as true, upon the authority of the testifier, so, when applied to the testimony of God, it signifies precisely "the belief of his testimony, and resting upon his veracity alone, without any kind of collateral support from concurrence of any other evidence or testimony whatever." And they insist that, as this faith is the gift of God alone, so the person to whom it is given is as conscious of possessing it, as the being to whom God gives life is of being alive; and therefore he entertains no doubts either of his faith or his consequent salvation through the merits of Christ, who died and rose again for that purpose. In a word, they argue that the gospel would not be what it is held forth to be—glad tidings of great joy—if it did not bring full personal assurance of eternal salvation to the believer: which assurance, they insist, is the present infallible privilege and portion of every individual believer of the gospel. 3. Consistently with the above definition of faith, they say that the sin against the Holy Ghost, which has alarmed and puzzled so many in all ages, is nothing else but unbelief; and that the expression, "it shall not be forgiven neither in this world nor that which is to come," means only that a person dying in infidelity would not be forgiven neither under the former dispensation by Moses, (the then present dispensation, kingdom, or government of God,) nor under the gospel dispensation, which, in respect of the Mosaic, was a kind of future world, or kingdom to come. 4. The Bereans interpret a great part of the Old Testament prophecies, and, in particular, the whole of the Psalms, excepting such as are merely historical or laudatory, to be typical or prophetic of Jesus Christ, his sufferings, atonement, mediation, and kingdom; and they esteem it a gross perversion of these Psalms and prophecies to apply them to the experiences of private Christians. In proof of this they not only urge the words of the apostle, that no prophecy is of any private interpretation, but they insist that the whole of the quotations from the ancient prophecies in the New Testament, and particularly those from the Psalms, are expressly applied to Christ. In this opinion many other classes of Protestants agree with them. 5. Of the absolute all-superintending sovereignty of the Almighty the Bereans entertain the highest idea, as well as of the uninterrupted exertion thereof over all his works, in heaven, earth, and hell, however unsearchable by his creatures. A God without election, they argue, or choice in all his works, is a God without existence, a mere idol, a nonentity. And to deny God's election, purpose, and express will in all his works, is to make him inferior to ourselves.

As to their practice and discipline, they consider infant baptism as a divine ordinance, instituted in the room of circumcision; and think it absurd to suppose that infants, who, all agree, are admissible to the kingdom of God in heaven, should, nevertheless, be incapable of being admitted into his visible church on earth. They commemorate the Lord's supper generally once a month; but as the words of the institution fix no particular period, they sometimes celebrate it oftener, and sometimes at more distant periods, as it may suit their general convenience. They meet every Lord's day, for the purpose of preaching, praying, and exhorting to love and good works. With regard to admission and exclusion of members, their method is very simple: when any person, after hearing the Berean doctrines, professes his belief and assurance of the truths of the gospel, and desires to be admitted into their communion, he is cheerfully received upon his profession, whatever may have been his former manner of life. But if such a one should afterwards draw back from his good profession or practice, they first admonish him, and if that has no effect, they leave him to himself. They do not think that they have any power to deliver a backsliding brother to Satan; that text, and other similar passages, such as, "Whatsoever ye shall bind on earth shall be bound in heaven," &c., they consider as restricted to the apostles, and to the inspired testimony alone, and not to be extended to any church on earth, or any number of churches or of Christians, whether decided by a majority of votes, or by unanimous voices. Neither do they think themselves authorized, as a Christian church, to inquire into each other's political opinions, any more than to examine into each other's notions of philosophy. They both recommend and practise, as a Christian duty, submission to lawful authority; but they do not think that a man by becoming a Christian, or joining their society, is under any obligation, by the rules of the Gospel, to renounce his right of private judgment upon matters of public or private importance. Upon all such subjects they allow each other to think and act as each may see it his duty; and they require nothing more of the members than a uniform and steady profession of the apostolic faith, and a suitable walk and conversation.

It is said that their doctrine has found converts in various places of Scotland, England, and America; and that they have congregations in Edinburgh, Glasgow, Paisley, Stirling, Crieff, Dundee, Arbroath, Montrose, Fettercairn, Aberdeen, and other towns in Scotland, as well as in London, and various places in England.

For further particulars of the doctrines of this sect, see the works of Messrs. Barclay, Nicol, Brookbank, and M'Rae. See also Mr. A. M'Lean's Treatise on the Commission, first edition, p. 88, in which Mr. Barclay's notion of assurance is combated.

BERENGARIANA, a denomination, in the eleventh century, which adhered to the opinions of Berengarius, Archdeacon of Anvers, who asserted that the bread and wine in the Lord's Supper are not really and essentially, but figuratively, changed into the body and blood of Christ. His followers were divided in opinion as to the eucharist. Some allowed them to be changed in effect; others admitted a change in part; and others an entire change, with this restriction, that to those who communicated unworthily, the elements were changed back again. The Catholics ranked them among the most dangerous heretics.

BERNARDINES, an order of monks, founded by Robert, Abbot of Molerne, and reformed by St. Bernard, a celebrated Franciscan friar of the fourteenth century. They wear a white robe, with a black scapulary; and when they officiate they are clothed with a large gown, which is all white, and has great sleeves, with a hood of the same colour. They differ very little from the Cistercians, and had their origin towards the beginning of the twelfth century.

BERYLLIANS, so called from Beryllus, an Arabian, bishop of Bozrah, who flourished in the third century. He taught that Christ did not exist before Mary; but that a spirit issuing from God himself, and therefore superior to all human souls, as being a portion of the divine nature, was united to him at the time of his birth.

BETHEDA, to lie at the pool of, a gross accommodation of a simple historical fact, in which some preachers indulge when urging sinners not to despair of salvation. There is reason to fear that multitudes have, by this abuse of Scripture, been deluded to their eternal ruin. In Germany the formula is used proverbially in speaking of theological candidates who are waiting for a living.

BETHLEHEMITES, a sect called also Star-bearers, because they were distinguished by a red star having five rays, which they wore on their breast, in memory of the star which appeared to the wise men. Several authors have mentioned this order, but none of them have told us their origin, nor where their convents were situated; if we except Matthew Paris, who says that, in 1257, they obtained a settlement in England, which was at Cambridge, in Trumpington-street.

There still exists in the Spanish West Indies an order of Bethlehemites, who are habited like capuchins, except that they wear a leathern girdle instead of a cord, and on their right side an escutcheon representing the nativity of Christ.

BEZA, THEODORE, the celebrated reformer, and biblical critic, was born at Vezelai, in Burgundy, June 24, 1519. He was brought up by his uncle, Nicholas de Beza, counsellor of the parliament of Paris till December, 1528, when he was placed under the care of Melchior Wolmar, at Orleans. With him he lived seven years, made extraordinary progress in polite literature, and from him imbibed the principles of Protestantism. He was intended for the bar, but the law not suiting his dispositions, he pursued his Greek and Latin studies; and in 1549, accepted the Greek professorship at Lausanne. This situation he filled with great ability for nine or ten years, when he went to Geneva, where he settled as a Protestant minister, and became the colleague of Calvin, both in the church and the university. He assisted at the conference of Poissi, where his singular ability procured him great renown. He also attended several synods, at which he manfully contended for the true doctrines of Scripture. He died October 13, 1605, after having published several works, the most important of which was his Greek New Testament, with the Vulgate, and a new Latin version of his own, accompanied with valuable notes. The best edition is that printed at Cambridge, 1642.

BIBLE, βιβλία (BIBLIA), the name applied by Christians, by way of eminence, to the collection of sacred writings of the Holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments.

I. BIBLE, History of.—It is thought that Ezra published the Scriptures in the Chaldee character; for, that language being generally used among the Jews, he thought proper to change the old Hebrew character for it, which hath since that time been retained only by the Samaritans, among whom it is preserved to this day. Prideaux is of opinion that Ezra made additions in several parts of the Bible, where any thing appeared necessary for illustrating, connecting, or completing the work; in which he appears to have been assisted by the same Spirit in which they were first written. Among such additions are to be reckoned the last chapter of Deuteronomy, wherein Moses seems to give an account of his own death and burial, and the succession of Joshua after him. To the same cause our learned author thinks are to be attributed many other interpolations in the Bible, which created difficulties and objections to the authenticity of the sacred text, no ways to be solved without allowing them. Ezra changed the names of several places which were grown obsolete, and, instead of them, put their new names by which they were then called in the text. Thus it is that Abraham is said to have pursued the kings who carried Lot away captive as far as Dan; whereas that place in Moses' time was called Laish, the name Dan being unknown till the Danites, long after the death of Moses, possessed themselves of it. The Jewish canon of Scripture was then settled by Ezra, yet not so but that several variations have been made in it. Malachi, for instance, could not be put into the Bible by him, since that prophet is allowed to have lived after Ezra; nor could Nehemiah be there, since that book mentions (chap. xii. v. 22) Jaddua as high priest, and Darius Codomanus as king of Persia, who were at least a hundred years later than Ezra. It may be added, that in the first book of Chronicles, the genealogy of the sons of Zerubbabel is carried down for so many generations as must necessarily bring it to the time of Alexander; and consequently this book, or at least this part of it, could not be in the canon in Ezra's days. It is probable the two books of Chronicles, Ezra, Nehemiah, Esther, and Malachi, were adopted into the Bible in the time of Simon the Just, the last of the men of the great synagogue.

II. BIBLE, ancient Divisions and Order of Books.—After the return of the Jews from the Babylonish captivity, Ezra collected as many copies as he could of the sacred writings, and out of them all prepared a correct edition, arranging the several books in their proper order. These books he divided into three parts: I. The Law. II. The Prophets. III. The Hagiographa—i. e. the holy writings. I. The law, contains—1. Genesis; 2. Exodus; 3. Leviticus; 4. Numbers; 5. Deuteronomy. II. The writings of the prophets are—1. Joshua; 2. Judges, with Ruth; 3. Samuel; 4. Kings; 5. Isaiah; 6. Jeremiah, with his Lamentations; 7. Ezekiel; 8. Daniel; 9. The twelve minor prophets; 10. Job; 11. Ezra; 12. Nehemiah; 13. Esther. III. The Hagiographa consists of—1. The Psalms; 2. The Proverbs; 3. Ecclesiastes; 4. The Song of Solomon. This division was made for the sake of reducing the number of the sacred books to the number of the letters in their alphabet, which amount to twenty-two. Afterwards the Jews reckoned twenty-four books in their canon of Scripture; in disposing of which the law stood as in the former division, and the prophets were distributed into former and latter: the former prophets are Joshua, Judges, Samuel, and Kings; the latter prophets are Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and the twelve minor prophets; and the Hagiographa consists of the Psalms, the Proverbs, Job, the Song of Solomon, Ruth, the Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, Esther, Daniel, Ezra, the Chronicles. Under the name of Ezra they comprehend Nehemiah: this order hath not always been observed, but the variations from it are of no moment. The five books of the law are divided into fifty-four sections. This division many of the Jews hold to have been appointed by Moses himself; but others, with more probability, ascribe it to Ezra. The design of this division was, that one of these sections might be read in their synagogues every Sabbath-day: the number was fifty-four, because, in their intercalated years, a month being then added, there were fifty-four sabbaths: in other years they reduced them to fifty-two, by twice joining together two short sections.

III. BIBLE, modern Divisions of.—The division of the Scriptures into chapters, as we at present have them, is of modern date. Some attribute it to Stephen Langton, Archbishop of Canterbury, in the reigns of John and Henry III.; but the true author of the invention was Hugo de Santo Caro, commonly called Hugo Cardinalis, because he was the first Dominican that ever was raised to the degree of cardinal. This Hugo flourished about A.D. 1240: he wrote a comment on the Scriptures, and projected the first concordance, which is that of the vulgar Latin Bible. The aim of this work being for the more easy finding out any word or passage in the Scriptures, he found it necessary to divide the book into sections, and the sections into subdivisions; for till that time the vulgar Latin Bibles were without any division at all. These sections are the chapters into which the Bible hath ever since been divided; but the subdivision of the chapters was not then into verses, as it is now. Hugo's method of subdividing them was by the letters A, B, C, D, E, F, G, placed in the margin, at an equal distance from each other, according to the length of the chapters. The subdivision of the chapters into verses, as they now stand in our Bibles, had its original from a famous Jewish rabbi named Mordecai Nathan, about 1445. This rabbi, in imitation of Hugo Cardinalis, drew up a concordance to the Hebrew Bible, for the use of the Jews. But though he followed Hugo in his division of the books into chapters, he refined upon his inventions as to the subdivision, and contrived that by verses. This being found to be a much more convenient method, it has been ever since followed. And thus, as the Jews borrowed the division of the books of the Holy Scriptures into chapters from the Christians, in like manner the Christians borrowed that of the chapters into verses from the Jews. The present order of the several books is almost the same (the Apocrypha excepted) as that made by the Council of Trent.

IV. BIBLE, MSS. of.—Notwithstanding the tendency of the art of printing to supersede, and even to occasion the total loss of written copies of the Scriptures, numerous apographs still exist, some of which are of great antiquity, and possess great authority in determining certain questions of biblical criticism. Others of great value are known to have existed till within a late period, and served, ere they disappeared, as exemplars from which others were taken.

1. Hebrew MSS.—These are either rolls designed for the use of the synagogue, or square manuscripts designed for private use. The former are all on parchment, and written with the greatest care and accuracy: the latter are either on vellum or paper, and are of various sizes. The characters vary in their appearance: the Spanish being perfectly square and elegant; the German crooked and rude; and the Italian holding a middle place between both. A family relationship has also been discovered between these three classes. The Spanish are held in great estimation among the Jews, on account of their having been corrected after the Codex of Hillel—a MS. of the highest antiquity. The German MSS. frequently vary from the Masoretic text, and are greatly valued by biblical critics. The Italian differ from both these classes, and form a separate family.

All the Hebrew manuscripts of note, known to be extant, were written, according to Dr. Kennicott, between the years 1000 and 1457—a circumstance which leads him to infer, as Bishop Walton had done before him, that some measures had been adopted by the Jews for the general destruction of such as did not agree with the corrected or genuine copies. They have been collated by Kennicott and De Rossi, and amount in all to 1109. One of the most remarkable is the Codex Laudianus, which contains not fewer than 14,000 variations from Van der Hooght's edition of the Hebrew Bible.

2. Samaritan MSS.—Of the Pentateuch, written in the Samaritan character, seventeen manuscripts are known to be extant: they are preserved in the Bodleian, the British Museum, and the libraries at Leyden, Paris, Milan, and Rome.

3. Greek MSS.—Of these, an immense number are still in existence; some of them containing the books both of the Old and New Testaments, and others only certain parts, divisions, or books. Some are written in uncial or capital letters, others in cursive or small letters; some without any division of words, in what is called Scriptio continua; some on vellum or parchment, and others on paper. They are of various ages, from the 4th to the 15th century. Some of them are what is called Rescripti, or transcribed on parchment which has since been used, the writing on which having been obliterated to give place for the more recent text. Some are bi-lingual, i. e. they exhibit, besides the Greek text, the Latin version in the opposite page or column.

[1.] Greek MSS. of the Old Testament.—The number of these extant has not yet been ascertained; but Dr. Holmes collated one hundred and thirty-five for his edition of the LXX. The principal, which are in uncial characters, are the Alexandrian, Vatican, Cottonian, Sarravian, Colbertinian, Cæsarian, Ambrosian, Coislinian, Basiliano-Vatican, and Turinian.

[2.] Greek MSS. of the New Testament.—Nearly five hundred of these were either wholly or partially collated previous to the publication of the more recent critical editions of the New Testament: in the execution of which, Griesbach took a distinguished part, having collated for his own edition not fewer than three hundred and fifty-five; but Professor Scholz, who has since edited a critical edition, is said to have consulted six hundred manuscripts that were totally unknown to Griesbach. It has been customary, since the time of Bengel, to distinguish between certain families, recensions, or editions of the MSS., according to their supposed affinity or relationship; and various systems of affinity have been constructed by Bengel, Semler, Griesbach, Michaelis, Hug, and Scholz. That of Griesbach, according to which he classifies them into the Alexandrian, Occidental, and Byzantine, has been not unsuccessfully attacked by Matthæi, Dr. Laurence, and Mr. Nolan; while that of Hug has been greatly modified by the results brought out by the indefatigable researches of his pupil, Professor Scholz. Some of the principal uncial MSS. are the Alexandrian of the fourth century, now preserved in the British Museum; the Vatican, of the fifth; the Codex Bezae, or Cantabrigianus, of the fifth; Ephremi, a rescript of the sixth or seventh; Clermont, of the seventh or eighth. For a full account of these, and most of the other MSS., see the Introductions of Michaelis and Horne.

V. PRINTED EDITIONS of the Hebrew and Greek Texts.—Since the invention of printing, nearly one hundred different editions of the Hebrew Bible have been issued from the press, and about three hundred and fifty editions of the Greek New Testament. It is of course impossible to describe all these editions in a work like the present; but the following list will be found to contain the more important:

(1.) HEBREW BIBLE.—By a collation of the different editions of the Hebrew Bible, it has been ascertained that they admit of a distinct classification.

[1.] The Somnican Recension of 1488, the first printed Hebrew Bible.—The Pentateuch was reprinted from the Bologna edition of 1482, and the other books were based on other earlier editions of the several parts of the Bible. From this Bible were derived the Brixian, of 1494; the Rabbinical Bibles of Bomberg, 1518-21; the editions of Munster, 1534-35, and 1536; and Stephens, 1539-44.

[2.] The Complutensian Recension, in the famous Polyglott, of 1514-1517.—The only edition derived from this source is the Hebrew text of Bertram's Triglott, 1586.

[3.] The Bombergian Recension, in Bomberg's Bible of 1525-1528.—The text of this edition was altered throughout, to make it agree with the Masora. It was edited by the celebrated rabbi, Jacob ben Haim, and gave birth to the following: Bomberg's, of 1528, in 4to., 1533, 1544, and his Rabbin. Bible of 1547-1549; Stephen's, 1544-1546; Justinian's, 1551, 1552, 1563, 1573; Elon's, of 1618; De Gava's, 1566, 1568, 1582; Bragadin's, 1614, 1615, 1619, 1628, 1707; Plantin's, 1566; Hartman's, 1595, 1598; and a Wittenberg edition of 1586 or 1587.

[4.] Editions containing a mixed text.—1. The Antwerp Polyglott, 1569-1572; from which sprang the Paris Polyglott, 1628-1645; the London Polyglott, 1657; the Leipzig Polyglott, 1750; Arius Montanus's Bible, 1571; Reineccii, 1725, 1739, 1756, and in 1793 by Doederlein and Meisner, with the various readings of Kennicott and De Rossi. 2. The Hutterian text, 1587; from this were derived the texts of Wolder, 1596, and Nisselin, 1662. 3. The Buxtorfian text, 1611; Janson's, 1639; Buxt. Rabbim. Bible, 1618, 1619; Amsterdam Rabbim. Bible, 1724. 4. Text of Menasse Ben Israel, 1630, 1631, 1635. 5. The text of Joseph Athias, 1661, 1667; from this text is taken that of Clodius, 1677, 1692, 1716; Jablonsky, 1699, 1712; Opitius, 1709; J. D. Michaelis, 1720; and the celebrated edition of Van der Hooght, 1705, of the text of which the following are reprints:—Prop's, 1724; Schmidius, 1740; Houbigant's, 1753; Simons's, 1752, et freq.; Kennicott's, 1776, 1780; Jahn's, 1806; Boothroyd's, 1807; Frey's, 1812; and the stereotype editions now printed by Mr. Duncan.

(ii.) GREEK NEW TESTAMENT.—The principal editions of the Greek New Testament may be divided into the more ancient and the more modern: the former are of importance, inasmuch as they are the sources from which so many others have been derived; the latter because they are the result of a more complete collation of MSS. and editions, and have been conducted on more matured principles of biblical criticism.

(A.) More ancient editions.—1. The Complutensian text, 1514, followed in the Antwerp and Paris Polyglotts, and in the editions of Plantin and many others. 2. The editions of Eramus, 1516, 1519, 1522, 1527, 1535, &c. 3. Stephen's, 1546, 1549, 1550; London Polyglott, 1657; Mill, 1707; Kuster, 1710; Bagster's Polyglott. 4. Beza, 1565, 1576, 1582, 1589, 1598; ELZEVIUS, 1624, &c.

(B.) More modern editions.—1. Well's Greek and English New Testament, 1709, 1719. 2. Bengelius's, 1734. 3. Wetstein's, 1751, 1752. 4. Bowyer's, 1763; Harwood's, 1776, 1784; Mathei's, Riga, 1782, 1788, 1803, 1804, 1807; Alter's, 1786, 1787; Griesbach's, 1796; 1806, 1809, 1818; Knapp's, 1797, 1813, 1824; Vater's, 1824; Scholz, 1830—1836; Lochmann's, 1831; Bloomfield's last, 1839.

(VI.) BIBLE, Versions of.—The number of translations of the Scripture is now very great. Some of them are derived from a common origin; some are made immediately from the originals; others are mediate, or versions made from other versions.

(A.) Genealogy of Biblical Versions.

i. Versions made immediately from the HEBREW.—1. The Greek of the LXX. 2. That of Aquila. 3. Theodotion. 4. Symmachus. 5th, 6th, and 7th, or the three anonymous versions. 8. In the absence of authentic accounts, respecting the manner in which most of the more recent versions have been executed, it is at present impossible to determine whether they have been done immediately from the originals, or whether they claim as their parent one or other of the pre-existing translations.

(B.) History of Biblical versions. We have already mentioned the first translation of the Old Testament by the LXX. Both Old and New Testaments were afterwards translated into Latin by the primitive Christians; and while the Roman empire subsisted in Europe, the reading of the Scriptures in the Latin tongue, which was the universal language of that empire, prevailed every where; but since the face of affairs in Europe has been changed, and so many different monarchies erected upon the ruins of the Roman empire, the Latin tongue has by degrees grown into disuse; whence has arisen a necessity of translating the Bible into the respective languages of each people; and this has produced as many different versions of the Scriptures in the modern languages, as there are different nations professing the Christian religion. Besides which, many versions have recently been made by the missionaries and others for the benefit of the heathen. Of most of these, as well as of the ancient translations, and the earliest printed editions, we shall now take notice in their order.

I. THE ANCIENT VERSIONS.

1. Anglo-Saxon versions of the Psalms were made by Bishop Adhelm, about the year 706, and by King Alfred, who died in the year 900. The whole Bible was translated by the Venerable Bede, about the beginning of the eighth century. The Heptateuch, translated by Elfric towards the close of the tenth century, was published at Oxford, 1699; and the Gospels were printed, London, 1571, 1658; Dordrecht and Amsterdam, 1665, 1684.

2. The Arabic.—In this language there exist numerous versions of different portions of the Bible. Of these the more important are the Pentateuch, by Saadiah, made in the tenth century, and published at Constantinople in 1546. It is printed also in the Polyglott, the text of the other books in which is from unknown authors. The Arabic version of the four Gospels was first published at Rome in 1590-91; the New Testament by Erpenius, at Leyden, in 1616, and another under the editorship of Salomon Negri, in London, in 1729. The whole Bible was printed for the Propaganda at Rome, 1671, in three vols. folio.

The Armenian version was made towards the close of the fourth century, by Miesrob and Isaac, two of the most learned men of the nation. It was first printed at Amsterdam, 1666, under the care of Uschan, an Armenian archbishop, who has been charged with altering it after the Vulgate. It has since appeared at Constantinople, 1705; Venice, 1805; and Petersburg and Serampore, 1817. The edition of 1805 is highly critical. The New Testament was first published separately in 1668.

4. Of the Bashmuric, an Egyptian dialect, fragments only have been published by Pastor Engelbreth, Copenhagen, 1816. They exist in the Borgian Museum, at Velitri.

5. The Coptic New Testament was published by Wilkins, Oxford, 1716. The version is of high antiquity, probably from the fourth century, and is greatly esteemed by critics.

6. The Ethiopic version is also supposed to have been made in the fourth century. Separate books of the Old Testament have been published at different times, and in the London Polyglott. The New Testament was first printed in 1548-1549, but very incorrectly; and indeed the present text of this version, which otherwise would be of great service in biblical criticism, is altogether in such a state, as to be comparatively of little value. That of the Polyglott edition is still more incorrect than the Roman.

7. The Georgian was made about the year 600, by natives qualified for the undertaking, who had spent some time in Greece, and made themselves well acquainted with sacred literature. The first edition of the New Testament was printed at Tiflis about the beginning of last century, and the whole Bible at Moscow, in 1743.

8. The Gothic version was made by Ulphilas, bishop of the Meso-Goths, about the middle of the fourth century. It comprised all the books of the Scripture, but with the exception of the four Gospels, the Pauline Epistles, and some fragments of Ezra and Nehemiah, they have either been lost, or remain undiscovered in some of the libraries of Italy. The four Gospels are preserved in the Codex Argenteus, or "Silver Book," in the university library at Upsala, in Sweden, and were first published by Junius, at Dordrecht, 1665. The last edition, by Zahn, printed at Weissenfels, 1805, is an elegant and complete critical work.

9. Greek of the LXX. See SEPTUAGINT.

10. Latin. The Latin versions were numerous, and some of them of high antiquity. The most celebrated are, 1. The Vetus or Itala, which appears to have been made about the beginning of the second century. Few fragments of it now remain, but such as have been preserved were collected and published from various sources by Blanchini, Rome, 1720, and Sabatier, Rheims, 1743. 2. The Revised Version of Jerome. Owing to the great confusion which had been introduced into the ancient Vulgate, by the discrepancies existing between the different copies of the Ante-Hexaplar Septuagint, from which it was made, it was found necessary, towards the close of the fourth century, to undertake a revision of it, which task Pope Damasus devolved upon Jerome, the first biblical scholar of that age. Of this version only the Book of Job and the Psalms have come down to our times.

3. The New Version of Jerome, now partly contained in the modern Vulgate. This was made from the original Hebrew, and closely follows the Rabbinical interpretation at that time current in Palestine, where Jerome made himself thoroughly acquainted with the Hebrew language. It was violently opposed at first, but gradually superseded the less correct translations, and, after the time of Gregory the Great, was universally received in the western church. In the Council of Trent, it was declared to be the only authentic text, and the standard by which all disputations, expositions, and sermons were to be tried. It has undergone several revisions, the two most remarkable of which are those made by Popes Sixtus V. and Clement VIII. Though the former of these pontiffs had affixed the seal of infallibility to the edition published under his auspices, it was ordered by his successor to be suppressed, as swarming with errors; and another equally infallible edition was brought out, differing from the former in upwards of two thousand instances!

11. The Persic version of the Pentateuch, published in the Constantinopolitan Polyglott, 1546, was made by Jacob ben Joseph, a native of Tus, in Persia, and is not more ancient than the ninth century. It is barbarously servile. The Gospels exist in two Persic translations; that published in the London Polyglott, and that published by Wheeler and Pierson, 1652-1657. They are neither of them very ancient.

12. The Sahidic version is supposed to have been made in the second or third century, and is considered of great value for critical purposes. The most complete collection of the fragments which we possess of this version was prepared by Dr. Woide, and published at Oxford, 1799.

13. The Samaritan version, made some time between the second and eighth centuries. It is done from the Samaritan text, but the translator has made considerable use of the Targum of Onkelos. It is found in the Paris and London Polyglotts.

14. The Syriac versions are four in number:—1. The Peshito, or accurate version, most probably made early in the second century; and, of all the translations now extant, so far as the New Testament is concerned, the most deserving to be thoroughly studied by every biblical scholar. The text of the Old Testament was first printed by Gabriel Sionita, in the Paris Polyglott; and the editio princeps of the New Testament by Widmanstad, Vienna, 1555. The most useful edition of the Syriac New Testament is that published by Schaff, with an excellent lexicon: the most convenient and elegant edition is that lately furnished by Mr. Bagster. 2. The Philoxenian, made by Polycarp, the rural bishop of Philoxenus, bishop of Hierapolis or Mabug, in the government of Aleppo, A.D. 488-508. It is servile in the extreme, but is of great use in determining certain readings of the New Testament. It was published at Oxford, 1778, 1779, accompanied with a Latin translation. 3. The Hexaplar version, made by Paul, bishop of Tela, in the years 616 and 617. Only the books of Joshua, Job, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, Song of Solomon, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Lamentations, Ezekiel, Daniel, and the Twelve Minor Prophets, have been published. As the name indicates, it was made from the Septuagint text in Origen's Hexapla. 4. The Jerusalem Syriac version, of which some fragments have been discovered and published by Professor Alder.

II. THE MODERN VERSIONS.

1. The Amharic version, undertaken by M. Asselin, French consul at Cairo, is in the royal dialect spoken at the court of Gondar, in Abyssinia, and prevalent in the eastern parts of Africa. The four Gospels were published by the Bible Society, in 1823.

2. The Assamese, in the language of the kingdom of Assam, in the East Indies. The New Testament in this language was printed at Serampore, in 1819.

3. The Basque New Testament was first printed at Rochelle, 1571.

4. The Bikaneer New Testament has been published by the Serampore missionaries for the use of the natives who live to the south of the Punjab.

5. The Bohemian. Of the Scriptures in the Bohemian language, not fewer than fourteen translations have come down to our times. The oldest was made in 1400, and is still preserved in Dresden. The New Testament was first published in 1474, and the whole Bible in 1488. The Protestants have a version made by eight of their learned men, who were sent to Wirtemberg and Basle to study the Oriental languages, and make themselves well acquainted with the principles on which other translations had been conducted. It was first published 1579-1593, in 6 vols., 4to, at the expense of the baron John Zerottimus.

6. The Brija-Bhassa gospels have been prepared by the Serampore missionaries, and that of Matthew was finished in 1816.

7. The Bullom version of the four gospels and the Acts has recently been made by the Rev. Mr. Nylander, a missionary on the west coast of Africa, where that language is spoken. The Gospel of Matthew was printed in 1816.

8. The Bulocha or Bulooshee, another Serampore version, made for the use of the natives of Bulochistan, a province in the north-west of India.

9. The Bundelkundee, undertaken at the same place.

10. The Burman New Testament was translated by Felix Carey; and separate parts have since been prepared by Mr. Judson, the American missionary in the Burman empire.

11. The Calmuc version of the New Testament has been prepared by Mr. Schmidt of St. Petersburg, and part of it has been printed by the Russian Bible Society.

12. The Canarese New Testament, translated by the Rev. Mr. Hands, into the language of the Carnatic, was printed in 1820. The Old Testament is far advanced.

13. The Chinese. Two versions of the entire Bible exist in the Chinese language; the one executed by Dr. Marshman, 1814-1821, the other by Drs. Morrison and Milne, 1812-1823. Vast numbers of copies of the New Testament, and separate books have been circulated among the Chinese who live out of China Proper, or who trade in the Eastern Seas.

14. The Cingalese, originally prepared by the Dutch for the inhabitants of Ceylon. The four gospels were first printed at Columbo in 1739; the entire New Testament, with Genesis, Exodus, and Leviticus, in 1783. A new version has been undertaken by the missionaries resident on the island, and part of it has already gone through more than one edition.

15. The Creolese version, made for the use of the negroes in the Danish West India Islands, was published at Copenhagen 1781, at the expense of the King of Denmark. Another for the use of the slaves in Surinam has been published by the Bible Society.

16. The Croatian New Testament, by Pastor Truber, was first published at Tubingen, 1551. The whole Bible was first printed at Wittenberg in 1584.

17. The Curdish version of the New Testament is proceeding under the auspices of the Bible Society, but has not yet been completed.

18. The first Danish New Testament, by Mikkelsen, was published in 1524. The whole Bible in 1550. It is one of the best of the European versions of the Scriptures.

19. The Dutch have three versions: the first made from the version of Luther, and published in 1560; the second, which is now commonly in use, and is of high value, was prepared, by order of the Synod of Dort, from the original languages. It was first printed in 1637. The third version comprises the New Testament only, and was published for the use of the Remonstrants, in 1680.

20. The Delaware version comprises only the three epistles of John. It was prepared by Mr. Dencke, a Moravian missionary, and printed at New York, 1818.

21. The English Bible. The first English Bible we read of was that translated by J. Wickliffe, about the year 1360, but never printed, though there are manuscript copies of it in several of the public libraries. A translation, however, of the New Testament by Wickliffe, was printed by Mr. Lewis, in 1731. J. de Trevisa, who died about 1398, is also said to have translated the whole Bible; but whether any copies of it are remaining does not appear. The first printed Bible in our language was that translated by W. Tindal, assisted by Miles Coverdale, and printed abroad in 1526; but most of the copies were bought up and burnt by Bishop Tunstal and Sir Thomas More. It only contained the New Testament, and was revised and republished by the same person in 1530. The prologues and prefaces added to it, reflect on the bishops and clergy; but this edition was also suppressed, and the copies burnt. In 1532, Tindal and his associates finished the whole Bible, except the Apocrypha, and printed it abroad; but, while he was afterwards preparing a second edition, he was taken up and burnt for heresy in Flanders. On Tindal's death, his work was carried on by Coverdale and John Rogers (superintendent of an English church in Germany, and the first martyr in the reign of Queen Mary,) who translated the Apocrypha, and revised Tindal's translation, comparing it with the Hebrew, Greek, Latin, and German, and adding prefaces and notes from Luther's Bible. He dedicated the whole to Henry VIII in 1537, under the borrowed name of Thomas Matthews; whence this has been usually called Matthews' Bible. It was printed at Hamburg, and license obtained for publishing it in England, by the favour of Archbishop Cranmer, and the bishops Latimer and Shaxton. The first Bible printed by authority in England, and publicly set up in churches, was the same Tindal's version, revised and compared with the Hebrew, and in many places amended by Miles Coverdale, afterwards bishop of Exeter; and examined after him by Archbishop Cranmer, who added a preface to it; whence this was called Cranmer's Bible. It was printed by Grafton, of the largest volume, and published in 1540; and, by a royal proclamation, every parish was obliged to set one of the copies in their church, under the penalty of forty shillings a month; yet, two years after, the Popish bishops obtained its suppression by the king. It was restored under Edward VI., suppressed again under Queen Mary's reign, and restored again in the first year of Queen Elizabeth, and a new edition of it given in 1562. Some English exiles at Geneva, in Queen Mary's reign, viz., Coverdale, Goodman, Gilbie, Sampson, Cole, Wittington, and

Knox, made a new translation, printed there in 1560, the New Testament having been printed in 1557; hence called the Geneva Bible, containing the variations of readings, marginal annotations, &c., on account of which it was much valued by the Puritan party in that and the following reigns. Archbishop Parker resolved on a new translation for the public use of the church; and engaged the bishops, and other learned men, to take each a share or portion; these being afterwards joined together and printed, with short annotations, in 1568, in large folio, made what was afterwards called the Great English Bible, and commonly the Bishops' Bible. In 1589, it was also published in octavo, in a small, but fine black letter; and here the chapters were divided into verses, but without any breaks for them, in which the method of the Geneva Bible was followed, which was the first English Bible where any distinction of verses was made. It was afterwards printed in large folio, with corrections, and several prolegomena, in 1572: this is called Matthew Parker's Bible. The initial letters of each translator's name were put at the end of his part; e. gr. at the end of the Pentateuch, W. E., for William Exon, that is, William, Bishop of Exeter, whose allotment ended there; at the end of Samuel, R. M., for Richard Menevensis, or Bishop of St. David's, to whom the second allotment fell; and the like of the rest. The archbishop oversaw, directed, examined, and finished the whole. This translation was used in the churches for forty years, though the Geneva Bible was more read in private houses, being printed above twenty times in as many years. King James bore it an inveterate hatred on account of the notes, which, at the Hampton Court conference, he charged as partial, untrue, seditious, &c. The Bishops' Bible, too, had its faults. The king frankly owned that he had seen no good translation of the Bible in English; but he thought that of Geneva the worst of all. After the translation of the Bible by the Bishops, two other private versions were made of the New Testament; the first by Laurence Thompson, from Beza's Latin edition, with the notes of Beza, published in 1582, in quarto, and afterwards in 1589, varying very little from the Geneva Bible; the second by the Papists at Rheims, in 1584, called the Rhemish Bible, or Rhemish Translation. These, finding it impossible to keep the people from having the Scriptures in their vulgar tongue, resolved to give a version of their own, as favourable to their cause as might be. It was printed on a large paper, with a fair letter and margin. One complaint against it was, its retaining a multitude of Hebrew and Greek words untransliterated, for want, as the editors express it, of proper and adequate terms in the English to render them by; as the words azymes, tunike, holocaust, prepuce, pasche, &c.: however, many of the copies were seized by the queen's searchers, and confiscated; and Thomas Cartwright was solicited, by Secretary Walsingham, to refute it; but, after good progress made therein, Archbishop Whitgift prohibited his further proceeding, as judging it improper that the doctrine of the Church of England should be committed to the defence of a Puritan; and appointed Dr. Fulke in his place, who refuted the Rhemists with great spirit and learning. Cartwright's refutation was also afterwards published in 1618, under Archbishop Abbot. About thirty years after their New Testament, the Roman Catholics published a translation of the Old at Douay, 1609 and 1610, from the Vulgate, with annotations, so that the English Roman Catholics have now the whole Bible in their mother-tongue; though, it is to be observed, they are forbidden to read it without a license from their superiors. The last English Bible was that which proceeded from the Hampton Court conference, in 1603, where, many exceptions being made to the Bishops' Bible, King James gave order for a new one; not, as the preface expresses it, for a translation altogether new, nor yet to make a good one better; or, of many good ones, one best. Fifty-four learned men were appointed to this office by the king, as appears by his letter to the archbishop, dated 1604, which being three years before the translation was entered upon, it is probable seven of them were either dead, or had declined the task, since Fuller's list of the translators makes but forty-seven, who, being ranged under six divisions, entered on their province in 1607. It was published in 1611, with a dedication to James, and a learned preface, and is commonly called King James's Bible. After this, all the other versions dropped, and fell into disuse, except the epistles and gospels in the Common Prayer Book, which were still continued according to the Bishops' translation, till the alteration of the liturgy in 1661, and the psalms and hymns, which are to this day continued as in the old version. The judicious Selden, in his Table-Talk, speaking of the Bible, says, "The English translation of the Bible is the best translation in the world, and renders the sense of the original best, taking in for the English translation the Bishops' Bible, as well as King James's. The translators in King James's time took an excellent way. That part of the Bible was given to him who was most excellent in such a tongue (as the Apocrypha to Andrew Downs:) and then they met together, and one read the translation, the rest holding in their hands some Bible, either of the learned tongues, or French, Spanish, or Italian, &c. If they found any fault, they spoke; if not, he read on." King James's Bible is that now read by authority in all the churches in Britain. Notwithstanding, however, the excellency of this translation, it must be acknowledged that our increasing acquaintance with oriental customs and manners, and the changes our language has undergone since King James's time, are very powerful arguments for a new revision. A very considerable change has been unwarrantably introduced into the text in the subsequent editions, by turning into italics what did not thus appear in the editio princeps and several which followed it; by means of which, numerous passages are rendered unavoidably perplexing to the mere English reader. There have been various English Bibles with marginal references, by Canne, Hayes, Barker, Scattergood, Field, Tennison, Lloyd, Blayney, Wilson, Scott, and Bagster.

22. The Esquimaux version of the New Testament has been prepared at different times by the Moravian missionaries, and printed between the years 1809 and 1826.

23. The Esthonian New Testament was first printed in 1685, and the whole Bible in 1689.

24. The Faroese Gospel of Matthew was printed at Copenhagen, 1823, for the use of the inhabitants of the Faroe Islands.

25. The Finnish New Testament was first printed at Stockholm, 1548, and the whole Bible at the same place, 1642. It was executed by certain professors and clergymen well qualified for the task.

26. The Formosan version of the Gospels of Matthew and John, was prepared by Robert Junius, a Dutchman, and printed at Amsterdam in 1661.

27. The French Bible.—The oldest French Bible is the version of Peter de Vaux, chief of the Waldenses, who lived about the year 1160. Raoul de Preste translated the Bible into French in the reign of King Charles V. of France, about A.D. 1383. Besides these, there are several old French translations of particular parts of the Scripture. The doctors of Louvain published the Bible in French at Louvain, by order of the Emperor Charles V., in 1550. There is a version by Isaac le Maître de Sacy, published in 1672, with explanations of the literal and spiritual meaning of the text, which was received with wonderful applause, and has often been reprinted. Of the New Testaments in French, which have been printed separately, one of the most remarkable is that of F. Amelotte, of the Oratory, composed by the direction of some French prelates, and printed, with annotations, in 1666, 1667, and 1670. The author pretends he had searched all the libraries in Europe, and collated the oldest manuscripts; but, on examining his work it appears that he has produced no considerable various readings which had not before been taken notice of either in the London Polyglott, or elsewhere. The New Testament of Mons, printed in 1665, with the archbishop of Cambray's permission, and the king of Spain's license, made great noise in the world. It was condemned by Pope Clement IX. in 1668, by Pope Innocent XI. in 1669, and in several bishoprics of France at several times. The New Testament, published at Trevoux, in 1702, by M. Simon, with literal and critical annotations upon difficult passages, was condemned by the bishops of Paris and Meaux in 1702. F. Bohours, a Jesuit, with the assistance of F. F. Michael Tellier and Peter Bernier, Jesuits, likewise published a translation of the New Testament in 1697; but this translation is for the most part harsh and obscure, which was owing to the author's adhering too strictly to the Latin text. There are likewise French translations published by Protestant authors; one by Robert Peter Olivetan, printed in 1535, and often reprinted with the corrections of John Calvin and others; another by Sebastian Castalio, remarkable for particular ways of expression never used by good judges of the language. John Diodati likewise published a French Bible at Geneva in 1644; but some find fault with his method in that he rather paraphrases the text than translates it. Faber Stapulensis translated the New Testament into French, which was revised and accommodated to the use of the reformed churches in Piedmont, and printed in 1534. Lastly, John le Clerc published a New Testament in French at Amsterdam, in 1703, with annotations, taken chiefly from Grotius and Hammond; but the use of this version was prohibited by order of the States-general, as tending to revive the errors of Sabellius and Socinus.

28. The Gaelic.—The New Testament in this language was first published in 1765; and the Old Testament, in three volumes, printed at different times, in 1785, 1787, and 1801. The translation has since been revised and improved, and new editions have issued from the press in 1807 and 1826.

29. The German versions.—Of these there exists a great number; but the most important are,—1. The version of Luther, of which the New Testament appeared in 1522, and the entire Bible in 1530; the different books appeared in the interval either separately or coupled together, as they were got ready. The edition of 1546 was printed under the Reformer's immediate superintendence; and, giving to it all the perfection in his power, he was desirous that it should be considered as the standard copy of this great work. It was made immediately from the Hebrew and Greek originals; but in order to render it as correct as possible, he collected a number of learned men, to revise every sentence by a collation not only of the version with the original text, but with the Targums, the LXX, the Vulgate, and other versions. Of these, Melancthon appears to have taken the most active part in the assistance rendered to Luther. It is highly distinguished for its energy and perspicuity; and the style is so pure and elegant, as to be considered a model of the vernacular language even in the present day. 2. The version of Piscator, professor at Herborn, at which place it appeared in 1602. It was designed to give a closer rendering of the words and phrases of the original, and appears to have derived considerable colouring from the Latin version of Tremellius and Junius. It was in great repute among the members of the Reformed Church. 3. The version of J. D. Michaelis, published between the years 1773 and 1791, and accompanied with notes for the unlearned, is professedly an improved translation of the Scriptures, according to more enlightened principles of criticism and interpretation. In many respects it unquestionably possesses great merit; but the unwarrantable liberties which the author has not unfrequently taken with the text, and the fondness for conjecture which he has indulged, detract from its claims on public confidence and adoption. 4. The version of Augusti and De Wette, 1809—1814, one of the last that have appeared in the German language, is certainly one of the best translations ever published in any language. Simple, close, yet easy and elegant, it must be read with pleasure; and though one of the translators is well known to occupy the first rank among the neologians of the present day, it is a remarkable circumstance that his peculiar dogmatical views appear to have exerted no influence on the version. Translations of the Bible into German existed some time before the Reformation; the oldest known was printed in the year 1466.

30. The modern Greek or Romatic version of the New Testament was made by Maximus Calliergi, and printed at Geneva, 1638. A translation of the Old Testament is now being made in Greece, under the auspices of the Bible Society.

31. The Greenlandish New Testament exists in two translations; the one printed in 1799, and the other in 1822.

32. The Grisonic.—The Bible in the language or dialect of the Grisons, was published in 1719.

33. The Guzeratee version of the entire Scriptures has been made and printed for the use of the inhabitants of the peninsula of Guzerat.

34. The Hebrew New Testament.—Several attempts have been made to furnish a good translation of the books of the New Testament in the original language of the Old. The first edition is that of Elias Hutter, published in his Polyglott of 1599: the second was published by Professor Robertson in 1661, but most of the copies perished in the great fire of London: a third and greatly revised text was published by the Jews' Society in 1821; but the best version is that lately executed by the lamented Mr. Greenfield, and published by Bagster in 1831.

35. The Helvetian.—In this language there are two versions: the former was executed by Leo Juda, and published between the years 1525 and 1529: the latter, called, by way of distinction, the New Zurich Bible, was made by the learned orientalist, Hottinger, assisted by several other biblical scholars of acknowledged ability. It was published at Zurich in 1667.

36. The Hindee or Hindostanee New Testament, prepared in two different translations by the Serampore missionaries, and by the Rev. Henry Martyn, is extensively in circulation among the inhabitants of Hindostan.

37. The Hungarian.—Besides a Popish version made from the Vulgate, there exists a Protestant version, executed with great care by Casper Caroli, and first published in 1589.

38. The Icelandic New Testament, done by O. Gottschalkson, was printed in 1539, at Copenhagen; and the whole Bible was published at Holum, in 1584, under the superintendence of Bishop Thorlakson, who liberally contributed to defray the expense of the undertaking.

39. The Irish version of the New Testament was executed by Dr. Daniel, archbishop of Tuam; and that of the Old Testament by Mr. King, but revised by Dr. Bedell, bishop of Kilmore. The whole was printed in 1685, at the expense of the Hon. Robert Boyle.

40. The Italian.—The first Italian Bible published by the Romanists is that of Nicholas Malermi, a Benedictine monk, printed at Venice in 1471. It was translated from the Vulgate. The version of Anthony Bruccioli, published at Venice in 1532, was prohibited by the council of Trent. The Calvinists likewise have their Italian Bibles. There is one of John Diodati, in 1607 and 1641; and another of Maximus Theophilus, in 1551, dedicated to Francis de Medicis, duke of Tuscany.

The latest version that has appeared in Italian is that of Martini, printed in 1769—1779.

41. The Karelian.—In this Finnish dialect the gospel of Matthew was printed at Petersburg in 1820.

42—45. Into the Khassee, the Kashmeerce, the Kanoji, and the Kunkuna dialects, versions of different portions of the Scriptures have been prepared by the missionaries of Serampore.

46. The Laponese New Testament was first printed in 1755, and the whole Bible at the printing-office of Dr. Nordin, bishop of Hermosand, in 1810.

47. The Lithuanian version of the Bible is velche dialect of this language, the Bible was published in 1657; and in that of Ladin in 1719.

70. Into the Samogitian language a version of the New Testament was made by a Roman Catholic bishop, at the request of the Russian Bible Society, and printed in 1820.

71. The Sanscrit, or learned language of India, possesses a version of the entire Scriptures, executed by the Serampore missionaries, and printed between the years 1808 and 1818.

72. A Serbian version of the New Testament was prepared for the Russian Bible Society, and printed in 1825.

73. The Spanish versions are various. The earliest, done from the Vulgate, was printed at Valencia, 1478. Pinel's version of the Old Testament, for the use of the Jews, was printed at Ferrara in 1553. There are also the versions of De Reyna, 1569; San Miguel, 1793, 1794; and Arnata, begun in 1823, and not yet completed.

74. The Swedish versions are two; that made from Luther's version, and published in 1541; and the revised version, undertaken by order of the king in 1774. The latter translation, though executed in accordance with the more enlightened critical principles of the period at which it was made, has never gained the approbation of the Swedish public, and has not superseded the more early authorised version.

75. The Tahitian version of the whole Bible, executed by the London Society's missionaries.

76. The Tamil versions are two in number: that executed by the German missionaries, the New Testament of which was printed at Tranquebar, 1715; and the Old Testament at the same place, 1723—1728; and another by Fabricius, also a German missionary, and printed at Madras, 1777.

77. The Tatar versions exist in different dialects; but none of them contain more than a single book or two, excepting that executed by the Scotch missionaries at Karass, on the north of the Caucasus, and that in the Orenburg-Tatar dialect, both of which comprise the whole New Testament. The former was printed at Karass in 1813, the latter at Astracan in 1820.

78. The Teloogoo or Telinga New Testament, was translated by the Missionaries at Serampore, where it was printed in 1818. They also completed a translation of the Pentateuch into the same language.

79. In the Turkish language, there exist three versions of the New Testament. The first was executed by Dr. Lazarus Scaman, and printed in 1666. The second was made by Albertus Bobovsky or Ali Bey, dragoman to the Sultan Mohammed IV., and completed in the forementioned year; but it was not printed till 1819, when it was carried through the press at Paris, at the expense of the British and Foreign Bible Society. In consequence, however, of egregious faults and improprieties having been detected in the style, and in many of the renderings, the committee of that Society were ultimately obliged to suppress the edition; and a new impression purged from the objectionable matter, appeared in 1827. An edition from a revised and corrected copy of Bobovsky's version of the Old Testament also appeared at the same place in 1828. The third version of the Turkish New Testament was undertaken by Mr. Dickson one of the Scotch missionaries at Astracan. It is partially based on the Karass New Testament, and that of Bobovsky. A considerable portion of the Old Testament was also completed by the same translator; but, owing to the change of biblical affairs in Russia, no part of either has been published.

80. The Urdu New Testament, by the missionaries of the London Missionary Society at Benares.

81. The Virginian translation of the Scriptures was executed by Elliot, the apostle of the Indians. The New Testament was printed at Cambridge, 1661, and the whole Bible in 1685.

82. The Wallachian New Testament was first printed at Belgrade in 1648; the entire Bible in 1668, at Bukharest.

83. The Welsh version was made in consequence of an act of parliament passed in the reign of Queen Elizabeth. The New Testament appeared in 1567, and the whole Bible in 1588. It has since been revised and corrected, and has gone through many editions.

84. The New Testament has been translated and printed in the Wutch or Multunee dialect, which is spoken on the eastern bank of the Indus.

VII. BIBLES, Polyglott.—Bibles printed in several languages, exhibiting, in general, the text of the different versions on the same page, or at least on the two open pages of the volume, are called Polyglotts, from πολυς, many, and the Attic γλωττα, a language.

1. The earliest attempt of the kind was made by Aldus, the celebrated Venetian printer; but it contains only the first fifteen verses of the first of Genesis. The Psalter, by Justinian, Genoa, 1516, in Hebrew, Arabic, Greek, Chaldee, and Latin, is the first Polyglott of any biblical book. His example was followed by Potken, who, in 1518, published the Psalter in Hebrew, Greek, Ethiopic, and Latin.

2. The first Polyglott of the whole Bible was the Complutensian, so called from its having been printed at Complutum, in Spain, 1502-1517, and published in 1522, in 6 vols. folio. It contains the Hebrew, Latin, Vulgate, and Greek, of the Old Testament, and the Greek and Latin Vulgate of the New.

It was undertaken and superintended by Cardinal Ximenes, whom it cost about 50,000 ducats, though only six hundred copies were printed. It contains the first printed, though not the first published, edition of the Greek New Testament.

3. The Royal Polyglott, printed at Antwerp, 1569-72, in 8 vols. fol. It was published at the expense of Philip II. of Spain, and edited by Arius Montanus. In addition to the texts in the Complutensian, this edition exhibits part of the Targum, and the Syriac version of the New Testament, with literal Latin translations.

4. The Parisian Polyglott, published by Le Jay, 1628-45, in 10 vols. large folio, adds to the former the Samaritan Pentateuch version, the Syriac version of the Old Testament, and an Arabic translation both of the Old and New. It also gives a Latin version of each of the Oriental texts.

5. The London Polyglott, published 1657, in 6 vols. folio, contains, besides the texts of all the former Polyglotts, the Psalms, Song of Solomon, and the New Testament in Ethiopic, and the Gospels in Persic. It also contains the Chaldee Paraphrase in a more complete state than any of the preceding works. It was edited by Brian Walton, afterwards bishop of Chester, and generally has accompanying it the invaluable Heptaglott Lexicon by Castell, a work which is indispensable to those who would consult the Oriental texts to advantage, since the Latin translations in the Polyglott itself are not to be depended on. To the first volume are prefixed important prolegomena; and the last is entirely occupied with various readings, and other critical matters.

6. Reinsecii Polyglott, Leipsic, 1750, in 3 vols. folio, contains the Old Testament in Hebrew, Greek, Seb. Schmidt's Latin translation, and Luther's German; and the New Testament in ancient and modern Greek, the Syriac, the same Latin and German versions. It is very accurately printed, cheap, and convenient.

7. Bagster's Polyglotts.—For elegance, accuracy, and convenience, the productions of Mr. Bagster's press far surpass all preceding editions of Polyglott Bibles. They are so printed that any selection of texts may be had at the option of the purchaser. There are, however, two principal works of this description: the Quarto Polyglott, 1821, containing the Hebrew, Greek, Latin, and English texts of the Old Testament; and the Greek, Syriac, Latin, and English of the New; and the Folio Polyglott, in 1831, one of the most splendid volumes ever published, containing the Bible in the Hebrew, Greek, Syriac, Latin, English, French, German, and Italian languages.

BIBLICAL CRITICISM is the science by which we arrive at a satisfactory acquaintance with the origin, history, and present state of the original text of Scripture. In the wide extent of its investigation, it embraces the languages in which the Scriptures were originally written, together with the cognate or kindred dialects; the materials used for writing; the composition, collection, and preservation of the different books; the age, character, and relationships of MSS.; the ancient versions; the various readings; the printed editions; and the various philological and historical means to be employed in order to determine what the text was as it proceeded from the original penmen. It has been divided into two kinds: lower criticism, which is more of a verbal and historical nature, and is confined to the words, or the collocation of the words, as they stand in the manuscript or printed texts, the ancient versions, and other legitimate sources of appeal; and higher criticism, which consists in the exercise of the judgment in reference to the text, on grounds taken from the nature, form, method, subject, or arguments of the different books; the nature and connexion of the context; the relation of passages to each other; the known circumstances of the writers, and those of the persons for whose immediate use they wrote. Of the two, the former is obviously the more important, as it presents a firm basis on which to rest our investigations: the latter, lying more open to conjecture and variety of opinion, may easily be abused, and has indeed been carried to a most unwarrantable length by many German critics.

The science of biblical criticism should be assiduously cultivated by all who venture to interpret the Bible; for in attempting to expound a work of such high antiquity, which has passed through a variety of copies, both ancient and modern, written and printed, copies which differ from each other in very numerous instances, they should have some reason to believe that the copy or edition which they undertake to interpret, approaches as nearly to the original, as it can be brought by human industry or human judgment. Or, to speak in the technical language of criticism, before they expound the Bible, they should procure the most correct text of the Bible. This principle, which is justly deemed important in reference to mere human productions, must necessarily commend itself as of paramount and indispensable importance in its application to the Scriptures. Without attending to it, we never can be satisfied that what we interpret really is what it professes to be—the word of God.

The object of this science is not to expose the word of the Lord to the uncertainties of human conjecture; (a charge which has sometimes been brought against it;) for there is no principle which it more firmly resists than conjectural emendation, or emendation not founded on, documentary evidence. Its object is not to weaken, much less to destroy the edifice, which "for ages has been the subject of just veneration," but to show the firmness of the foundation on which the sacred edifice is built, and prove the genuineness of the materials of which it is constructed. See Marsh's Lectures, pp. 24, 26.

BIBLICAL INTERPRETATION, the science of teaching or expounding the meaning of the Bible. Strictly speaking, it is either grammatical, when the meaning of words, phrases, and sentences is made out from the usus loquendi, and the context; or historical, when the meaning is illustrated and confirmed by historical arguments, which serve to evince that no other sense can be put upon the passage, whether regard be had to the nature of the subject, or the genius and manner of the writer. It presupposes a knowledge of biblical criticism, and an acquaintance with ancient geography, chronology, the civil, religious, and political history, the manners, customs, &c., of the Jews and of the surrounding nations, and especially with the doctrinal and preceptive contents of the Bible itself as a whole, and of its different parts in particular. As the same method, and the same principles of interpretation are common both to the sacred volume, and to the productions of uninspired men, it follows, that the signification of words in the Holy Scriptures must be sought precisely in the same way in which the meaning of words in other works usually is, or ought to be sought. Hence it also follows, that the method of investigating the signification of words in the Bible is no more arbitrary than it is in other books, but is in like manner regulated by certain laws, drawn from the nature of languages. And since no text of Scripture has more than one meaning, we must endeavour to find out that one true sense precisely in the same manner as we would investigate the sense of Homer, or any other ancient writer; and in that sense, when so ascertained, we ought to acquiesce, unless, by applying the just rules of interpretation, it can be shown that the meaning of the passage has been mistaken, and that another is the only just, true, and critical sense of the place. In order to assist in determining what is this one meaning, the following rules have been laid down: 1. Ascertain the usus loquendi, or the notion affixed to a word by the persons in general by whom the language either is now or formerly was spoken, and especially in the particular connexion in which such notion is affixed. 2. Retain the received signification of a word, unless weighty and necessary reasons require that it should be abandoned. 3. Where a word has several significations in common use, that must be selected which best suits the passage in question, and which is consistent with an author's known character, sentiments, and situation, and the known circumstances under which he wrote. 4. Although the force of particular words can only be derived from etymology, yet too much confidence must not be placed in that frequently uncertain science. 5. The distinctions between words which are apparently synonymous, should be carefully examined and considered. 6. The epithets introduced by the sacred writers are also to be carefully weighed and considered, as all of these have either a declarative or explanatory force, or serve to distinguish one thing from another, or unite these two characters together. 7. General terms are used sometimes in their whole extent, and sometimes in a restricted sense; and whether they are to be understood in the one way or in the other, must depend on the scope, subject-matter, context, and parallel passages. 8. The most simple and obvious sense is always the true one. 9. Since it is the design of interpretation to render in our own language the same discourse which the sacred authors originally wrote in Hebrew or Greek, it is evident that an interpretation, or version, to be correct, ought not to affirm or deny more than the inspired penmen affirmed or denied at the time they wrote; consequently we must always take a sense from Scripture, and not bring one to it. 10. No interpretation can be just, which brings out of any passage a sense that is repugnant to the ascertained nature of things.

The subsidiary means for ascertaining the sense of Scripture, are the usus loquendi, context, scope, subject-matter, philological and doctrinal parallelisms and analogies, historical circumstances, quotations and exegetical commentators.—Stuart's Ernesti; Horne's Introd. to the Scriptures

BIBLIOMANCY, divination performed by means of the Bible; also called sortes biblicæ, or sortes sanctorum. It consisted in taking passages of Scripture at hazard, and thence drawing indications respecting future events. It was much used at the consecration of bishops, and was a practice adopted from the heathens, who drew the same kind of prognostications from the works of Homer and Virgil. In 465, the council of Vannes condemned all who practised it to be cast out of the church, as did also those of Agde and Auxerre; but in the twelfth century it was employed as a mode of detecting heretics. In the Gallican church, it was long practised at the election of bishops; children being employed on behalf of each candidate, to draw slips of paper with texts on them, and that which was thought most favourable decided the choice. A similar mode was pursued at the installation of abbots, and the reception of canons; and this custom is said to have continued in the cathedrals of Ypres, St. Omer, and Boulogne, as late as the year 1744. In the Greek church we read of the prevalence of this custom as early as the consecration of Athanasius, on whose behalf the presiding prelate, Caracalla, archbishop of Nicomedia, opened the gospels at the words, "For the devil and his angels," Matt. xxv. 41; but the bishop of Nice, having observed them, adroitly turned over the leaf to another verse, which was instantly read aloud: "The birds of the air came and lodged in the branches thereof," xiii. 32. But this passage appearing irrelevant to the ceremony, the first became gradually known, and caused great disturbance in the church of Constantinople.

Some well-meaning people among Protestants practise a kind of bibliomancy in order to determine the state of their souls, or the path of duty; but it is an awful profanation of the sacred volume, and a tempting of the Almighty. It has generally been found, that those who have employed it have been awfully misguided, if not driven to absolute despair. The word of God was never meant to operate as a charm, nor to be employed as a lot-book. No portion of it, however small, is to be detached from its connexion. It can only truly guide and edify, when rightly and consistently understood.

BIDDELIANS, so called from John Biddle, A. M., of the University of Cambridge, and one of the first persons who publicly propagated Socinianism in England. He taught that Jesus Christ, to the intent that he might be our brother, and have a fellow-feeling of our infirmities, and so become the more ready to help us, hath no other than a human nature; and therefore in this very nature is not only a person, since none but a human person can be our brother, but also our Lord and God.

Biddle, as well as Socinus and others of similar sentiments before and since, made no scruple of calling Christ God, though he believed him to be a human creature only, on account of the divine sovereignty with which he was invested. Toulmin calls him the father of the modern Unitarians. He was the author of various small works in defence of his sentiments, which are now scarce. His "Scripture Catechism" met with an able refutation from the pen of Dr. Owen. See his Works, vol. viii.

BIDDING PRAYER. It was part of the office of the deacons in the ancient church, to be monitors and directors of the people in their public devotions in the church. To this end they made use of certain known forms of words, to give notice when each part of the service began. Agreeably to this ancient practice is the form, "Let us pray," repeated before several of the prayers in the English liturgy. Bishop Burnet, in his "History of the Reformation," vol. ii. p. 20, has preserved the form as it was in use before the Reformation, which was this: after the preacher had named and opened his text, he called on the people to go to their prayers, telling them what they were to pray for: "Ye shall pray," says he, "for the king, the pope, &c. After which, all the people said their beads in a general silence, and the minister kneeled down likewise and said his: they were to say a paternoster, ave maria, &c., and then the sermon proceeded.

BIGOT, a person blindly, obstinately, and perversely wedded to some opinion or practice, particularly of a religious nature. Camden, perhaps, has hit upon the true original of the word. He relates, that when Rollo, duke of Normandy, received Giala, the daughter of Charles the Foolish, in marriage, together with the investiture of that dukedom, he would not submit to kiss Charles's foot; and when his friends urged him by all means to comply with that ceremony, he made answer in the English tongue, "Ne se, by God," i. e. Not so, by God. Upon which the king and his courtiers deriding him, and corruptly repeating his answer, called him bigot; from whence the Normans were called bigodi, or bigots.

There is a vast difference between a bigot and a man zealous for the interests of true religion. The object of the first is the form; of the second, the power of godliness.

BIGOTRY consists in being obstinately and perversely attached to our own opinions; or, as some have defined it, "a tenacious adherence to a system adopted without investigation, and defended without argument, accompanied with a malignant intolerant spirit towards all who differ." It must be distinguished from love to truth, which influences a man to embrace it, wherever he finds it; and from true zeal, which is an ardour of mind exciting its possessor to defend and propagate the principles he maintains. Bigotry is a kind of prejudice combined with a certain degree of malignity. It is thus exemplified and distinguished by a sensible writer: "When Jesus preached, Prejudice cried, Can any good thing come out of Nazareth? Crucify him, crucify him, said Bigotry. Why, what evil hath he done? replied Candour." Bigotry is mostly prevalent with those who are ignorant; who have taken up principles without due examination; and who are naturally of a morose and contracted disposition. It is often manifested more in unimportant sentiments, or the circumstantialities of religion, than the essentials of it. Simple bigotry is the spirit of persecution without the power; persecution is bigotry armed with power, and carrying its will into act. As it is the effect of ignorance, so it is the nurse of it, because it precludes free inquiry, and is an enemy to truth: it cuts also the very sinews of charity, and destroys moderation and mutual good will. If we consider the different makes of men's minds, our own ignorance, the liberty that all men have to think for themselves, the admirable example our Lord has set us of a contrary spirit, and the baneful effects of this disposition, we must at once be convinced of its impropriety. How contradictory is it to sound reason, and how inimical to the peaceful religion we profess to maintain as Christians! See PERSECUTION, and books under that article.

BILL, LORD SUDMOUTH'S, an act brought into parliament by that nobleman, in the year 1810, with a view to impose new restrictions upon persons who wished to qualify as dissenting teachers, and others, either by separate license, or by some other method, thought to be appropriate, on itinerant preaching. He also proposed to deprive lay-preachers of certain exemptions which had hitherto been granted. Against these measures petitions were sent to parliament from all parts of the kingdom; and the bill, being opposed by Lords Grey, Holland, Erskine, Liverpool, Moira, Stanhope, by Dr. Manners Sutton, then archbishop of Canterbury, and by Lord Chancellor Eldon, was lost, May 21st, 1811, on the motion of Lord Erskine, which was agreed to without a division.

BISHOP, Gr. Ἐπίσκοπος, Episcopus, an over-seer, superintendent or inspector. The English word comes immediately from the Saxon, biſhop, which is only a derivative from the Greek.

1. In the New Testament, those who were the superintendents and teachers of Christian churches, are called, on this ground, episcopoi. That they were the same with the presbyters (πρεσβυτεροι) is now generally allowed by learned interpreters of the New Testament, to whatever communion they may belong, and is, indeed, placed beyond dispute, by comparing Acts xx. 17, with verse 28; and 1 Peter v. 1—4, and 1 Tim. iii. 1—7, with Titus i. 5—9.

2. In church history, a prelate, consecrated for the spiritual government of a diocese, having under him a diversity of inferior clergy, who, with the stations and parishes assigned to them, are subject to his jurisdiction. At what particular period the term came to be alienated from its original use cannot exactly be determined; but it appears to have taken place gradually, and to have arisen from the simple circumstance, that when there happened to be several presbyters in the same church, one, from age or peculiar aptitude for government, was selected to preside at their meetings. Whatever obscurity or uncertainty, however, may rest on the point which relates to the time when the distinction between bishop and presbyter was introduced, it is incontrovertible that, on its being introduced, and, indeed, during the third century, the jurisdiction of the bishop never extended beyond one ἐκκλησία, or congregation. Nothing in the whole history of the period is more obvious than the position, that every church or congregation had its bishop, and every bishop but one church. The bishop's charge is, in the primitive writers, invariably denominated a church, in the singular number—never churches or congregations, in the plural.

When, however, the system of ecclesiastical rule had gradually been matured, the almost absolute authority which the bishops exercised over the clergy of their diocese; their interference in the secular affairs of governments, to which they soon rendered themselves necessary, by their superior information, and their elevated rank; the administration of church revenues; the maintenance of their ecclesiastical prerogatives, and their extensive ecclesiastical as well as criminal jurisdiction, occupied them too much to leave them any time or inclination for the discharge of the duties of teachers and spiritual fathers. They, therefore, reserved to themselves only what were considered the most important parts of their spiritual office, such as the ordination of the clergy, the confirmation of youth, and the preparation of the holy oil. In the middle ages they attached themselves to particular vicars, called suffragans, bishops in partibus, or coadjutors for the performance even of those functions which they had reserved for themselves, and for the inspection of all that concerned the church. Bishops, who have themselves preached, have been rare since the seventh century.

The episcopal office being of such a description, the nobility and even the sons of princes and kings strove to obtain a dignity which was as honourable as it was profitable; and which, moreover, allowed of festivals and sensual enjoyments of every kind. These applications, which were supported by rich donations to the churches, and, in the case of the German bishops, by the influence of the emperor, gave to the bishops of Germany, particularly, a high degree of dignity. They even became princes of the empire, and the influence which they exerted over all public affairs was important. The Reformation, however, lessened their number; and though in some of the Protestant countries in the north of Europe, the higher clergy have retained the title of bishop, yet they have lost the greater part of their former revenues and privileges. The Swedish bishops constitute one of the estates of the kingdom, like the English, but have little power. The English church has left to its bishops more authority than the rest, and for this reason has received the name of episcopal. In Protestant Germany, bishoprics were abolished by the Reformation, but they have been restored in Prussia within the last ten years. The Church of Rome early lost many bishoprics by the conquests of the Mohammedans; hence the great number of titular bishops, whose bishoprics lie in partibus infidelium, i. e. in countries in the possession of infidels. The Roman see, however, only honours with this title ecclesiastics of a high rank.

In consequence of the cession of several German countries to France, twenty-three bishoprics were abolished; but, by particular agreements or concordates with the Roman court, they have been re-established in several of the German states.

In the church of Rome, the pope has the chief right of electing bishops; and even where sovereign princes have reserved to themselves a right of nominating to bishoprics, the pope sends his approbation and bulls to the new bishop.

When a person hears that the pope has raised him to the episcopal dignity, he enlarges his shaven crown, and dresses himself in purple. Three months after his election, he is consecrated in a solemn manner. The altar is adorned with flowers, and a carpet spread on the ground before it. The pontifical ornaments are laid on the altar, and the chrism, the vessel of holy-water, the chalice, the pyx, the pontifical ring, the sandals, the pastoral staff, the mitre, gloves, &c., on the credences. There are likewise two little barrels, filled with the best wine; two loaves, one of them gilt with gold, the other with silver, with the arms of the officiating prelate and the bishop engraven on them; and two tapers, each weighing four pounds. The officiating bishop sits on the episcopal seat, placed about the middle of the altar, and the bishop elect stands between the two assistant bishops. Then one of the assistants addresses himself to the officiating prelate, saying to him that the Catholic church requires such an one (naming him) to be raised to the dignity of a bishop. Then the officiating prelate demands of him the apostolical mandate; which being read by the notary, the officiating prelate answers at the close of it, "God be praised." This first ceremony concludes with the oath of the candidate, which he takes on his knees; by which he obliges himself to be faithful to the see of Rome, and the Catholic church, &c. We are told in one of the rubrics of the pontifical, that all patriarchs, primates, archbishops, and bishops of Italy, are obliged to renew this oath every three years; those of France, Germany, Spain, Flanders, the British islands, Poland, &c. every four years; those of the extremities of Europe and Africa, every five years; and, lastly, those of Asia and America, every ten years.

After the oath, the candidate, on his knees, kisses the hand of the officiating prelate. He next receives the pontifical ornaments, and, being full habited, reads the office of the mass at the altar, the two assistant bishops standing on each side of him. This done, he bows to the officiating prelate, who repeats the following words to him, which include the episcopal functions:—"The duty of a bishop is to judge, interpret, consecrate, confer orders, sacrifice, baptize, confirm." After which words, the candidate bishop prostrates himself, and continues some time in that posture, dur-ring which the officiating prelate with his pastoral staff, signs him with the sign of the cross. This done, the officiating prelate and the two assistants lay their hands on his head; and the former, laying the book of the Gospels on his shoulders, says, "Receive the Holy Ghost." Then a napkin is put on the neck of the bishop elect, and the officiating prelate anoints his head with the chrism, as also the palms of his hands: next he blesses the pastoral staff, sprinkling it with holy water, and presents it to the new bishop. The book of the gospels, shut, is put into his hands, with this exhortation: "Receive the Gospel, go, and preach it to the people committed to your charge." After this exhortation the officiating prelate and the assisting bishops give him the kiss of peace. These ceremonies end with the mystical offerings of the new prelate, which are two lighted torches, two loaves, and two small casks of wine.

Then all present receive the communion; after which the officiating prelate blesses the mitre, sprinkling it with holy water, and puts on the head of the new bishop this helmet of defence and salvation, the strings whereof, like to the two horns of the two Testaments, are to make him appear formidable to the enemies of the truth. The gloves are next given him; and they represent the purity of the new man, which must enclose the hands of the new prelate, and render him like Jacob, who, having his hands covered with goat-skin, artfully procured his father's blessing. Lastly, he is enthroned, or placed in the pontifical seat, on which the officiating prelate was before seated. After this the assistants lead him up and down the church, where he blesses the people. The whole ceremony concludes with an anthem.

There are some bishops in the church of Rome, who have no diocese under their care, and are merely titular bishops: these are generally creatures of the court of Rome.

The earliest account we have of British bishops is carried up no higher than the council of Arles, assembled by the Emperor Constantine, in the fourth century, at which were present the Bishops of London, York, and Caerleon.

Before the Norman Conquest, bishops were chosen by the chapters, whether monks or prebendaries. From the Conqueror's time, to the reign of King John, it was the custom to choose bishops at a public meeting of the bishops and barons, the king himself being present at the solemnity, who claimed a right of investing the bishops, by delivering to them the ring and pastoral staff. It is true, the popes endeavoured to gain the election of bishops to themselves; and this occasioned great struggles and contests between the Roman pontiffs and our kings. At length, after various disputes between King John and the pope, the former by his charter, A.D.

1215, granted the right of election to the cathedral churches. A statute, in the reign of Henry VIII., settles the election of bishops as follows:—"The king, upon the vacancy of the see, was to send his congé d'eslire to the dean and chapter, or prior and convent, and, in case they delayed the election above twelve days, the crown was empowered to nominate the person by letters patent. And, after the bishop thus elected had taken an oath of fealty to the king, his majesty, by his letters patent under the broad seal, signified the election to the archbishop, with orders to confirm it, and consecrate the elect. And, lastly, if the persons assigned to elect and consecrate deferred the performing their respective offices twenty days, they were to incur a pœmnurie." But a statute of Edward VI. made a change in the manner of electing bishops, and transferred the choice wholly from the deans and chapters to the crown. The preamble, in the first place, alleges the inconveniences of the former manner of electing, from the circumstances of delay and expense; after which it is said in the preamble,—"That the said elections are in very deed no elections, but only by a writ of congé d'eslire have colours, shadows, and pretences of election; that they serve to no purpose, and seem derogatory and prejudicial to the king's prerogative royal, to whom only appertains the collation and gift of all archbishoprics and bishoprics, and suffragan bishoprics, within his highness's dominions." This statute, therefore, enacts, that—"for the future, no congé d'eslire shall be granted, nor any election be made by the dean and chapter, but that the archbishopric or bishopric shall be conferred by the king's nomination in his letters patent." But this alteration made by the statute of King Edward is no longer in force; and the custom of sending down the congé d'eslire is restored.

Upon the vacancy of a bishop's see, the king grants a licence, or congé d'eslire, under the great seal, to the dean and chapter, to elect the person whom by his letters missive he hath appointed; and they are to choose no other. The dean and chapter, having made their election accordingly, certify it under their common seal to the king, and to the archbishop of the province, and to the bishop thus elected: then the king gives his royal assent, under the great seal, directed to the archbishop, commanding him to confirm and consecrate the bishop thus elected. The archbishop then subscribes his fiat confirmatio, and grants a commission to the vicar-general to perform all the acts requisite thereto; who, thereupon, issues out a summons to all persons who may object to the election, to appear, &c.: which citation is affixed on the door of Bow Church. At the time and place appointed, the proctor, for the dean and chapter, exhibits the royal assent, and the commission of the archbishop, which are both read, and accepted by the vicar-general. Then the new bishop is presented by the proctor to the vicar-general; and three proclamations being made for the opposers of the election to appear, and none appearing, the vicar-general confirms and ratifies the choice of the person elected, who takes the oaths of supremacy, canonical obedience, and that against simony.

Till this act of confirmation is performed, the bishop elect may be rejected, because there may be reasons assigned why he should not be made a bishop; which is the reason of the above-mentioned citations and proclamations.

After confirmation, the next thing to be done is consecration; which the archbishop performs by the imposition of hands and prayer, according to the form laid down in the Common Prayer Book. Which done, the bishop is complete as well in relation to spiritualities as temporalities. Justice Doderidge, in his argument of Evans and Ascue's case, says, there is a spiritual marriage between the bishop and his church, which is begun by election, contracted by confirmation, and consummated by consecration.

A bishop of England is a peer of the realm, and, as such, sits and votes in the House of Lords. He is a baron in a three-fold manner, viz.—feudal, in regard of the temporalities annexed to his bishopric; by writ, as being summoned by writ to Parliament; and by patent and creation. Accordingly, he has the precedence of all other barons, and votes both as baron and bishop. But though their peerage never was denied, it has been contested, whether the bishops have a right to vote in criminal matters. This right was disputed as early as the reign of Henry II., and we find this decision of the controversy:—"Archiepiscopi, Episcopi, &c. sicut ceteri barones," &c. i. e. archbishops, bishops, &c., in like manner as the rest of the barons, ought to be present at the judgments in the king's courts, until it come to diminution of members, or to death. The reason which the canonists give, why bishops should not be present in cases of blood, is, because they contract an irregularity thereby, ex defectu lenitatis. Yet Archbishop Cranmer, being one of the Privy Council to Edward VI., signed the warrant for the execution of Thomas Seymour, Lord High Admiral of England; and the Archbishop of Canterbury was the first in commission at the trial of Mary Queen of Scots: and, in the Earl of Strafford's case, in the reign of Charles I., when Williams, Archbishop of York, declared his opinion, that the bishops ought not to be present at the passing of the act of attainder, it was looked upon as betraying a fundamental right of the whole order. At present, the bishops have their vote in the trial and arraignment of a peer; but, before sentence of death is passed, they withdraw, and vote by their proxy.

The jurisdiction of a bishop, in England, consists in collating to benefices; granting institutions on the presentation of other patrons; commanding induction; taking care of the profits of vacant benefices for the use of the successors; visiting his diocese once in three years; in suspending, depriving, degrading, and excommunicating; in granting administrations, and taking care of the probate of wills: these parts of his function depend on the ecclesiastical law. By the common law, he is to certify the judges touching legitimate and illegitimate births, and marriages. And to his jurisdiction, by the statute law, belongs the licensing of physicians, churgeons, and school-masters, and the uniting small parishes; which last privilege is now peculiar to the bishop of Norwich.

The bishops' courts have this privilege above the civil courts, that writs are issued out from them in the name of the bishop himself, and not in the king's name, as in other courts. The judge of the bishop's court is his chancellor, anciently called Ecclesia Causidicus, the Church-lawyer.

The bishops of Scotland anciently exercised their episcopal functions wherever they were, there being no distinct dioceses in that kingdom till the reign of Malcolm III. about the year 1070. Whilst episcopacy prevailed in that kingdom, the form of church government stood thus. In every parish, the cognizance of some offences belonged to the session, a judicature where the minister presided ex officio. But if the case proved too intricate, it was referred to the Presbytery, a superior judicature, consisting of a certain number of ministers, between twelve and twenty. The moderator of this assembly was named by the Bishop. Above all, was the convocation, in which the archbishop of St. Andrew's presided. And, besides these, every bishop, for the causes of testaments, &c. had his official or commissary, who was judge of that court within the diocese. The bishops of that kingdom were likewise lords of parliament.

In the reign of Henry II., A.D. 1177, the Scotch bishops and abbots obliged themselves by oath to own the archbishop of York for their metropolitan, and consented that their successors should repair to York for consecration. But in the reign of Edward IV., A.D. 1471, the Pope made the Church of Scotland independent of the see of York, induced to it by a complaint of Bishop Graham, that, when England and Scotland were upon terms of hostility, the Scotch bishops had no opportunity of having recourse to their metropolitan, and bringing appeals to him.

The ecclesiastical government of Ireland hath been from ancient times by bishops, consecrated either by the archbishop of Canterbury, or by one another. But in the year 1152, (as we find in Philip of Flattebury,) "Christianus, bishop of Lismore, legat of all Ireland, held a famous council at Meath, where were present the bishops, abbots, kings, dukes, and magistrates of Ireland; and there, by authority of the Pope, with advice of the cardinals, and consent of the bishops, abbots, and others there met together, four archbishoprics were established in Ireland—Armagh, Dublin, Cassil, and Tuam."

The bishop of the Isle of Man is a baron of the Isle. He has this peculiar privilege, that if any of his tenants be guilty of a capital crime, and is to be tried for his life, the bishop's steward may demand him from the lord's bar, and try him in the bishop's court, by a jury of his own tenants; and in case of conviction, his lands are forfeited to the bishop. When the bishopric is vacant, the lord of the Isle nominates a person, and presents him to the King of England for his royal assent, and then to the archbishop of York to be consecrated. After which, he becomes subject to him as his metropolitan.

The Jews in England, under the first Norman kings, had over them an officer, licensed by the crown, under the name of episcopus Judeorum, (bishop of the Jews,) to whom they submitted to be judged and governed according to their law. BLASPHEMY, from Βλασφημία, according to Dr. Campbell, properly denotes calumny, detraction, reproachful or abusive language, against whomsoever it be vented. It is in Scripture applied to reproaches not aimed against God only, but man also. Rom. iii. 8; xiv. 16; 1 Pet. iv. 4. Gr. It is, however, more peculiarly restrained to evil or reproachful words offered to God. According to Lindwood, blasphemy is an injury offered to God, by denying that which is due and belonging to him, or attributing to him what is not agreeable to his nature. "Three things," says a divine, "are essential to this crime: 1. God must be the object. 2. The words spoken or written, independently of consequences which others may derive from them, must be injurious in their nature. And, 3. He who commits the crime must do it knowingly. This is real blasphemy; but there is a relative blasphemy, as when a man may be guilty ignorantly, by propagating opinions which dishonour God, the tendency of which he does not perceive. A man may be guilty of this constructively: for if he speak freely against received errors, it will be construed into blasphemy." By the English laws, blasphemies of God, as denying his being or providence, and all contumelious reproaches of Jesus Christ, &c., are offences by the common law, and punishable by fine, imprisonment, and pillory; and by the statute of 9 and 10 William III. ch. 32, if any one shall deny either of the Persons of the Trinity to be God, or assert that there are more than one God, or deny Christianity to be true, for the first offence, is rendered incapable of any office; for the second, adjudged incapable of suing, being executor or guardian, receiving any gift or legacy, and to be imprisoned for years. According to the law of Scotland, blasphemy is punished with death: these laws, however, in the present age, are not enforced; and by the statute of 53 George III. ch. 160, the words in italics were omitted, the legislature thinking, perhaps, that spiritual offences should be left to be punished by the Deity, and not by human statutes. *Campbell's Prel. BLOOD, EATING OF, is differently viewed among Christians; some maintaining that its prohibition, in the Scriptures, is to be regarded as merely ceremonial and temporary; while others contend that it is unlawful under any circumstances, and that Christians are as much bound to abstain from it now, as were the Jews under the Mosaic economy. This they found on the facts, that when animal food was originally granted to man, there was an express reservation in the article of the blood; that this grant was made to the new parents of the whole human family after the flood, consequently the tenure by which any of mankind are permitted to eat animals, is in every case accompanied with this restriction; that there never was any reversal of the prohibition; that most express injunctions were given on the point in the Jewish code; and that in the New Testament, instead of there being the least hint intimating that we are freed from the obligation, it is deserving of particular notice, that at the very time when the Holy Spirit declares by the Apostles (Acts xv.) that the Gentiles are free from the yoke of circumcision, abstinence from blood is explicitly enjoined, and the action thus prohibited is classed with idolatry and fornication. It was one of the grounds alleged by the early apologists against the calumnies of the enemies of Christianity, that so far were they from drinking human blood, it was unlawful for them to drink the blood even of irrational animals. Numerous testimonies to the same effect are found in after ages. See under FOOD.

BOARDS, SACRED. Small pieces of board struck together, for the purpose of assembling the people to worship, before the invention of bells. To the present day, the Catholics use such boards in Passion-week and Lent, because the noise of bells they consider to be unsuitable to the solemnity of the season. On the first day of Easter, the bells ring again, to excite to cheerfulness and joy.

BODY OF DIVINITY. See THEOLOGY.

BOGOMIL, OR BOGARMITE, a sect which arose about the year 1179. They held that the use of churches, of the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, and all prayers except the Lord's Prayer, ought to be abolished; that the baptism of Catholics is imperfect; that the persons of the Trinity are unequal, and that they often made themselves visible to those of their sect.

BOHEMIAN BRETHREN. The name of a Christian sect, which arose in Bohemia, about the middle of the fifteenth century, from the remains of the Hussites. Dissatisfied with the advances made towards popery, by which the Calixtines had made themselves the ruling party in Bohemia, they refused to receive the compacts, or articles of agreement, between that party and the Council of Basle, November 30, 1433; and began about 1457, under the direction of a clergyman of the name of Michael Bradatz, to form themselves into separate parishes, to hold meetings of their own, and to distinguish themselves from the rest of the Hussites by the name of Brothers, or Brothers' Union; but they were often confounded by their opponents with the Waldenses and Picards, and, on account of their seclusion, were called Cavern-hunters. Amidst the hardships and sufferings which they suffered from the Calixtines and the Catholics, without offering any resistance, their numbers increased so much, through their constancy in belief, and the purity of their morals, that in the year 1500, their parishes amounted to two hundred, most of which had chapels belonging to them. The peculiarities of their religious belief are exhibited in their confessions of faith, especially their opinions in regard to the Lord's Supper. They rejected the idea of transubstantiation, and admitted only a mystical spiritual presence of Christ in the eucharist. On all points they professed to take the Scriptures as the ground of their doctrines, and for this, but more especially for the constitution and discipline of their churches, they received the approbation of the Reformers of the 16th century. This constitution they endeavoured to model according to the accounts which they could collect respecting the primitive churches. They aimed at the restoration of the primitive purity of Christianity, by the exclusion of the vicious from their communion; by the careful separation of the sexes; and by the distribution of their members into three classes—the beginners, the proficient, and the perfect. Their strict system of superintendence, extending even to the minute details of domestic life, contributed much towards promoting this object. To carry on their system, they had a multitude of officers, of different degrees, as bishops, seniors and consensors, presbyters or preachers, deacons, scilites, and acolytes, among whom the management of the ecclesiastical, moral, and civil affairs of the community was judiciously distributed. Their first bishop received his ordination from a Waldensian bishop, though their churches held no communion with the Waldenses in Bohemia. They were destined, however, to experience a like fate with that oppressed sect. When, in conformity to their principle not to perform military service, they refused to take up arms in the Smalcaldic war against the Protestants, Ferdinand took their churches from them; and in 1548, one thousand of their society retired into Poland and Prussia, where they at first settled at Marienwerder. The agreement which they entered into at Sentomir, April 14th, 1570, with the Polish Lutherans and Calvinistic churches, and, still more, the Dissenters' Peace Act of the Polish Convention, 1572, obtained toleration for them in Poland, where they united more closely with the Calvinists under the persecutions of the Swedish Sigmund, and have continued in this connexion to the present day. Their brethren who remained in Moravia and Bohemia recovered a certain degree of liberty under Maximilian II., and had their chief residence at Fulneck, in Moravia, and hence have been called Moravian Brethren. The issue of the Thirty Years' War, which terminated so unfortunately for the Protestants, occasioned the entire destruction of their churches, and their last bishop, Comenius, who had rendered important services in the education of youth, was obliged to flee. From this time they made frequent emigrations, the most important of which took place in 1712, and occasioned the establishment of the New Brethren's Church by Count Zinzendorf.

Though the Old Bohemian Brethren must be regarded as now extinct, this society deserves ever to be had in remembrance, as one of the principal guardians of Christian truth and piety, in times just emerging from the barbarism of the dark ages; as a promoter of a purity of discipline and morals, which the Reformers of the sixteenth century failed to establish in their churches; and as the parent of the widely-extended association of the United Brethren, whose constitution has been modelled after theirs.

BOLLANISTS, a society of Jesuits in Antwerp, which published, under the title of Acta Sanctorum, the traditions and legends of the Saints. They received this name from John Bolland, who first undertook to digest the materials already accumulated by Heribert Roswey.

BONZES, priests of the religions of Fo, in Eastern Asia, particularly in China, Birmah, Tonkin, Cochinchina, and Japan. Living together in monasteries, unmarried, they greatly resemble the monks of corrupt Christian churches; the system of their hierarchy also agrees, in many respects, with that of the Catholics. They do penance, and pray for the sins of the laity, who secure them from want by endowments and alms. The female Bonzes may be compared to the Christian nuns, as the religion of Fo admits of no priestesses, but allows of the social union of pious virgins and widows, under monastic vows, for the performance of religious exercises. The Bonzes are commonly acquainted only with the external forms of worship, and the idols, without understanding the meaning of their religious symbols.

BOOK OF SPORTS. See SPORTS.

BORRELLISTS, a Christian sect in Holland, so named from their founder Borrel, a man of great learning in the Hebrew, Greek, and Latin tongues. They reject the use of the sacraments, public prayer, and all other external acts of worship. They assert that all the Christian churches of the world have degenerated from the pure apostolic doctrines, because they have suffered the word of God, which is infallible, to be expounded, or rather corrupted, by doctors who are fallible. They lead a very austere life, and employ a great part of their goods in alms.

BOUNTY, QUEEN ANNE'S, the profits of the first-fruits and tenths, which were anciently given to the Pope, transferred in the reign of Henry VIII. to the king, and restored to the church by Queen Anne, who caused a perpetual fund to be established from the revenue thus raised, which was vested in trustees for the augmentation of poor livings under 50*l*. a year. This has been further regulated by subsequent statutes; but as the number of livings under 50*l*. was at the commencement of it 5597, averaged at 23*l*. per annum, its operation is very slow.

BOURIGNONISTS, the followers of Antoinette Bourignon, a lady in France, who pretended to particular inspirations. She was born at Lisle, in 1616. At her birth she was so deformed, that it was debated some days in the family whether it was not proper to stifle her as a monster; but, her deformity diminishing, she was spared. From her childhood to her old age she had an extraordinary turn of mind. She set up for a reformer, and published a great number of books filled with very singular notions; the most remarkable of which are entitled, "The Light of the World," and "The Testimony of Truth." In her confession of faith, she professes her belief in the Scriptures, the divinity and atonement of Christ. She believed also that man is perfectly free to resist or receive divine grace; that there is no such thing as foreknowledge or election; that God is ever unchangeable love towards all his creatures, and does not inflict any arbitrary punishment; but that the evils they suffer are the natural consequence of sin; that religion consists not in outward forms of worship nor systems of faith, but in an entire resignation to the will of God, and those inward feelings which arise from immediate communion with God. She held many extravagant notions, among which, it is said, she asserted that Adam, before the fall, possessed the principles of both sexes; that in an ecstasy, God represented Adam to her mind in his original state; as also the beauty of the first world, and how he had drawn it from the chaos; and that every thing was bright, transparent, and darted forth life and ineffable glory; that Christ has a twofold manhood; one formed of Adam before the creation of Eve, and another taken from the Virgin Mary; that his human nature was corrupted with a principle of rebellion against God's will: with a number of other wild ideas. She dressed like a hermit, and travelled through France, Holland, England, and Scotland. She died at Franeker, in the province of Frise, October 30, 1680. Her principal patrons were Christian Bartholomew, a Jansenist priest at Mechlin, and Peter Poinet, who employed a surprising genius and no uncommon sagacity to dress out the reveries of fanaticism. In his "Divine Economy," he reduced the substance of Bourignon's fancies to a regular form. Dr. Garden of Aberdeen attempted to introduce them into Scotland, and wrote an apology in their favour, or at least laboured to spread it. He was condemned and deposed by the General Assembly, in 1701. If we may believe Dr. Kippis, she had more disciples in Scotland than in any other country perhaps in the world.

BOY BISHOP, THE. Anciently, on the 6th of December, it being St. Nicholas's Day, the choir boys in cathedral churches chose one of their number to maintain the state and authority of a bishop, for which purpose the boy was habited in rich episcopal robes, wore a mitre on his head, and bore a crosier in his hand; and his fellows, for the time being, assumed the character and dress of priests, yielded him canonical obedience, took possession of the church, and, except mass, performed all the ecclesiastical ceremonies and offices. Though the boy bishop's election was on the 6th of December, yet his office and authority lasted till the 28th, being Innocents' Day. It appears from a printed church book, containing the service of the boy bishop set to music, that at Sarum, on the eve of Innocents' Day, the boy bishop and his youthful clergy, in their copes, and with burning tapers in their hands, went in solemn procession, chanting and singing versicles as they walked into the choir by the west door, in such order, that the dean and canons went foremost, the chaplains next, and the boy bishop with his priests in the last and highest place. He then took his seat, and the rest of the children disposed themselves on each side of the choir upon the uppermost ascent, the canons resident bore the incense and the book, and the petit-canons the tapers, according to the Romish rubric. Afterwards the boy bishop proceeded to the altar of the Holy Trinity, and All Saints, which he first censed, and next the image of Holy Trinity, while his priests were singing. Then they all chanted a service, with prayers and responses, and the boy bishop taking his seat, repeated salutations, prayers, and versicles, and in conclusion, gave his benediction to the people, the chorus answering "Deo Gratias." Having received his crosier from the cross-bearer, other ceremonies were performed; he chanted the compline; turning towards the choir, delivered an exhortation; and last of all said, "Benedicat vos omnipotens Deus, Pater, et Filius, et Spiritus Sanctus." By the statutes of the church of Sarum, for the regulation of this extraordinary scene, no one was to interrupt or press upon the boy bishop and the other children during their procession or service in the cathedral, upon pain of anathema. It further appears that at this cathedral the boy bishop held a kind of visitation, and maintained a corresponding state and prerogative; and is supposed to have had power to dispose of prebends that fell vacant during his episcopacy. If he died within the month, he was buried like other bishops in his episcopal ornaments, his obsequies were solemnized with great pomp, and a monument was erected to his memory, with his episcopal effigy. About one hundred and fifty years ago, a stone monument to one of these boy bishops was discovered in Salisbury cathedral, under the seats near the pulpit, from whence it was removed to the north part of the nave between the pillars, and covered over with a box of wood, to the great admiration of those who, unacquainted with the anomalous character it designed to commemorate, thought it "almost impossible that a bishop should be so small in person, or a child so great in clothes." Mr. Gregorie found the processional of the boy bishop. He notices the same custom at York; and cites Molanus as saying, "that this bishop in some places did rediat census, et cassones anno accipere,—receive rents, cassons, &c. during his year." He relates that a boy bishop in the church of Cambay disposed of a prebend, which fell void during his episcopal assumption, to his master; and he refers to the denunciation of the boy bishop by the council of Basil, which, at the time of the holding of that council, was a well-known custom. Mr. Gregorie, who was a prebendary of Salisbury, describes the finding of the boy bishop's monument at that place, and inserts a representation of it in his treatise. The ceremony of the boy bishop is supposed to have existed not only in collegiate churches, but in almost every parish in England. He and his companions walked the streets in public procession. A statute of the collegiate church of St. Mary Overy, in 1337, restrained one of them to the limits of his own parish. On December 7, 1229, the day after St. Nicholas's Day, a boy bishop in the chapel at Heton, near Newcastle-upon-Tyne, said vespers before Edward I. on his way to Scotland, who made a considerable present to him and the other boys who sang with him. In the reign of King Edward III. a boy bishop received a present of nineteen shillings and sixpence for singing before the king in his private chamber on Innocents' Day. Dean Colet, in the statutes of St. Paul's school, which he founded in 1512, expressly ordains that his scholars should, every Childermas (Innocents') Day, "come to Paulis church and hear the chylde bishop's sermon: and after be at the hygh masse, and each of them offer a penny to the chylde bishop: and with them the maisters and surveyors of the scole." By a proclamation of Henry VIII. dated July 22nd, 1542, the show of the boy bishop was abrogated; but in the reign of Mary it was revived, with other Romish ceremonials. A flattering song was sung before that queen by a boy bishop, and printed. It was a panegyric on her devotion, and compared her to Judith, Esther, the queen of Sheba, and the Virgin Mary. The accounts of St. Mary at Hill, London, in the 10th Henry VI., and for 1549, and 1550, contain charges for the boy bishops of those years. At that period his estimation in the church seems to have been undiminished; for on November 13, 1554, the bishop of London issued an order to all the clergy of his diocese to have boy bishops and their processions; and, in the same year, these young sons of the old church paraded St. Andrew's, Holborn, and St. Nicholas of Olaves, in Bread-street, and other parishes. In 1556, Strype says, that the boy bishops again went abroad singing in the old fashion, and were received by many ignorant but well-disposed persons into their houses, and had much good cheer.

BOYLE'S LECTURES, a course of eight sermons, preached annually; set on foot by the Honourable R. Boyle, by a codicil annexed to his will, in 1691, whose design, as expressed by the institutor, is to prove the truth of the Christian religion against infidels, without descending to any controversies among Christians, and to answer new difficulties, scruples, &c. For the support of this lecture he assigned the rent of his house in Crooked Lane, to some learned divine within the bills of mortality, to be elected for a term not exceeding three years. But, the fund proving precarious, the salary was ill paid; to remedy which inconvenience, Archbishop Tennison procured a yearly stipend of 50*l.* for ever, to be paid quarterly, charged on a farm in the parish of Brill, in the county of Bucks. To this appointment we are indebted for many excellent defences of natural and revealed religion.

BRANDENBURG, CONFESSION OF. A formula or confession of faith, drawn up in the city of Brandenburg by order of the elector, with a view to reconcile the tenets of Luther with those of Calvin, and to put an end to the disputes occasioned by the Confession of Augsburg. See AUGSBURG CONFESSION.

BRETHREN, THE TWELVE. See MARROW-MEN.

BRETHREN AND SISTERS OF THE FREE SPIRIT, an appellation assumed by a sect which sprung up towards the close of the thirteenth century, and gained many adherents in Italy, France, and Germany. They took their denomination from the words of St. Paul, Rom. viii. 2, 14, and maintained that the true children of God were invested with perfect freedom from the jurisdiction of the law. They held that all things flowed by emanation from God; that rational souls were portions of the Deity; that the universe was God; and that by the power of contemplation they were united to the Deity, and acquired hereby a glorious and sublime liberty, both from the sinful lusts and the common instincts of nature, with a variety of other enthusiastic notions. Many edicts were published against them; but they continued till about the middle of the fifteenth century.

BRETHREN AND CLERKS OF THE COMMON LIFE, a denomination assumed by a religious fraternity towards the end of the fifteenth century. They lived under the rule of St. Augustine, and were said to be eminently useful in promoting the cause of religion and learning.

BRETHREN, PLYMOUTH. See PLYMOUTH BRETHREN.

BRETHREN, WHITE, were the followers of a priest from the Alps, about the beginning of the fifteenth century. They and their leader were arrayed in white garments. Their leader carried about a cross like a standard. His apparent sanctity and devotion drew together a number of followers. This deluded enthusiast practised many acts of mortification and penance, and endeavoured to persuade the Europeans to renew the holy war. Boniface IX. ordered him to be apprehended, and committed to the flames; upon which his followers dispersed.

BREVIARY, a daily office, or book of divine service, in the Romish church. It is composed of matins, lauds; first, third, sixth, and ninth vespers; and the Compline or Post-communio: i. e. of seven different hours, on account of that saying of David: "Seven times a-day will I praise thee;" whence some authors call the breviary by the name of Hora Canonica—Canonical Hours.

The breviary of Rome is general, and may be used in all places: but on the model of this have been built various others, appropriated to each diocese, and each order of religious; the most eminent of which are those of the Benedictines, Bernardines, Carthusians, Carmelites, Dominicans, and Jesuits; that of Cluni, of the church of Lyons, of the church of Milan, and the Mozarabic breviary used in Spain.

The breviary of the Greeks, which they call by the name of Ὁρολόγιον (horologium) Dial, is the same in almost all the churches and monasteries that follow the Greek rites. The Greeks divide the Psalter into twenty parts, called καθίσματα (Sedilia) Seats, because they are a kind of pauses or rests. In general, the Greek breviary consists of two parts; the one containing the office for the evening, called μεσονύκτιον; the other that of the morning, divided into matins, lauds; first, third, sixth, and ninth vespers, and the compline.

The institution of the breviary not being very ancient, there have been inserted in it the Lives of the Saints, full of ridiculous and ill-attested stories, which gave occasion to several reformations of it by several councils, particularly those of Trent and Cologne; by several popes, particularly Pius V., Clement VIII., and Urban VIII.; as also by several cardinals and bishops; each lopping off some extravagances, and bringing it nearer to the simplicity of the primitive offices.

Originally, every person was obliged to recite the breviary every day; but by degrees the obligation was reduced to the clergy only, who are enjoined, under pain of mortal sin, and ecclesiastical censures, to recite it at home when they cannot attend in public.

BRIDGETINE, or BRIGHTINE, an order denominated from St. Bridgit, or Birgit, a Swedish lady, in the fourteenth century. Their rule is nearly that of Augustine. The Brigittins profess great mortification, poverty, and self-denial; and they are not to possess any thing they can call their own—not so much as a halfpenny; nor even to touch money on any account. This order spread much through Sweden, Germany, and the Netherlands. In England we read of but one monastery of Brigittins, and this built by Henry V. in 1415, opposite to Richmond, now called Sion House; the ancient inhabitants of which, since the dissolution, are settled at Lisbon.

BRIEFS, APOSTOLICAL, are letters which the Pope dispatches to princes and other magistrates concerning any public affair.

BROTHERS, LAT, among the Romanists, are illiterate persons, who devote themselves in some convent to the service of the religious.

BROWNISTS, a sect that arose among the Puritans towards the close of the sixteenth century; so named from their leader, Robert Brown. He was educated at Cambridge, and was a man of good parts and some learning. He began to inveigh openly against the ceremonies of the church, at Norwich, in 1580; but, being much opposed by the bishops, he, with his congregation, left England, and settled at Middleburgh, in Zealand, where they obtained leave to worship God in their own way, and form a church according to their own model. They soon, however, began to differ among themselves, so that Brown, growing weary of his office, returned to England in 1589, renounced his principles of separation, and was preferred to the rectory of a church in Northamptonshire. He died in prison in 1630. The revolt of Brown was attended with the dissolution of the church at Middleburgh; but the seeds of Brownism which he had sown in England were so far from being destroyed, that Sir Walter Raleigh, in a speech in 1592, computes no less than 20,000 of this sect.

The articles of their faith seem to be nearly the same as those of the church of England. The occasion of their separation was not therefore any fault they found with the faith, but only with the discipline and form of government of the churches in England. They equally charged corruption on the Episcopal and Presbyterian forms; nor would they join with any other reformed church, because they were not assured of the sanctity and regeneration of the members that composed it. They condemned the solemn celebration of marriages in the church, maintaining that matrimony, being a political contract, the confirmation thereof ought to come from the civil magistrate; an opinion in which they are not singular. They would not allow the children of such as were not members of the church to be baptized. They rejected all forms of prayer, and held that the Lord's Prayer was not to be recited as a prayer, being only given for a rule or model whereon all our prayers are to be formed. Their form of church government was nearly as follows:—When a church was to be gathered, such as desired to be members of it made a confession of their faith in the presence of each other, and signed a covenant, by which they obliged themselves to walk together in the order of the Gospel. The whole power of admitting and excluding members, with the decision of all controversies, was lodged in the brotherhood. Their church officers were chosen from among themselves, and separated to their several offices by fasting, prayer, and imposition of hands. But they did not allow the priesthood to be any distinct order. As the vote of the brethren made a man a minister, so the same power could discharge him from his office, and reduce him to a mere layman again; and as they maintained the bounds of a church to be no greater than what could meet together in one place, and join in one communion, so the power of these officers was prescribed within the same limits. The minister of one church could not administer the Lord's Supper to another, nor baptize the children of any but those of his own society. Any lay-brother was allowed the liberty of giving a word of exhortation to the people; and it was usual for some of them, after sermon, to ask questions, and reason upon the doctrines that had been preached. In a word, every church on their model is a body corporate, having full power to do every thing in itself, without being accountable to any class, synod, convocation, or other jurisdiction whatever. The reader will judge how near the Independent churches are allied to this form of government.—See INDEPENDENTS. The laws were executed with great severity on the Brownists; their books were prohibited by Queen Elizabeth; their persons imprisoned, and some hanged. Brown himself declared on his death-bed that he had been in thirty-two different prisons, in some of which he could not see his hand at noon-day. They were so much persecuted that they resolved at last to quit the country. Accordingly many retired and settled at Amsterdam, where they formed a church, and chose Mr. Johnson their pastor, and after him Mr. Ainsworth, author of the learned Commentary on the Pentateuch. Their church flourished near a hundred years. Among the Brownists, too, were the famous John Robinson, a part of whose congregation from Leyden, in Holland, made the first permanent settlement in North America; and the laborious Canne, the author of the marginal references to the Bible.

BUCHANITES, a sect of enthusiasts who sprang up at Irvine, in the west of Scotland, about the year 1783. Mr. White, the minister of a relief congregation in that town, having been invited to preach in the neighbourhood of Glasgow, a female named Elizabeth Buchan, the wife of a painter, was captivated with his eloquence, and, writing to him, announced that he was the first that had spoken to her heart, and requested permission to pay him a visit at Irvine, that the work of her conversion might be perfected. On her arrival, she was joyfully received by the members of the congregation; engaged without intermission in religious exercises; went from house to house; conducted family worship; answered questions, resolved doubts, explained the Scriptures, and testified that the end of the world was at hand, and that it was the duty of every Christian to abandon the concerns of time, and prepare for the reception of Christ. Mr. White, favouring her and her views, was complained of to the presbytery, by which he was deposed from his ministry. Thus a distinct party was formed, the meetings of which were commonly held at night, and on these occasions the new prophetess indulged in her reveries, styling herself the woman of the twelfth of Revelations, and Mr. White her first-born. Such gross outrage on the common sense of the inhabitants, occasioned a popular tumult, to save her from whose fury the magistrates sent her under escort to some distance; after which, with her clerical friend and about forty deluded followers, she wandered up and down the country, singing, and avowing that they were travellers for the New Jerusalem, and the expectants of the immediate coming of Christ. They had a common fund on which they lived, and did not consider it necessary to work, as they believed God would not suffer them to want. Mrs. Buchan died in 1792, and the sect soon after broke up.

BUDNANS, a sect in Poland who disclaimed the worship of Christ, and ran into many wild hypotheses. Budnæus, the founder, was publicly excommunicated in 1584, with all his disciples, but afterwards he was admitted to the communion of the Socinians.

BULL, a written letter despatched by order of the Pope, from the Roman Chancery, and sealed with lead. It is a kind of apostolical rescript, or edict, and is chiefly in use in matters of justice or grace. If the former be the intention of the Bull, the lead is hung by a hempen cord; if the latter, by a silken thread. It is this pendent lead, or seal, which is, properly speaking, the Bull, and which is impressed on one side with the heads of St. Peter and St. Paul, and on the other with the name of the Pope, and the year of his pontificate. The Bull is written in an old round Gothic letter, and is divided into five parts: the narrative of the fact; the conception; the clause; the date; and the salutation, in which the Pope styles himself Servus Servorum, the Servant of Servants.

These instruments, besides the lead hanging to them, have a cross, with some text of Scripture, or religious motto, about it. Thus, in those of Pope Lucius III., the device was Adjuva nos Deus Salutaris noster; that of Urban III., Ad te Domine, levavi animam meam; and that of Alexander III., Vias tuas, Domine, demonstra mihi.

Bulls are granted for the consecration of bishops, the promotion to benefices, the celebration of jubilees, &c. Those brought into France are limited by the laws and customs of the land: nor are they admitted till they have been examined, and found to contain nothing contrary to the liberties of the Gallican church. After the death of a Pope, no Bulls are dispatched during the vacancy of the see. Therefore, to prevent any abuses, as soon as the Pope is dead, the vice-chancellor of the Roman church takes the seal off the Bulls, and, in the presence of several persons, orders the name of the deceased pontiff to be erased, and covers the other side, on which are the faces of St. Peter and St.

Paul, with a linen cloth, sealing it with his own seal. The word Bull is derived from bullare, to seal letters; or from Bulla, a drop or bubble. Some derive it from the Greek Βουλή, Council; Pezron from the Celtic Buil, bubble.

BULL IN CENA DOMINI is a particular Bull, read every year, on the day of the Lord's supper, or Maunday Thursday, in the Pope's presence; containing excommunications; and anathemas against heretics, and all who disturb or oppose the ecclesiastical jurisdiction of the holy see. After the reading of the Bull the Pope throws a burning torch into the public place, to denote the thunder of this anathema. The Council of Tours, in 1510, declared the Bull in cena Domini void in regard to France.

BUNYAN, JOHN, the celebrated author of the "Pilgrim's Progress," was born at Elstow, in Bedfordshire, in the year 1628. His father was a tinker; and Bunyan only received instruction in reading and writing. From the account which he gives of himself, in a work written by him, entitled, "Grace abounding to the Chief of Sinners," it appears that, in his early days, his character was notoriously vile; that he was addicted to the practice of almost every vice; and that even the profligate and profane regarded "John Bunyan as a great sinner." For some time he followed the trade of his father; till, when sixteen years of age, he became a soldier in the Parliament's army, and, in 1645, was present at the siege of Leicester; where, being drawn out to stand sentinel, another soldier of his company desiring to take his place, he consented, and thereby probably avoided being shot through the head by a musket-ball, which killed his comrade. It is impossible, when reading the account of the first twenty years of his life, as recorded in his "Grace Abounding," not to be forcibly impressed with the truth of the doctrine, now generally received by all Christians, of the special Providence of God. His preservation from drowning, from destruction by an adder, by a musket-shot, and from death by various ways, demonstrate such doctrine to be unquestionably true; and the facts which he has communicated, as to his conversion, additionally confirm the veracity of that doctrine. For although some allowances are to be made for his enthusiasm, and, therefore, for the language which he frequently adopted, yet the facts which he records are unquestionably true; and, if they be true, the inference appears to be obvious. He relates, "that one day he was at play at the game of cat; and, having struck it one blow from the hole, just as he was about again to strike it, a voice did suddenly dart from heaven into his soul, which said, 'Wilt thou leave thy sins, and go to heaven, or have thy sins, and go to hell?' which put him into such consternation, that, leaving his cat on the ground, he looked up to heaven, and was as if he had, with the eyes of his understanding, seen the Lord Jesus looking down upon him, and threatening him with some grievous punishment for his ungodly practices."

Bunyan, at an early age, married a young woman, whose parents had educated her in habits of respect for religion; and, from such union, the mind of Bunyan was sometimes roused to review his own character, and deplore his conduct. His heart was at that time, however, unaffected, though his judgment was convinced; and he attended regularly, with superstitious feelings, at his parish church. At length he was induced to set about reading the Scriptures, by the accidental conversation of a poor man, with whom he conversed on the subject of religion. It appears, however, that he still continued unacquainted with the sinfulness of his nature, and the necessity of faith in Christ, till he met with four poor women at Bedford, "sitting at a door in the sun, talking about the things of God—about a new birth—about the work of God in their hearts, as also how they were convinced of their miserable state by nature—of the mercy of God in Jesus Christ—of his word and promises—of the temptations of Satan—and of their wretchedness of heart and unbelief." Bunyan was so affected with the conversation of these good women, that he availed himself of every opportunity to converse with them. His irreligious companions perceived a difference in him, which was to them offensive; and being unable to disturb in him that steady purpose of his mind, to seek for happiness in God alone, they resigned his society. His mind was shortly afterwards much distressed by thoughts, which perpetually accompanied him, that he wanted faith, and never could have any, because he was not one of the elect. He says this put him upon considering how to make trial of this matter; and he resolved to attempt the working of a miracle as the surest test of his faith. Accordingly, as he was one day going between Elstow and Bedford, he was about to say to some puddles that were in the horse-path, "Be dry;" but, just as he was about to speak, his good sense prevailed with him, not to put his faith upon that trial. After much perplexity, however, his doubts were satisfied by that passage of Scripture, Luke xiv. 22, 23: "Compel them to come in, that my house may be full; and yet there is room." As soon as Mr. Bunyan obtained a good hope, that he was interested in the salvation of Jesus Christ, he communicated the state of his mind to Mr. Gifford, a Baptist dissenting minister, residing at Bedford; attended his preaching, and obtained from it much advantage; and, believing that baptism, by immersion, on a personal profession of faith, was most scriptural, he was so baptized, and admitted a member of the church, A. D. 1653.

In 1656, Mr. Bunyan, conceiving that he was called by God to become a preacher of the gospel, delayed not to comply with that call. The measure excited considerable notice, and exposed him to great persecution. For some years he continued to preach with eminent success; though, during the period of the Commonwealth, he was indicted for holding an unlawful assembly at Eton, but for which offence it does not appear that he was punished. At length, however, in the month of November, 1660, in the reign of Charles II., being about to preach at Samsell, a small hamlet near Harlington, in Bedfordshire, he was seized, by virtue of a warrant from a justice of the peace. The Nonconformists, at that time, were unquestionably the objects of bitter malice, and unwise and severe persecution. Bunyan was one of the first victims of the intolerant measures of Charles II. After the usual examination before the justice, at which Bunyan displayed much firmness and zeal, he was committed to Bedford jail, until the quarter sessions. At those sessions, in January, 1661, an indictment was preferred against him, for being an upholder of unlawful meetings and conventicles. His defence, though long, and, on the whole, judicious, did not avail him; and he was sentenced to perpetual banishment, and committed to prison, where, though that sentence was not executed, he was confined twelve years and a half. In the same prison were also confined about sixty dissenters, taken at a religious meeting at Kaistoe, in Bedfordshire. During that confinement, Mr. Bunyan supported himself and his family by making tagged laces. His spare time he employed in writing the first part of his "Pilgrim's Progress," and in preaching to, and praying with, his fellow-prisoners. The respectability of his character, and the propriety of his conduct, induced, in the mind of the jailer, a feeling of respect for him. He frequently permitted him to leave the prison, and visit his friends. He once permitted him to visit London, and he committed a great share of the management of the prison to his care. In the last year of his confinement, he wrote his work, entitled, "A Defence of the Doctrine of Justification." At length, by the exertions of Dr. Owen, his liberation was obtained, in the year 1674; and having been chosen co-pastor over the Baptist congregation at Bedford, he resumed the arduous duties of a Nonconformist divine. After his enlargement he travelled into several parts of England, to visit the dissenting congregations, which procured him the epithet of Bishop Bunyan. In King James II.'s reign, when that prince's declaration in favour of liberty of conscience came, Mr. Bunyan, by the voluntary contributions of his followers, built a large meeting-house at Bedford, and preached constantly to great congregations. He also annually visited London, where he was very popular; and assemblies of twelve hundred have been convened in Southwark to hear him, on a dark winter's morning, at seven o'clock, even on week days. In the midst of these and similar exertions, he closed his life; and, at the age of sixty, on the 31st of August, 1688, "he resigned his soul into the hands of his most merciful Redeemer."

He was interred in Bunhill Fields burying-ground, and over his remains a handsome tomb was erected. Of Bunyan it has been said, and with seeming propriety, "that he appeared in countenance to be of a stern and rough temper, but, in his conversation, mild and affable; not given to loquacity or much discourse in company, unless some urgent occasion required it: observing never to boast of himself or his parts, but rather seem low in his own eyes, and submit himself to the judgment of others; abhorring lying and swearing; being just, in all that lay in his power, to his word; not seeming to revenge injuries; loving to reconcile differences, and making friendship with all. He had a sharp, quick eye, accompanied with an excellent discerning of persons, being of good judgment and quick wit." Dr. Towers has said of him, "He was certainly a man of genius, and might have made a great figure in the literary world, if he had received the advantages of a liberal education." Mr. Scott, the author of "The Force of Truth," has said, "he was certainly endued with extraordinary natural talents; his understanding, discernment, memory, invention, and imagination, were remarkably sound and vigorous, so that he made a very great proficiency in the knowledge of scriptural divinity though brought up in ignorance."

Of the "Pilgrim's Progress," but one opinion seems to be entertained. Mr. Grainger said, that the Pilgrim's Progress was one of the most ingenious books in the English language; and in this opinion, he states, Mr. Merrick and Dr. Roberts coincided. Dr. Radcliffe termed it, "a phoenix in a cage." Lord Kaimes said, "it was composed in a style enlivened, like that of Homer, by a proper mixture of the dramatic and narrative, and upon that account has been translated into most European languages." Dr. Johnson remarked, "that it had great merit, both for invention, imagination, and the conduct of the story: and it had the best evidence of its merit—the general and continued approbation of mankind. Few books," he said, "had had a more extensive sale; and that it was remarkable that it began very much like the poem of Dante, yet there was no translation of Dante when Bunyan wrote." Dr. Franklin said, "Honest John Bunyan is the first man I know of who has mingled narrative and dialogue together, a mode of writing very engaging to the reader, who, in the most interesting passages, finds himself admitted, as it were, into the company, and present at the conversation." Dean Swift declared that he "had been better entertained and more informed by a chapter in the Pilgrim's Progress than by a long discourse upon the will and the intellect, and simple or complex ideas." And Cowper, (in his "Miscellanies,") has immortalised him in some beautiful lines, of which the length of this memoir precludes the insertion.

In addition to his "Pilgrim's Progress," he wrote two other allegorical pieces: "Solomon's Temple Spiritualized," and "The Holy War;" the latter of which has excited a degree of attention nearly equal to that displayed to his "Pilgrim's Progress." His other works are principally controversial.

BURIAL, the interment of a deceased person. The rites of burial have been looked upon in all countries as a debt so sacred, that such as neglected to discharge them were thought accursed. Among the Jews, the privilege of burial was denied only to self-murderers, who were thrown out to putrefy upon the ground. In the Christian church, though good men always desired the privilege of interment, yet they were not, like the heathens, so concerned for their bodies as to think it any detriment to them if either the barbarity of an enemy, or some other accident, deprived them of this privilege. The primitive church denied the more solemn rites of burial only to unbaptized persons, self-murderers, and excommunicated persons, who continued obstinate and impenitent, in manifest contempt of the church's censures. The place of burial among the Jews was never particularly determined. We find they had graves in the town and country, upon the highways or gardens, and upon mountains. Among the Greeks, the temples were made repositories for the dead in the primitive ages; yet, in the latter ages, the Greeks as well as the Romans buried the dead without the cities, and chiefly by the highways. Among the primitive Christians, burying in cities was not allowed for the first three hundred years, nor in churches for many ages after; the dead bodies being first deposited in the atrium, or churchyard, and porches and porticoes of the church: hereditary burying-places were forbidden till the twelfth century. See FUNERAL RITES.

As to burying in churches, we find a difference of opinion: some have thought it improper that dead bodies should be interred in the church. Sir Matthew Hale used to say, that churches were for the living, and churchyards for the dead. In the famous bishop Hall's will, we find this passage: after desiring a private funeral, he says, "I do not hold God's house a meet repository for the dead bodies of the greatest saints." Mr. Hervey, on the contrary, defends it, and supposes that it tends to render our assemblies more awful; and that as the bodies of the saints are the Lord's property, they should be reposed in his house.

BUTLER, JOSEPH, BISHOP, the celebrated author of "The Analogy of Religion, Natural and Revealed, to the Constitution and Course of Nature," was the youngest of eight children of Mr. Thomas Butler, residing at Wantage, in Berkshire, and was born in that town in the year 1692. He received his primary education at the free grammar school of Wantage, under the tuition of the Rev. Philip Barton. At that school he received much sound instruction, and became as distinguished for his steady, moral, serious character, as for his genius and learning. His father was a dissenter, and Mr. Butler, having quitted the grammar school, was sent to a presbyterian dissenting academy at Tewkesbury. Mr. Butler, at that academy, received from Mr. Jones, the principal tutor, who was a man of extraordinary learning, the greatest attention, and made a progress in the study of theology which was truly surprising. His letters, written at that time, to the celebrated Dr. Samuel Clarke, containing his doubts as to the tenable nature of some of the arguments made use of by that divine, in demonstrating the being and attributes of God, displayed a sagacity and depth of thought which excited the notice, and even respect, of Dr. Clarke. The whole correspondence is now annexed to that incomparable treatise. His mind, at that time, was also much occupied in examining the principles of nonconformity, and in endeavouring to satisfy himself whether he should become a dissenting clergyman, or a minister of the established church. The result of that investigation appears to be, that he considered, on the whole, episcopacy to be preferable; and accordingly, on the 17th of March, 1714, he was admitted a commoner of Oriel College, Oxford. With Mr. Edward Talbot, who was the second son of Dr. Edward Talbot, he formed at college a very intimate acquaintanceship; and through the medium of Mr. Talbot, many of Mr. Butler's subsequent preferences may be traced. It was thus that, in 1718, he was appointed preacher at the Rolls, by Sir Joseph Jekyl; and in 1721 he took the degree of Bachelor of Laws. He continued at the Rolls till 1726, in which year he published, in one volume 8vo, Fifteen Sermons, preached at that chapel. By the continued friendship of Dr. Talbot, then bishop of Durham, he had presented Mr. Butler to the rectory of Haughton, near Darlington, and afterwards to that of Stanhope. At Stanhope he afterwards much resided; and, during seven years, he performed, with unremitting assiduity and piety, all the duties of a parish priest. In 1733, he quitted the retirement of Stanhope, to become chaplain to Lord Charles Talbot. He at the same time was admitted at Oxford to the degree of Doctor of Laws, and was shortly afterwards presented by the chaplains with a prebend in the church of Rochester. In 1736, Dr. Butler was appointed Clerk of the Closet to Queen Caroline; and, in the same year, presented a copy of the treatise for which his name has been so long, so extensively, and so justly celebrated. That work, and his uniformly consistent conduct, ensured him the respect and esteem of the Queen; and in 1738, he was consecrated to the bishopric of Bristol. In 1740, King George II. promoted him to the deanery of St. Paul's, London; but finding the demands of that dignity to be incompatible with his parish duty at Stanhope, where he had still resided six months of the year, he immediately resigned that rich benefice. In 1750, he was translated to the see of Durham, in consequence of the decease of Dr. Edward Chandler. In the following year, he distinguished himself by his charge "On the Importance of External Religion." In consequence of that charge, Bishop Butler has been accused of being addicted to superstition, of being inclined to popery, and of dying in the communion of the church of Rome; but such calumnies have been long since refuted by the evidence of facts. Rank and talents, and usefulness and piety, present, however, neither separate nor combined, any impediments to the advances of death. For he had been but a short time seated in his new bishoprick, when his health declined; and at Bath, on the 16th of July, 1752, he expired. His corpse was conveyed to Bristol, and there, in the cathedral, was interred all that was mortal of this learned prelate. Of Bishop Butler's Analogy but one opinion has been entertained. It has always been regarded as a work of very superior merit, and as displaying a depth of thought and a profundity of mind, acquired or possessed but by few. It is a standard work on the evidences of Christianity.

BYZANTINE CHURCH, comprehending all the churches which acknowledge the supremacy of the Œcumenical Patriarch of Constantinople. Of the population included within its pale, reduced as it now nearly is to the limits of Turkey in Europe, Greece, and Palestine, it is not easy to form a correct estimate. The Greek population (properly so called) of the Morea, the islands Livadia, Epirus, Thessaly, and Macedonia, cannot be estimated at more than a million and a half; and those resident in the other provinces of European Turkey, including the principalities of Moldavia and Wallachia, in Asiatic Turkey and Egypt, would probably be overrated at the same number. Three millions, we are inclined to think, would be a full allowance for the subjects of the Universal Bishop of the Eastern World.

BYZANTINE RECENSION, the text of the Greek New Testament, as propagated within the limits of the patriarchate of Constantinople. The readings of the recension are those which are most commonly found in the κοινή Εκδόσις, or common printed Greek text, and are also most numerous in the existing manuscripts which correspond to it, a very considerable additional number of which have recently been discovered and collated by Professor Scholz. The Byzantine text is found in the Four Gospels of the Alexandrian MS.; it was the original from which the Slavonic version was made, and was cited by Chrysostom and by Theophylact, bishop of Bulgaria.—Horne's Introduction.

CABBALA. (Heb.) Traditions. Among the Jews, it principally means the mystical interpretations of their Scriptures, handed down by tradition. The manner in which Maimonides explains the Cabbala, or traditions of the Jews, is as follows:—"God not only delivered the law to Moses on Mount Sinai, but the explanation of it likewise. When Moses came down from the mount, and entered into his tent, Aaron went to visit him, and Moses acquainted Aaron with the laws he had received from God, together with the explanation of them. After this, Aaron placed himself at the right hand of Moses, and Eleazar and Ithamar, the sons of Aaron, were admitted, to whom Moses repeated what he had just before told to Aaron. These being seated, the one on the right, the other on the left hand of Moses, the seventy elders of Israel, who composed the Sanhedrim, came in. Moses again declared the same laws to them, with the interpretations of them, as he had done before to Aaron and his sons. Lastly, all who pleased of the common people were invited to enter, and Moses instructed them likewise in the same manner as the rest. So that Aaron heard four times what Moses had been taught by God upon Mount Sinai; Eleazar and Ithamar three times; the seventy elders twice; and the people once. Moses afterwards reduced the laws which he had received into writing, but not the explanations of them: these he thought it sufficient to trust to the memories of the above-mentioned persons, who, being perfectly instructed in them, delivered them to their children, and these again to theirs, from age to age."

The Cabbala, therefore, is properly the oral law of the Jews, delivered down, by word of mouth, from father to son; and it is to these interpretations of the written law our Saviour's censure is applied, when he reproves the Jews for making the commands of God of none effect through their traditions.

Some of the Rabbins pretend that the origin of the Cabbala is to be referred to the Angels; that the angel Raziel instructed Adam in it; that the angel Japhiel Shem; the angel Zedekiel Abraham, &c. But the truth is, these explications of the law are only the several interpretations and decisions of the Rabbins on the law of Moses; in the framing of which they studied principally the combinations of particular words, letters, and numbers, and by that means pretended to discover clearly the true sense of the difficult passages of Scripture.

This is properly called the artificial Cabbala, to distinguish it from simple tradition; and it is of three sorts. The first called Gematria, consists in taking letters as figures, and explaining words by the arithmetical value of the letters of which they are composed. For instance, the Hebrew letters of Jabo-Schiloh (Shiloh shall come), make up the same arithmetical number as Mashiach (the Messiah), from whence they conclude that Shiloh signifies the Messiah.

The second kind of artificial Cabbala, which is called Notaricon, consists in taking each particular letter of a word for an entire diction. For example, of Bereschith, which is the first word of Genesis, composed of the letters B, R, A, S, C, H, J, T, they make—Bara-Rakia-Arez-Schamaim-Yam-Tehomoth, i. e. he created the firmament, the earth, the heavens, the sea, and the deep; or in forming one entire diction out of the initial letters of many: thus, in Attah-Gibbor-Leolam-Adonai (thou art strong for ever, O Lord), they put the initial letters of this sentence together, and form the word Aglá, which signifies either—I will reveal, or a drop of dew, and is the Cabbalistic name of God.

The third kind, called Themura, consists in changing and transposing the letters of a word: thus of the word Bereschith (the first of the book of Genesis), they make A-betisri, the first of the month Tisri, and infer from thence that the world was created on the first day of the month Tisri, which answers very nearly to our September.

The Cabbala, according to the Jews, is a noble and sublime science, conducting men by an easy method to the profoundest truths.

Without it, the holy Scriptures could not be distinguished from profane books, wherein we find some miraculous events, and as pure morality as that of the law, if we did not penetrate into the truths locked up under the external cover of the literal sense. As men were grossly deceived, when, dwelling upon the sensible object, they mistook angels for men; so also they fall into error or ignorance, when they insist upon the surface of letters or words, which change with custom, and ascend not up to the ideas of God himself, which are infinitely more noble and spiritual.

Some visionaries, among the Jews, believe that Jesus Christ wrought his miracles by virtue of the mysteries of the Cabbala. Some learned men are of opinion that Pythagoras and Plato learned the Cabbalistic art of the Jews in Egypt: others, on the contrary, say the philosophy of Pythagoras and Plato furnished the Jews with the Cabbala. Most of the heretics in the primitive Christian church fell into the vain conceits of the Cabbala, particularly the Gnostics, Valentinians, and Basilidians.

CABBALISTS, those Jewish doctors who profess the study of the Cabbala. In the opinion of these men, there is not a word, letter, or accent in the law, without some mystery in it. The first Cabbalistical author that we know of is Simon the son of Joachai, who is said to have lived a little before the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus. His book, intitled Zohar, is extant; but it is agreed that many additions have been made to it. The first part of this work is entitled Zeniutha or Mystery; the second, Idra Rabba, or the Great Synod; the third, Idra Lata, or the Little Synod; which is the author's adieu to his disciples.

CAINITES, a sect that sprung up about the year 130; so called because they esteemed Cain worthy of the greatest honours. They honoured those who carry in Scripture the most visible marks of reprobation; as the inhabitants of Sodom, Esau, Korah, Dathan, and Abiram. They had in particular great veneration for Judas, under the pretence that the death of Christ had saved mankind.

CALENDAR, the order and series of the months that make up a year: it comes from the word Calendæ, the name which the Romans gave to the first days of the month. The Roman calendar was composed by Romulus, founder of Rome, who being better versed in martial affairs than acquainted with the stars, made a year of ten months, whereof the first was March, then April, May, June, Quintil, called afterwards Julius, and Sextil, called also in process of time, August, September, October, November, December: he gave March, May, Quintil, and October, each 31 days, and but 30 each to the other six; so that altogether made but 304 days.

Numa Pompilius reformed this, and imitated the Grecians, to allow the year twelve lunar months, of 30 and 29 days each, one after the other, which made 354 days; but because he loved an uneven number, through a superstition that he held from the Egyptians, he made his of 355 days, and gave it twelve months, viz.: January, February, March, &c. January was of 29 days, February of 28, March, May, July, and October, of 31, and the other six of 29 each: it did not matter February's being an uneven number, because he designed it for the sacrifices that were made for the gods of hell, to which that number, because unlucky, better belonged. Numa would have the month of January, which he placed at the winter solstice, to be the beginning of the year, and not March, which Romulus placed at the equinox of the spring. He also made use of the intercalation of the Grecians, who added a supernumerary month every second year, which consisted successively of 22 and 23 days; and that to equal the civil year to the motion of the sun, which makes its revolution in 365 days, and about six hours, he ordered the chief pontiffs to show the people the time and manner of inserting these extraordinary months; but whether it was through ignorance, superstition, or interest, they confounded things so much, that the feasts which should be kept according to this institution at certain times, fell upon quite different seasons, as the feasts of autumn upon the spring, &c. This disorder was so great, that Julius Cæsar, dictator and sovereign pontiff, after he had won the battle of Pharsalia, did not look upon the reformation of the calendar as a thing unworthy his care. He sent for the famous astrologer, Sosigenes, from Alexandria, who ordered the year according to the course of the sun, and having composed a calendar of 365 days, he left the six hours to form a day at the end of every fourth year, which day was to be inserted in the month of February, after the 24th of that month, which the Romans, according to their way of counting, called the sixth of the calends; and hence came the word Bissextile, because they said twice Sexto Calendas, to imply the ten days by which the solar year of 365 days surpassed Numa's of 355; he added two days to January, Sextil, and December, which had before but 29; and added to April, June, September, and November, a day to each, leaving the month of February but 28 days in the ordinary years, and 29 in the bissextile. And as by the negligence of those who were to order and distribute the intercalary months, the beginning of the year was found to be 17 days before the winter solstice, and that it was then also a year of the intercalation of the month of 23 days, which in all made 90; for this reason, I say, this year of the correction of the calendar by Julius Cæsar was of 15 months, and of 445 days, and was therefore called the year of confusion. It is of importance to observe, that this emperor, willing to accommodate himself to the humour of the Romans, who were used so long to the lunar year, began the Julian year upon a day of the new moon, which followed the winter solstice, and which was at that time eight days after it, and that was the reason why the year began since eight days after the solstice of Capricorn. It was not hard for the Romans, who then commanded most part of the earth, to make this correction of Julius Cæsar to be received, and bring it in use amongst the remotest nations. The Grecians left off their lunar, and the intercalation of their 45 days every fourth year. The Egyptians fixed their Thot, or the first day of their year, which before changed from one season to another; the Hebrews did the like; so that it became the calendar of all nations. The primitive Christians kept the same name of the months, the same number of days of the months, and the intercalation of a day in the bissextile year; but took out of the Julian calendar the nundinal letters, which marked the days of assembly, or feria, and put other letters in their place to mark Sunday, and the other days of the week; and instead of the profane feasts, and the plays of the Romans, they placed in order the feasts and ceremonies of the true religion. About the beginning of the sixth age, Dennis the abbot, surnamed the Little, seeing the different customs of the Eastern and Western Churches about the time of celebrating of Easter, he proposed a calendar according to the Victorian period, composed of cycles of the sun and moon, with reference to the birth of Jesus Christ; for until then, the greatest part of the Christians counted their eras from the foundation of Rome, or from the consuls and emperors, always keeping to the custom of the Romans as to the beginning of the year, fixed on the first of January. This calendar of the ancient church showed precisely enough the new moon, and consequently the time of the feast of Easter; but in succeeding ages it was discovered that this calculation did not agree altogether with the course of the sun and moon, and that the feast of Easter was no more held upon the full moon of the first month. And this error in astronomy was of evil consequence, because the feast of Easter would have insensibly fallen in winter, and then in autumn and summer. To remedy this disorder, Pope Gregory XIII. sent briefs to all Christian princes, and to all famous universities, to desire them to seek means to re-establish the vernal equinox in its right place; and after he had received the opinions of all the learned, he cut off ten days in the calendar, and confirmed it with a Bull in 1581; so that the day after St. Francis, which is the 4th of October, was called 15 instead of 5: by this correction, what was before the 11th of October, became the 21st; and the equinox of spring, which fell upon the 2d of March, was changed to the 12th, as it was in the time of the council of Nice, in 325. The same pope found a way to hinder the like disorder for the future, in cutting off one bissextile day every 100 years. This correction was received by all those that are of the Church of Rome, but has not been allowed of by the Protestants of England, Germany, &c. And there were several learned men that wrote against this reformation; among others, Mästlinus, professor of mathematics at Tübingen; Scaliger, and Georgius Germanus; and there was a new modelled calendar made by Mr. Viète, and presented to the pope, with his notes upon the faults that he observed in the Gregorian. This is also called the new and perpetual calendar, because the disposition of the epochs, which are substituted for the golden number, will make it of use in all times, whatever may be discovered in the motion of the stars.—Blondel.

CALENDARS, books containing the memoirs of the days on which the martyrs suffered. At first, the calendar contained the mention of the martyrs only; but in the course of time, the confessors, or those who, without arriving at the glory of martyrdom, had confessed their faith in Christ, by their heroic virtues, were admitted to the same honour. The calendars were preserved in the churches. A calendar of the church of Rome was published by Boucher, another by Allatius, a third by Joannes Wanto, chancellor of Paris. A most ancient calendar of the church of Carthage was published by Mabilion. But the principal work of this kind is Joseph Assemann's "Calendar of the Universal Church, illustrated with Notes."—Butler's Life of Alban Butler.

CALIXTINS, a branch of the Hussites in Bohemia and Moravia, in the fifteenth century. The principal point in which they differed from the church of Rome, was the use of the chalice (calix), or communicating in both kinds. Calixtins was also a name given to those among the Lutherans who followed the opinions of George Calixtus, a celebrated divine in the seventeenth century, who endeavoured to unite the Romish, Lutheran, and Calvinistic churches, in the bonds of charity and mutual benevolence. He maintained, 1. That the fundamental doctrines of Christianity, by which he meant those elementary principles whence all its truths flow, were preserved pure in all three communions, and were contained in that ancient form of doctrine that is vulgarly known by the name of the Apostles' Creed. 2. That the tenets and opinions which had been constantly received by the ancient doctors during the first five centuries, were to be considered as of equal truth and authority with the express declarations and doctrines of Scripture.

CALL, CALLING, generally denotes God's invitation to man to participate the blessings of salvation: it is termed effectual, to distinguish it from that external or common call of the light of nature, but especially of the gospel, in which men are invited to come to God, but which has no saving effect upon the heart: thus it is said, "Many are called, but few chosen." Matt. xxii. 14. Effectual calling has been more particularly defined to be "the work of God's Spirit, whereby convincing us of our sin and misery, enlightening our minds with the knowledge of Christ, and renewing our wills, he doth persuade and enable us to embrace Jesus Christ, freely offered to us in the gospel." This may further be considered as a call from darkness to light, 1 Pet. ii. 9; from bondage to liberty, Gal. ii. 13; from the fellowship of the world to the fellowship of Christ, 1 Cor. i. 9; from misery to happiness, 1 Cor. vii. 15; from sin to holiness, 1 Thess. iv. 7; finally, from all created good to the enjoyment of eternal felicity, 1 Pet. v. 10. It is considered in the Scripture as an holy calling, 2 Tim. i. 9; an high calling, Phil. iii. 14; an heavenly calling, Heb. iii. 1; and without repentance, as God will never cast off any who are once drawn to him, Rom. xi. 29.

It has been a matter of dispute whether the Gospel call should be general, i. e. preached to all men indiscriminately. Some suppose that, as the elect only will be saved, it is to be preached only to them; and, therefore, cannot invite all to come to Christ. But to this it is answered, that an unknown decree can be no rule of action, Deut. xxix. 29; Prov. ii. 13; that, as we know not who are the elect, we cannot tell but he may succeed our endeavours by enabling those who are addressed to comply with the call, and believe; that it is the Christian minister's commission to preach the Gospel to every creature, Mark xvi. 15; that the inspired writers never confined themselves to preach to saints only, but reasoned with and persuaded sinners, 2 Cor. v. 11:—and, lastly, that a general address to men's consciences has been greatly successful in promoting their conversion. Acts ii. 23, 41. But it has been asked, if none but the elect can believe, and no man has any ability in himself to comply with the call, and as the Almighty knows that none but those to whom he gives grace can be effectually called, of what use is it to insist on a general and external call? To this it is answered, that, by the external call, gross enormous crimes are often avoided; habits of vice have been partly conquered; and much moral good at least has been produced. It is also observed, that though a man cannot convert himself, yet he has a power to do some things that are materially good, though not good in all those circumstances that accompany or flow from regeneration: such were Ahab's humility, 1 Kings xxi. 29; Nineveh's repentance, Jer. iii. 5; and Herod's hearing of John, Mark vi. 20. On the whole, the design of God in giving this common call in the Gospel is the salvation of his people, the restraining of many from wicked practices, and the setting forth of the glorious work of redemption by Jesus Christ. CALOYERS, a general name given to the monks of the Greek church. It is taken from the Greek καλόγεροι, which signifies good old men. These Religious consider St. Basil as their father and founder, and look upon it as a crime to follow any other rule than his. There are three degrees among them—the novices, who are called Archari; the ordinary professed, called Microchemi; and the more perfect, called Megalochemi. They are likewise divided into Cœnobites, Anchorets, and Recluses.

The Cœnobites are employed in reciting their office from midnight to sunset; and, as it is impossible, in so long an exercise, they should not be overtaken with sleep, there is one monk appointed to wake them; and they are obliged to make three genuflexions at the door of the choir, and, returning, to bow to the right and left to their brethren. The Anchorets retire from the conversation of the world, and live in hermitages in the neighbourhood of the monasteries. They cultivate a little spot of ground, and never go out but on Sundays and holidays, to perform their devotions at the next monastery: the rest of the week they employ in prayer and working with their hands. As for the Recluses, they shut themselves up in grottos and caverns on the tops of mountains, which they never go out of, abandoning themselves entirely to Providence. They live on the alms sent them by the neighbouring monasteries.

In the monasteries the Religious rise at midnight, and repeat a particular office, called from thence Mesonycticon, which takes up the space of two hours; after which they retire to their cells till five o'clock in the morning, when they return to the church to say matins. At nine o'clock they repeat the Terce, Sexte, and Mass; after which they repair to the refectory, where is a lecture read till dinner. Before they leave the refectory, the cook comes to the door, and, kneeling down, demands their blessing. At four o'clock in the afternoon they say Vespers; and at six go to supper. After supper they say an office, from thence called Apodipho; and, at eight, each monk retires to his chamber and bed till midnight. Every day, after matins, they confess their faults on their knees to their superior.

They have four Lents. The first and greatest is that of the resurrection of our Lord. They call it the Grand Quarantain, and it lasts eight weeks. During this Lent, the Religious drink no wine, and their abstinence is so great, that, if they are obliged, in speaking, to name milk, butter, or cheese, they always add this parenthesis, Timitis agias saracostis, i. e. saving the respect due to the holy Lent. The second Lent is that of the holy Apostles, which begins eight days after Whit Sunday; its duration is not fixed, it continuing sometimes three weeks, and at other times longer. During this Lent, they are allowed to drink wine. The third Lent is that of the Assumption of the Virgin, it lasts fourteen days; during which they abstain from fish, excepting on Sundays, and the day of the Transfiguration of our Lord. The fourth Lent is that of Advent, which they observe after the same manner as that of the Apostles.

The Caloyers, besides the usual habit of the monastic life, wear over their shoulders a square piece of stuff, on which are represented the cross, and the other marks of the passion of our Saviour, with these letters, JC. XC. NC., i. e. Jesus Christus vincit.

All the monks are obliged to labour for the benefit of their monastery, as long as they continue in it. Some have the care of the fruits, others of the grain, and others of the cattle. The necessity the Caloyers are under of cultivating their own lands, obliges them to admit a great number of lay-brothers, who are employed the whole day in working.

Over all these Caloyers there are visiters or exarchs, who visit the convents under their inspection, only to draw from them the sums which the Patriarch demands of them. Yet, notwithstanding the taxes these Religious are obliged to pay, both to their Patriarch and to the Turks, their convents are very rich.

The most considerable monastery of the Greek Caloyers, in Asia, is that of mount Sinai, which was founded by the Emperor Justinian, and endowed with sixty thousand crowns revenue. The Abbot of this monastery, who is also an archbishop, has under him two hundred Religious. This convent is a large square building, surrounded with walls fifty feet high, and with but one gate, which is blocked up to prevent the entrance of the Arabs. On the eastern side there is a window, through which those within draw up the pilgrims in a basket, which they let down by a pulley. Not many miles beyond this they have another, dedicated to St. Catherine. It is situated in the place where Moses made the bitter waters sweet. It has a garden, with a plantation of more than ten thousand palm-trees, from whence the monks draw a considerable revenue. There is another in Palestine, four or five leagues from Jerusalem, situated in the most barren place imaginable. The gate of the convent is covered with the skins of crocodiles to prevent the Arabs setting fire to it, or breaking it to pieces with stones. It has a large tower, in which there is always a monk, who gives notice by a bell of the approach of the Arabs, or any wild beasts.

The Caloyers, or Greek monks, have a great number of monasteries in Europe; among which that of Penteli, a mountain of Attica, near Athens, is remarkable for its beautiful situation, and a very good library. That of Calimachus, a principal town of the island of Chios, is remarkable for the occasion of its foundation. It is called Niamogni, i. e. The sole Virgin, its church having been built in memory of an image of the Holy Virgin, miraculously found on a tree, being the only one left of several which had been consumed by fire. Constantin Monomachus, emperor of Constantinople, being informed of this miracle, made a vow to build a church in that place, if he recovered his throne, from which he had been driven; which he executed in the year 1050. The convent is large, and built in the manner of a castle. It consists of about two hundred Religious, and its revenues amount to sixty thousand piastres, of which they pay five hundred yearly to the Grand Seigneur.

There is in Amourgo, one of the islands of the Archipelago, called Sporades, a monastery of Greek Caloyers, dedicated to the Virgin; it is a large and deep cavern, on the top of a very high hill, and is entered by a ladder of fifteen or twenty steps. The church, refectory, and cells of the Religious who inhabit this grotto, are dug out of the sides of the rock with admirable artifice.

But the most celebrated monasteries of Greek Caloyers are those of mount Athos, in Macedonia. They are twenty-three in number; and the Religious live in them so regularly, that the Turks themselves have a great esteem for them, and often recommend themselves to their prayers. Every thing in them is magnificent; and, notwithstanding they have been under the Turks for so long a time, they have lost nothing of their grandeur. The principal of these monasteries are De la Panagia, and Anna Laura. The Religious, who aspire to the highest dignities, come from all parts of the East, to perform here their noviciate, and, after a stay of some years, are received, upon their return into their own country, as Apostles.

The Caloyers of Mount Athos have a great aversion to the Pope, and relate, that a Roman Pontiff, having visited their monasteries, had plundered and burned some of them, because they would not adore him.

There are female Caloyers, or Greek Nuns, who likewise follow the rule of St. Basil. Their nunneries are always dependent on some monastery. The Turks buy sashes of their working, and they open their gates freely to the Turks on this occasion. Those of Constantinople are widows, some of whom have had several husbands. They make no vow, nor confine themselves within their convents. The priests are forbidden, under severe penalties, to visit these Religious.

CALVIN, JOHN, was born July 10, 1509, at Noyon, in Picardy. His father, Gerard, was neither distinguished by affluence nor learning; but by his judicious, prudent, and upright conduct, he obtained, as he merited, the patronage of the Montmor family, in Picardy. Calvin was educated, in early life, under their roof; and afterwards studied some years at the college de la Marche, in Paris, under the tuition of Maturin Cordier, for whose learned and pious instructions he entertained the most sincere and grateful recollection. From the college de la Marche, he proceeded to that of Montaign; and whilst he advanced in the attainment of profound knowledge, he became increasingly pious. His father, accurately estimating his talents, and wisely attending to the peculiar habits of his mind, obtained for him, when only twenty years of age, the rectory of Pont L'Évêque, at Noyon, and a benefice in the cathedral church. For some reason, however, which it appears impossible accurately to ascertain, Calvin afterwards directed the energies of his mind to the study of the law, at Orleans, under the direction of the celebrated civilian, Pierre de l'Etoile, and attained a proficiency in the science which astonished his contemporaries. The death of his father compelled his return to Noyon, and for a short time retarded his studies. But revisiting Paris, he again renewed them; and, at the age of twenty-four, published his Commentary on the celebrated work of Seneca on Clemency. Calvin had already discovered the absurdities of popery, and freely written on them to his friends; and by his intimacy with Nicholas Cop, who about this time was summoned before the French court, for having exposed the errors of the national religion, had raised many suspicions against him, and his flight to Basle became necessary. The revival of letters, and the exertions of Luther and Melancthon, the two celebrated reformers, combined at this era to encourage a disposition which prevailed, to investigate the doctrines of the church of Rome, and assisted in effecting a reformation, which all wise men must applaud, and at which all good men must rejoice. From Paris, Calvin directed his footsteps to Xaintonge, and in its retirement pursued his studies in theology; composed some formularies, to be used as homilies; and, above all, grew in personal holiness, and thus prepared his mind for his future labours in the cause of truth. Calvin then visited Nerac; resided some time with Jacques le Fevre d'Estaples, who was formerly the instructor of the offspring of Francis the First; and then revisited Paris. In the succeeding year, Francis the First determined, if possible, to extinguish the spark of reformation in Paris; directed not merely the torture, but the death, of many eminent and pious individuals, of both sexes, for their antipathy to a church which they considered as idolatrous, and to rites and ceremonies which they regarded as superstitious. From such scenes the mind of Calvin revolted. From such a church he was determined to separate. He therefore published "La Psychopannyschie," or a refutation of the doctrine, that the souls of the just sleep till the general resurrection;—and he then fled the kingdom. He retired to Basle, and devoted, with Simon Grinee, much time to the study of Hebrew.

The apology made by Francis the First for the persecution of the reformed, and which was, that they were bad citizens, disobedient subjects, and clamorous anabaptists, at this time excited the holy displeasure of Calvin, and he published his "Christian Institutes," dedicating them to Francis. In Italy, about the same period, the principles of the Reformation began to dawn; and the reformer, beholding, with the purest satisfaction, the first beams of a clearer light, hastened to that country; and, aided by the wise and accomplished daughter of Louis XII., the Duchess de Ferrare, he assisted in promoting the spread of the Protestant faith. At the town of Piedmont, he ventured publicly to preach the doctrines of the Reformation; but in the commencement of the year 1536, he was compelled to quit this scene of his labours. In the autumn of the same year he visited Geneva; was prevailed on by Farel and Pierre Viret, to settle there; and immediately commenced the arduous duties of a reformed Christian minister in the Consistory. In Geneva the Protestant religion had much spread, and that city had contracted a close alliance with Bern; but the state of morals was very low, and, therefore, while the talents of Calvin commanded respect, his austerity and sanctity were reprobated or ridiculed. Calvin was accused of Arianism; but the charge he refuted. He opposed the re-establishment of superstitious ceremonies and feasts; but himself and his two friends, Farel and Viret, were hated by the Catholics, and were ultimately banished from Geneva. At Strasburg, however, he found a shelter from the storm of persecution; and, aided by Bucer, he was appointed professor of theology, and pastor of a French church. Though banished from Geneva, he cherished for its inhabitants a Christian regard; he frequently addressed them by letters; he wrote an admirable reply to a publication by Cardinal Sadolet, which was calculated, by the falsity of its reasonings (though disguised by ability and ingenuity) to shake the faith of the reformed: He directed the energies of his mind to the conversion of all schismatics;

and he republished his "Christian Institutes." In 1540, he was invited to return to Geneva. He at first declined; but, at length, solicited by two councils, and by the ministers and inhabitants of the city, he quitted Strasburg in the spring of 1541, with an understanding that he should speedily return; and was received with transport at Geneva. Active and energetic, zealous and persevering, Calvin instantly commenced the work of reformation. The ecclesiastical laws he assisted in revising; the ordinances he altered; and before the year had closed, this work of usefulness was accomplished, and approved by a general council. Those laws were as efficient and salutary, as they were wise and equitable. At this time he wrote a catechism, which was translated into various languages, and met with general approbation. He also published a "Commentary on the Epistle to Titus," and dedicated it to his old friends Viret and Farel. His labours now rapidly increased. He preached nearly every day; he lectured very frequently in theology; presided at meetings; instructed churches; and defended the Protestant faith in works celebrated for their perspicuity and genius. Nor was he less active in his duties as a citizen than as a theologian, or a minister of Jesus Christ. In 1543, he composed a liturgy for the church at Geneva. He also wrote a work on the necessity of a reformation in the church, and exposed the absurdities of a frivolous translation of the Bible, by Castalio, in the compilation of which fancy had been consulted at the expense of truth, and sound instead of sense. The enemies to the reformation were numerous and potent when combined, but singly they were nothing. The truth of this remark was felt by Calvin; and he, therefore, refuted the various works of their enemies as they appeared. Thus he answered Albert Pighius.

But his efforts were not all controversial. He established, at Geneva, a seminary for the education of pious young men in the Protestant faith, who, by their future ministrations, should extend the borders of the true church; and in that great work of usefulness he was assisted by the celebrated Beza. At that time also, the Waldenses, inhabiting Cabriers, and other places, who were persecuted by order of the parliament of Aquitaine, and who fled to Geneva, found in Calvin a sincere and zealous friend. He vindicated in public their cause, and in private relieved their necessities. In the year 1546 the efforts of Calvin were various though painful. Charles the Fifth, who was a determined enemy to the Protestant religion, had alarmed some by his threats, and corrupted others by his promises. Calvin exerted himself to counteract all his efforts. But this was not all. Whilst some were lukewarm at Geneva, others were additionally profligate. To convert and convince them, he laboured with incessant anxiety, though with but inadequate success. In 1547, whilst Germany was the scene of war, and France the theatre of persecution, Calvin wrote his "L'Antidote," being a controversial work on the doctrine of the first seven sections of the Council of Trent, and also "a Warning Letter to the Church of Rouen," against the doctrines of a monk who taught the Gnostic and Antinomian heresies. In the same year he also continued his pastoral duties, and proceeded in the composition of his "Commentaries on Paul's Epistles." In 1548, Beza retired to Geneva, and, with Calvin, formed future plans of yet more extended and important usefulness. Calvin, accompanied by Farel, in the following year visited the Swiss churches; and wrote two very able and learned letters to Socinus, the founder of the sect called Socinians. In 1550, he assisted yet further in the work of reformation, by obtaining the direction of the consistory at Geneva, for the communication of private as well as public religious instruction to its inhabitants, and for a total disregard, by every one, of all feast and saint days. The next year was less favourable to the peace of Calvin. A controversy on the doctrine of predestination agitated the church; the enemies of Calvin misrepresented his sentiments, and endeavoured to excite a general antipathy, not merely to his doctrines, but also to his person. But Providence rendered their attempts abortive.

Calvin is accused of having, at this time, acted with a tyrannical and persecuting spirit towards the heretical Servetus. With him Calvin was once intimate, and also corresponded. Servetus, by the impiety of his conduct and publications, especially by his "Resstitutio Christianismi," attracted the attention of the pope, and of the persecuting Cardinal Tournon. It is stated, that Calvin declared, "If that heretic (Servetus) came to Geneva, he would take care that he should be capitally punished." But this statement his friends confidently deny; and reply, that he persuaded Servetus not to visit Geneva; that he disapproved of all religious persecution; that he could if he had thought proper, for three years before Servetus was so punished, have exposed him to his enemies, but which he would not do; and that Calvin in his writings, declares, that with his original imprisonment and prosecution he was not at all implicated. It cannot, however, be denied, that it was at the instigation of Calvin he was prosecuted, as his secretary was his accuser at Geneva, and exhibited articles against him. By the Council of Geneva, Servetus was condemned to be burned to death; and, on the 27th of October, the punishment was inflicted. The impropriety of that punishment is admitted by all the friends of civil and religious liberty, and the apologists for Calvin alike condemn it.

But they contend, and with seeming propriety, that it was consonant with the spirit of the age, with the laws of Geneva, and with even the opinions of many of the great, and even good men, who then lived.

About this time Calvin was much affected by the prosecution of his friend and fellow-labourer, Farel, for having condemned the immorality of the Genevese; and was almost incessantly occupied in acts of kindness to the persecuted Protestants, who, on the death of Edward, king of England, had been compelled to quit the country. He was also engaged in writing his "Commentary on the Gospel of John." Nor could the spirit of bigotry and persecution, which prevailed in England, fail of attracting his attention. He communicated with the sufferers, both in England and France, and was indefatigable in rooting up all heresies which then disturbed the peace of the church. Towards the close of the year, Calvin visited Frankfort, for the purpose of terminating the controversy as to the Lord's Supper, which had been so long agitated. He returned to Geneva much indisposed, but devoted his time to writing his "Commentary on the Psalms;" and to active, energetic, and successful exertions, through the medium of German ambassadors, on behalf of the Protestants at Paris, who, in that year, (1555,) were unjustly and inhumanly persecuted. At this time a sect called the Tritheists, headed by Gentilis, who believed that God consisted not merely of three distinct persons, but also of three distinct essences, was revived; and Calvin directed his attention to a refutation of the system. In the succeeding year, he proposed the establishment of a college at Geneva, for the education of youth; and in three years his wishes were accomplished, and himself was elected to the situation of professor of divinity, jointly with Claudius Pontus. This college afterwards became eminently useful, and was much distinguished for the learned and pious men who emanated from it. In the same and the following year, Calvin was presented with the freedom of the city of Geneva; reprinted his "Christian Institutes," as well in French as Latin; prepared for the press his "Commentary on Isaiah;" and combated, with success, a new heresy which had arisen, as to the mediatorial character of Christ. In 1561, Calvin was summoned before the Council of Geneva, at the desire of Charles IX., as being an enemy to France and her king. But, on examination, it appeared, that the only charge which could be established against him, was that of having sent Protestant missionaries to that kingdom. Soon afterwards, he published his "Commentary on Daniel;" and much interested himself on behalf of the Protestants in France, who were then persecuted by the Duke of Guise. In 1562, his health rapidly declined; and he was compelled to restrict his labours to Geneva and his study. But in this and the following year, he lectured on the doctrine of the Trinity; completed his "Commentaries on the Books of Moses and Joshua," and published his celebrated "Answers to the Deputies of the Synod of Lyons." In the year 1564 his health became gradually worse; but yet he insisted on performing as many of his duties as his strength would possibly allow. On the 24th of March he was present at the assembly. On the 27th he was carried into the council, and delivered, before the Seigneurs who were assembled, his farewell address; and on the 2nd of April he appeared at church, received from Beza the sacrament of the Lord's supper, and joined in the devotions of the great congregation. To the syndics, in the ensuing month, he delivered an able and affecting oration; and to the ministers of the town and country, assembled on an occasion in his room, he addressed a pathetic and admirable discourse. This was his last public labour. The remaining moments of his life were dedicated to acts of devotion, until May the 24th, at eight P. M., when he expired, aged 54.

As an expositor of the Scriptures, Calvin was sober, spiritual, penetrating. As a theologian, he stands in the very foremost rank of those of any age or country. His Institutes, composed in his youth, amidst a pressure of duties, and the rage and turbulence of the times, invincible against every species of assault, give him indisputably this preeminence. As a civilian, even though the law was a subject of subordinate attention, he had few equals among his contemporaries. In short, he exhibited, in strong and decided development, all those moral and intellectual qualities which marked him out for one who was competent to guide the opinions, and control the commotions, of inquiring and agitated nations. Through the most trying and hazardous period of the Reformation, he exhibited, invariably, a wisdom in counsel, a prudence of zeal, and at the same time, a decision and intrepidity of character, which were truly astonishing. Nothing could for a moment deter him from a faithful discharge of his duty; nothing detrude him from the path of rectitude. When the very foundations of the world seemed to be shaking, he stood erect and firm, the pillar of the truth. He took his stand between two of the most powerful kingdoms of the age, resisted and assailed alternately the whole force of the papal domination—maintained the cause of truth and of God against the intriguing Charles on the one hand, and the courtly and bigoted Francis on the other. The pen was his most effectual weapon; and this was beyond the restriction or refutation of his royal antagonists. Indeed, on the arena of theological controversy, he was absolutely unconquerable by any power or combination of powers, which his numerous opponents could bring against him. He not only refuted and repressed the various errors, which sprang up so abundantly in consequence of the commotion of the times, and which threatened to defeat all the efforts which were making for the moral illumination of the world; but the publication of the Institutes contributed, in a wonderful degree, to give unity of religious belief to the friends of the Reformation, and of course, to marshal the strength, and combine and give success to the efforts, of all contenders for the faith once delivered to the saints.

But space will not allow of any thing like a detail of the excellences of this illustrious reformer's character, or of the invaluable services which he has rendered to society. He was a great and good man. In the full import of the phrase, he may be styled a benefactor of the world. Most intensely and effectually too, did he labour for the highest temporal, and especially for the eternal interests of his fellow men. He evidently brought to the great enterprise of the age, a larger amount of moral and intellectual power than did any other of the reformers. Even the cautious Scaliger pronounces him the most exalted character that has appeared since the days of the apostles, and, at the age of twenty-two, the most learned man in Europe. And the immediate influence of his invincible mind is still deeply felt through the masterly productions of his pen, and will continue to be felt in the advancement of the pure interests of the church, until the complete triumph of her principles.

But notwithstanding the noble virtues of Calvin's character, and the imperishable benefits which he has conferred upon the world, perhaps there never has been a man whose name has been the object of so frequent and so gross slanderous imputations as his. Catholic and Protestant, infidel and believer, have often most cordially united in their endeavours to obscure the reputation of this illustrious man. Indeed, Calvin and Calvinism are sounds at which many stand agast with a species of consternation, as expressions which import something unutterably barbarous and horrible. And it often happens that those who are the warmest in their hatred of him, and most plentiful in their reproaches, have never read a single line of his writings, and know scarcely a fact of his life. Now why it is that Calvin has been singled out from the rest of the reformers, as a mark for the poisoned shaft of obloquy, is very strange, not to say altogether unaccountable. He was plainly in advance of his contemporaries in all those moral and intellectual qualities which conspire to form a lovely and dignified character. True, he had some of the harsh features, the irritable and impetuous temperament, and inflexible spirit of the times. Well for the world that he had! How could he have done the work assigned him, without some of these severe ingredients in his constitution? Where every thing around combined to crush him down, or thrust him from his course, how could he have stood erect and undaunted for the truth, without something unbending and invincible in his principles and feelings?

Calvin deserves the thanks, and not the curses, of posterity. He was ardently esteemed by all the good of his own time; and he has since been, is now, and will continue to be, esteemed, so long as high moral excellence, and the stern majesty of virtue shall, to any extent, be objects of human approbation.

His works first appeared in a collected form, at Geneva, in twelve vols. fol. 1578; they were reprinted at the same place in seven vols. fol. 1617; and in nine vols. fol. at Amsterdam, in 1671. This last is the best edition.—Vide Mackenzie's Life of Calvin; *Mosheim's Ecclesiast. CALVINISTS, those who embrace the doctrine and sentiments of Calvin.

The name of Calvinists seems to have been given at first to those who embraced not merely the doctrine, but the church government and discipline established at Geneva, and to distinguish them from the Lutherans. But since the meeting of the synod of Dort, the name has been chiefly applied to those who embrace his leading views of the Gospel, to distinguish them from the Arminians.

The leading principles taught by Calvin were the same as those of Augustine. The main doctrines, by which those who are called after his name are distinguished from the Arminians, are reduced to five articles: and which, from their being the principal points discussed at the synod of Dort, have since been denominated the five points. These are, predestination, particular redemption, total depravity, effectual calling, and the certain perseverance of the saints.

The following statement is taken principally from the writings of Calvin and the decisions at Dort, compressed in as few words as possible.

1. Calvinists maintain that God hath chosen a certain number of the fallen race of Adam in Christ, before the foundation of the world, unto eternal glory, according to his immutable purpose, and of his free grace and love, without the least foresight of faith, good works, or any conditions performed by the creature; and that the rest of mankind he was pleased to pass by, and ordain to dishonour and wrath, for their sins, to the praise of his vindictive justice.

In proof of this they allege, among many other Scripture passages, the following:—"According as he hath chosen us in him before the foundation of the world, that we should be holy, and without blame before him in love.—For he saith to Moses, I will have mercy on whom I will have mercy, and I will have compassion on whom I will have compassion. So, then, it is not of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth, but of God, that sheweth mercy. Thou wilt say, then, Why doth he yet find fault; for who hath resisted his will? Nay but, O man! who art thou that repliest against God? Shall the thing formed say to him that formed it, Why hast thou made me thus? Hath not the potter power over the clay, of the same lump to make one vessel unto honour and another unto dishonour?—Hath God cast away his people whom he foreknew? Wot ye not what the Scripture saith of Elias? Even so at this present time, also, there is a remnant according to the election of grace. And if by grace, then it is no more of works. What then? Israel hath not obtained that which he seeketh for, but the election hath obtained it, and the rest are blinded.—Whom he did predestinate, them he also called.—We give thanks to God always for you, brethren, beloved of the Lord, because God hath from the beginning chosen you to salvation, through sanctification of the Spirit and belief of the truth.—As many as were ordained to eternal life, believed." Eph. i. 4. Rom. ix. xi. 1—6; viii. 29, 30. 2 Thess. ii. 13. Acts xiii. 48. They think also that the greater part of these passages, being found in the epistolary writings, after the pouring out of the Holy Spirit, who was promised to guide the apostles into all truth, is an argument in favour of the doctrine.

They do not consider predestination, however, as affecting the agency or accountableness of creatures, or as being to them any rule of conduct. On the contrary, they suppose them to act as freely, and to be as much the proper subjects of calls, warnings, exhortations, promises, and threatenings, as if no decree existed. The connexion in which the doctrine is introduced by the divines at Dort, is to account for one sinner's believing and being saved rather than another; and such, the Calvinists say, is the connexion which it occupies in the Scriptures.

With respect to the conditional predestination admitted by the Arminians, they say that an election upon faith or good works foreseen, is not that of the Scriptures; for that election is there made the cause of faith and holiness, and cannot, for this reason, be the effect of them. With regard to predestination to death, they say, if the question be, Wherefore did God decree to punish those who are punished? the answer is, On account of their sins. But if it be, Wherefore did he decree to punish them rather than others? there is no other reason to be assigned, but that so it seemed good in his sight. Eph. i. 3, 4. John vi. 37. Rom. viii. 29, 30. Acts xiii. 48. 1 Pet. i. 1. Rom. ix. 15, 16; xi. 5, 6.

2. They maintain that though the death of Christ be a most perfect sacrifice, and satisfaction for sins, of infinite value, abundantly sufficient to expiate the sins of the whole world; and though on this ground the Gospel is to be preached to all mankind indiscriminately, yet it was the will of God that Christ, by the blood of the cross, should efficaciously redeem all those, and those only, who were from eternity elected to salvation, and given to him by the Father.

Calvin does not appear to have written on this subject as a controversy, but his comments on Scripture agree with the above statement. The following positions are contained in the resolutions of the synod of Dort, under this head of doctrine:—"The death of the Son of God is the only and most perfect sacrifice and satisfaction for sins, of infinite value and price, abundantly sufficient to expiate the sins of the whole world.—The promise of the Gospel is, that whosoever believeth in Christ crucified shall not perish, but have everlasting life; which promise, together with the command to repent and believe, ought promiscuously and indiscriminately to be published and proposed to all people and individuals, to whom God in his good pleasure sends the Gospel.—Whereas many who are called by the Gospel do not repent nor believe in Christ, but perish in unbelief; this proceeds not from any defect or insufficiency in the sacrifice of Christ offered on the cross, but from their own fault.—As many as truly believe, and are saved by the death of Christ from their sins, and from destruction, have to ascribe it to the mere favour of God, which he owes to no one, given them in Christ from eternity. For it was the most free counsel, and gracious will and intention of God the Father, that the quickening and saving efficacy of the most precious death of his Son should exert itself in all the elect, to give unto them only justifying faith, and by it to conduct them infallibly to salvation: that is, it was the will of God that Christ, by the blood of the cross, whereby he confirmed the new covenant, should efficaciously redeem out of every people, tribe, nation, and language, all those, and those only, who were from eternity elected to salvation, and given to him by the Father."

These positions they appear to have considered as not only a declaration of the truth, but an answer to the arguments of the Remonstrants.

In proof of the doctrine, they allege, among others, the following Scripture passages:—"Thou hast given him power over all flesh, that he should give eternal life to as many as thou hast given him.—The good shepherd giveth his life for the sheep.—I lay down my life for the sheep.—He died not for that nation only, but that he might gather together in one the children of God that are scattered abroad.—He gave himself for us, that he might redeem us from all iniquity, and purify unto himself a peculiar people, zealous of good works.—He loved the church, and gave himself for it, that he might sanctify and cleanse it, and present it to himself, &c.—And they sang a new song, saying, Thou art worthy; for thou wast slain, and hast redeemed us to God by thy blood, out of every kindred, and tongue, and people, and nation." John xvii. 2; x. 11, 15; xi. 52. Tit. ii. 14. Eph. v. 25–27. Rev. v. 9.

3. They maintain that mankind are totally depraved, in consequence of the fall of the first man, who, being their public head, his sin involved the corruption of all his posterity, and which corruption extends over the whole soul, and renders it unable to turn to God, or to do any thing truly good, and exposes it to his righteous displeasure, both in this world and in that which is to come.

The explanation of original sin, as given by Calvin, is as follows:—"Original sin seems to be the inheritable descending perverseness and corruption of our nature, poured abroad into all the parts of the soul, which first maketh us deserving of God's wrath, and then also bringeth forth those works in us called, in Scripture, the works of the flesh. These two things are distinctly to be noted, that is, that, being thus in all parts of our nature corrupted and perverted, we are now, even for such corruption only, holden worthy of damnation, and stand convicted before God, to whom nothing is acceptable but righteousness, innocence, and purity. And yet we are not bound in respect of another's fault; for, where it is said that by the sin of Adam we are made subject to the judgment of God, Rom. v. 18, it is not so to be taken, as if we, innocent and undeserving, did bear the blame of his fault; but as, in consequence of his offence, we are ultimately clothed with the curse, therefore it is said that he hath bound us. Nevertheless, from him not the punishment only came upon us, but also the infection distilled from him abideth in us, to the which the punishment is justly due."

The resolutions of the divines at Dort on this head, contain the following positions:—"Such as man was after the fall, such children did he beget—corruption, by the righteous judgment of God, being derived from Adam to his posterity—not by imitation, but by the propagation of a vicious nature. Wherefore, all men are conceived in sin, and are born the children of wrath, unfit for every good connected with salvation, prone to evil, dead in sins, and the servants of sin; and without the Holy Spirit regenerating them, they neither will nor can return to God, amend their depraved natures, nor dispose themselves for its amendment."

In proof of this doctrine, the Calvinists allege, among other Scripture passages, the following:—"By one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin; and so death passed upon all men, for that all have sinned.

—By one man's disobedience many were made sinners.—I was born in sin, and shapened in iniquity.—God saw that the wickedness of man was great upon the earth, and that every imagination of his heart was only evil continually.—God looked down from heaven upon the children of men, to see if there were any that did understand, that did seek God. Every one of them is gone back; they are altogether become filthy; there is none that doeth good, no not one.—And you hath he quickened, who were dead in trespasses and sins; wherein in time past ye walked according to the course of this world. Among whom also we all had our conversation in times past, in the lust of our flesh, fulfilling the desires of the flesh and of the mind; and were by nature the children of wrath, even as others." Rom. v. 12—19. Psal. li. 5. Gen. vi. 5. Psal. liii. 2, 3. Rom. iii. Eph. ii. 1—3.

4. They maintain that all whom God hath predestinated unto life, he is pleased, in his appointed time, effectually to call by his word and Spirit out of that state of sin and death in which they are by nature, to grace and salvation by Jesus Christ.

They admit that the Holy Spirit, as calling men by the ministry of the gospel, may be resisted; and that where this is the case, "the fault is not in the gospel, nor in Christ offered by the gospel, nor in God calling by the gospel, and also conferring various gifts upon them; but in the called themselves. They contend, however, that where men come at the divine call, and are converted, it is not to be ascribed to themselves, as though by their own free will they made themselves to differ, but merely to him who delivers them from the power of darkness, and translates them into the kingdom of his dear Son, and whose regenerating influence is certain and efficacious."

In proof of this doctrine, the Calvinists allege, among others, the following Scripture passages:—"Whom he did predestinate, them he also called; and whom he called, them he also glorified. That ye may know what is the exceeding greatness of his power to us-ward who believe, according to the working of his mighty power, which he wrought in Christ when he raised him from the dead.—Not of works, lest any man should boast. For we are his workmanship, created in Christ Jesus unto good works.—God, that commanded the light to shine out of darkness, hath shined into our hearts, &c.—I will take away the stony heart out of their flesh, and will give them hearts of flesh." Rom. viii. 29. Eph. i. 13, 20; ii. 9, 10. 2 Cor. iv. 6. Ezek. xxxvi. 26.

5. Lastly: They maintain that those whom God has effectually called, and sanctified by his Spirit, shall never finally fall from a state of grace. They admit that true believers may fall partially, and would fall totally and finally, but for the mercy and faithfulness of God, who keepeth the feet of his saints; also, that he who bestoweth the grace of perseverance, bestoweth it by means of reading and hearing the word, meditation, exhortations, threatenings, and promises; but that none of these things imply the possibility of a believer's falling from a state of justification.

In proof of this doctrine, they allege the following among other Scripture passages:—"I will put my fear in their hearts, and they shall not depart from me.—He that believeth, and is baptized, shall be saved.—The water that I shall give him shall be in him a well of water springing up into everlasting life.—This is the Father's will, that of all which he hath given me I should lose nothing.—This is life eternal, to know thee the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent.—Whosoever is born of God doth not commit sin, for his seed remaineth in him: and he cannot sin, because he is born of God. They went out from us, but they were not of us; for if they had been of us, they would have continued with us: but they went out, that they might be made manifest that they were not all of us.—Now unto him that is able to keep you from falling, and to present you faultless before the presence of his glory with exceeding joy, to the only wise God our Saviour, be glory and majesty, dominion and power, both now and ever. Amen." Jer. xxxii. 40. Mark xvi. 16; John iv. 14; vi. 40; xvii. 3; 1 John iii. 9; ii. 19. Jude 24, 25.

Such were the doctrines of the old Calvinists, and such in substance are those of the present times. In this, however, as in every other denomination, there are considerable shades of difference.

Some think Calvin, though right in the main, yet carried things too far; these are commonly known by the name of Moderate Calvinists. Others think he did not go far enough; and these are known by the name of High Calvinists.

It is proper to add, that the Calvinistic system includes in it the doctrine of three co-ordinate persons in the Godhead, in one nature; and of two natures in Jesus Christ, forming one person. Justification by faith alone, or justification by the imputed righteousness of Christ, forms also an essential part of this system. They suppose that, on the one hand, our sins are imputed to Christ, and on the other, that we are justified by the imputation of Christ's righteousness to us: that is, Christ, the innocent, was treated by God as if he were guilty, that we, the guilty, might, out of regard to what he did and suffered, be treated as if we were innocent and righteous.

Calvinism originally subsisted in its greatest purity in the city of Geneva; from which place it was first propagated into Germany, France, the United Provinces, and Britain. In France it was abolished by the revocation of the Edict of Nantz. It has been the prevailing religion in the United Provinces ever since 1571. The theological system of Calvin was adopted and made the public rule of faith in England, under the reign of Edward VI. The Church of Scotland also was modelled by John Knox, agreeably to the doctrine, rites, and form of ecclesiastical government established at Geneva. In England, Calvinism had been on the decline from the time of Queen Elizabeth until about sixty years ago, when it was again revived, and has been on the increase ever since. The major part of the clergy, indeed, are not Calvinists, though the articles of the Church of England are Calvinistical. It deserves to be remarked, however, that Calvinism is preached in a considerable number of the churches; only several of the evangelical clergy have adopted ultra and exclusive views on the subject; while it is also the distinguishing characteristic of the discourses delivered by all the congregational and Particular Baptist ministers; by those of Lady Huntingdon's connexion, and by the powerful body of Welsh Calvinistic Methodists. In Scotland its principles are commonly taught in the establishment, and with scarcely any exception among dissenters.

Calvin considered every church as a separate and independent body, invested with the power of legislation for itself. He proposed that it should be governed by presbyteries and synods, composed of clergy and laity, without bishops, or any clerical subordination; and maintained that the province of the civil magistrate extended only to its protection and outward accommodation. He acknowledged a real, though spiritual, presence of Christ in the eucharist; and he confined the privilege of communion to pious and regenerate believers. These sentiments, however, are not imbibed by all who are called Calvinists.

CAMALDOLITES, an order founded by St. Romuald, an Italian fanatic, in the eleventh century. The manner of life he enjoined his disciples to observe was this:—They dwelt in separate cells, and met together only at the time of prayer. Some of them, during the two lents in the year, observed an inviolable silence, and others for the space of a hundred days. On Sundays and Thursdays, they fed on herbs, and the rest of the week only on bread and water.

CAMBRIDGE MANUSCRIPT, a copy of the Gospels and Acts of the Apostles, in Greek and Latin. Beza found it in the monastery of Irenæus, at Lyons, in 1562, and gave it to the university of Cambridge in 1582. It is a quarto, and written on vellum; sixty-six leaves of it are much torn and mutilated; and ten of these are supplied by a later transcriber. It is written in the Scriptio continua, and the Greek is in uncial characters. From this and the Clermont copy of St. Paul's epistles, Beza published his larger annotations in 1582.—See Dr. Kipling's edition of it.

CAMERONIANS, a sect in Scotland, who separated from the Established Church in 1666, and continued long to hold their religious assemblies in the fields. They took their name from Richard Cameron, a famous field preacher, who, refusing to accept the indulgence to tender consciences, granted by king Charles II., thinking such an acceptance an acknowledgment of the king's supremacy, made a defection from his brethren, and even headed a rebellion, in which he was killed. The Cameronians adhere rigidly to the Presbyterian form of church government established in 1648. There are not, it is said, above fourteen or fifteen congregations among them, and these not large.

CAMERONIANS, or CAMERONITES, the denomination of a party of Calvinists in France, who asserted that the will of man is only determined by the practical judgment of the mind; that the cause of men's doing good or evil proceeds from the knowledge which God infuses into them; and that God does not move the will physically, but only morally, in virtue of its dependence on the judgment. They had this name from John Cameron, who was born at Glasgow in 1580, and who was professor there, and afterwards at Bourdeaux, Sedan, and Saumur. The synod of Dort was severe upon them; yet it seems the only difference was this:—The synod had defined, that God not only illuminates the understanding, but gives motion to the will by making an internal change therein. Cameron only admitted the illumination whereby the mind is morally moved; and explained the sentiment of the synod of Dort so as to make the two opinions consistent.

CAMP-MEETINGS, religious festivals held among the Methodists in some parts of England, and the United States of America, and also among the Presbyterians in the back settlements of the latter country. In Kentucky, and some adjacent parts, not fewer than fifteen or twenty thousand people assemble on such occasions. They come in wagons or on horseback from distant districts, bring provisions with them, and erecting booths under the dense shade of forests, they devote a whole week to the religious exercises of the period. They have prayer meetings, &c. in separate tents, or in groups in the open air, morning and evening, and four sermons daily, two in the earlier and two in the latter part of the day, while the festival lasts. The great day is the sabbath, when the vast population of the more immediate neighbourhood assemble and swell the numbers, and the ordinance of the Lord's Supper is administered. According to the testimony of those who have been present, nothing can exceed the effect produced by the evening scene, when the otherwise impenetrable gloom of the woods is lighted up into one blaze by the numerous fires which are kindled and kept burning; and the sound of so many thousands of voices, causing the immense groves to re-echo the praises of the Most High. The general order and propriety which prevail on such occasions, evince the deep hold which religion has on the minds of those who thus meet for the purposes of spiritual edification and improvement.

CANON. The word Κανών had long been in use among the early ecclesiastical writers, and in very general acceptance, before it was transferred to a collection of Holy Scriptures. It meant no more, generally, than a "book," and a "catalogue;" but in particular—1. A "catalogue of things that belong to the church;" or, a "book that serves for the use of the church." Hence a collection of hymns which were to be sung on festivals, as also a list, in which were introduced the names of persons belonging to the church, acquired the name of Κανών. The word was used in a sense yet more limited; of, 2. A "publicly approved catalogue of all the books that might be read in public assemblies of Christians, for instruction and edification." Finally, but not until very recent times, it has comprised immediately, 3. A "collection of divine and inspired writings." The last signification most modern scholars have adopted. They use, therefore, canonical and inspired, (κανονικός and θεόπνευστος;) as perfectly synonymous.

I. CANON OF THE OLD TESTAMENT.

Soon after the return of the Jews from the Babylonian captivity, a collection was prepared of all writings of the Hebrews then extant, which, on account of their antiquity, contents, authors, and the claims of divine inspiration which they possessed, became revered and holy in the view of all the members of the new government. In the temple was repositied a sacred library of these writings, which for a considerable time before Christ—the particular year is unknown—ceased to be further enlarged.

After the period when this collection was made, there arose among the Jews, authors of a different kind, historians, philosophers, poets, and theological romancers. Now they had books, very unlike in value, and of various ages. The earlier were held, as productions of prophets, to be holy; the later were not, because they were composed in times when there was no longer an uninterrupted prophetic succession. The ancient were preserved in the temple; the modern were not. The ancient were introduced into a public collection; the modern into none whatever, at least into none of a public nature. And if the Alexandrian Christians had not been such great admirers of them, if they had not added them to the manuscripts of the Septuagint—in the original, if composed in the Greek language; and in a Greek translation, if the autograph was Hebrew—who knows whether we might have a single page remaining of all the modern Jewish writers?

At a late period, a long time since the birth of Christ, these two kinds of writings have been distinguished by appropriate names, derived chiefly from the use which was made of the writings. The earlier were called CANONICAL, the more recent, APOCRYPHAL, Books. And the whole collection of the former was comprehended under the appellation of CANON OF THE OLD TESTAMENT.

It has been pretty generally agreed, that the forming of the present Canon of the Old Testament should be attributed to Ezra. To assist him in this work, the Jewish writers inform us, that there existed in his time a great synagogue, consisting of one hundred and twenty men, including Daniel and his three friends, Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego: the prophets Haggai and Zechariah; and also Simon the Just. But it is very absurd to suppose that all these lived at one time, and formed one synagogue, as they are pleased to represent it; for from the time of Daniel to that of Simon the Just, no less than two hundred and fifty years must have intervened.

It is, however, by no means improbable that Ezra was assisted in this great work by many learned and pious men who were contemporary with him: and as prophets had always been the superintendents, as well as writers of the sacred volume, it is likely that the inspired men who lived at the same time as Ezra would give attention to this work. But in regard to this great synagogue, the only thing probable is, that the men who are said to have belonged to it did not live in one age, but successively, until the time of Simon the Just, who was made high-priest about twenty-five years after the death of Alexander the Great. This opinion has its probability increased by the consideration, that the Canon of the Old Testament appears not to have been fully completed until about the time of Simon the Just. Malachi seems to have lived after the time of Ezra, and therefore his prophecy could not have been added to the Canon by this eminent scribe, unless we adopt the opinion of the Jews, who will have Malachi to be no other than Ezra himself; maintaining, that while Ezra was his proper name, he received that of Malachi from the circumstance of his having been sent to superintend the religious concerns of the Jews, for the import of that name is a messenger, or one sent.

But this is not all. In the book of Nehemiah mention is made of the high-priest Jaddua, and of Darius Codomanus, king of Persia, both of whom lived at least a hundred years after the time of Ezra. In the third chapter of the first book of Chronicles, the genealogy of the sons of Zerubbabel is carried down, at least, to the time of Alexander the Great. This book, therefore, could not have been put into the Canon by Ezra; nor much earlier than the time of Simon the Just. The book of Esther, also, was probably added during this interval.

The probable conclusion, therefore, is, that Ezra began this work, and collected and arranged all the sacred books which belonged to the Canon before his time, and that a succession of pious and learned men continued to pay attention to the Canon, until the whole was completed, about the time of Simon the Just; after which, nothing was ever added to the Canon of the Old Testament.

Most, however, are of opinion, that nothing was added after the book of Malachi was written, except a few names and notes; and that all the books belonging to the Canon of the Old Testament were collected and inserted in the sacred volume by Ezra himself. And this opinion seems to be the safest, and is by no means incredible in itself. It accords, also, with the uniform tradition of the Jews, that Ezra completed the Canon of the Old Testament; and that after Malachi there arose no prophet who added any thing to the sacred volume.

Whether the books were now collected into a single volume, or were bound up in several codices, is a question of no importance; if we can ascertain what books were received as canonical, it matters not in what form they were preserved. It seems, probable, however, that the sacred books were at this time distributed into three volumes,—the law, the prophets, and the hagiographa. This division we know to be as ancient as the time of our Saviour, for he says, "These are the words which I spake unto you, while I was yet with you, that all things might be fulfilled, which are written in the law, and in the prophets, and in the psalms, concerning me." Luke xxiv. 44. Josephus, also, makes mention of this division, and it is by the Jews, with one consent, referred to Ezra as its author.

In establishing the Canon of the Old Testament, we might labour under considerable uncertainty and embarrassment, in regard to several books, were it not that the whole of what are called the Scriptures, and which are included in the threefold division mentioned above, received the explicit sanction of our Lord. He was not backward to reprove the Jews for disobeying, misinterpreting, and adding their traditions to the Scriptures; but he never drops a hint that they had been unfaithful, or careless, in the preservation of the sacred books. So far from this, he refers to the Scriptures as an infallible rule, which "must be fulfilled," and "could not be broken."

We have, therefore, an important point established with the utmost certainty, that the volume of Scripture which existed in the time of Christ and his apostles, was uncorrupted, and was esteemed by them as an inspired and infallible rule. Now, if we can ascertain what books were then included in the sacred volume, we shall be able to settle the Canon of the Old Testament without uncertainty.

To do this, it is necessary to resort to other sources of information; and happily the Jewish historian, Josephus, furnishes us with the very information which we want; not, indeed, as explicitly as we could wish, but sufficiently so to lead us to a very satisfactory conclusion. He does not name the books of the Old Testament, but he numbers them, and so describes them, that there is scarcely room for any mistake. The important passage to which we refer, is in his first book against Apion. "We have," says he, "only two-and-twenty books which are to be believed as of Divine authority, of which five are the books of Moses. From the death of Moses to the reign of Artaxerxes, king of Persia, the prophets, who were the successors of Moses, have written in thirteen books. The remaining four books contain hymns to God, and documents of life for the use of men." Now, the five books of Moses are universally agreed to be Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, and Deuteronomy. The thirteen books written by the prophets will include Joshua, Judges, with Ruth, Samuel, Kings, Isaiah, Jeremiah, with Lamentations, Ezekiel, Daniel; the twelve minor prophets, Job, Ezra, Esther, and Chronicles. The four remaining books will be Psalms, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and the Song of Solomon, which makes the whole number twenty-two; the canon then existing is proved to be the same as that which we now possess. It would appear, indeed, that these books might more conveniently be reckoned twenty-four, and this is the present method of numbering them by the modern Jews; but formerly the number was regulated by that of the Hebrew alphabet, which consists of twenty-two letters; therefore they annexed the small book of Ruth to Judges, and probably it is a continuation of this book by the same author. They added, also, the Lamentations of Jeremiah to his prophecy, and this was natural enough. As to the minor prophets, which form twelve separate books in our Bibles, they were anciently always reckoned one book; so they are considered in all ancient catalogues, and in every quotation from them.

But we are able also to adduce other testimony to prove the same thing. Some of the early Christian fathers, who had been brought up in paganism, when they embraced Christianity were curious in their inquiries into the canon of the Old Testament, and the result of the researches of some of them still remain. Melito, bishop of Sardis, travelled into Judea for the very purpose of satisfying himself on this point. And although his own writings are lost, Eusebius has preserved his catalogue of the books of the Old Testament, from which it appears that the very same books were, in his day, received into the canon, as are now found in our Hebrew Bibles. And the interval between Melito and Josephus is not a hundred years, so that no alteration in the canon can be reasonably supposed to have taken place in this period. Very soon after Melito, Origen furnishes us with a catalogue of the books of the Old Testament, which perfectly accords with our canon, except that he omits the minor prophets; which omission must have been a mere slip of the pen in him or his copyist, as it is certain that he received this as a book of Holy Scripture; and the number of the books of the Old Testament, given by him in this very place, cannot be completed without reckoning the twelve minor prophets as one.

After Origen, we have catalogues, in succession, not only by men of the first authority in the church, but by councils, consisting of numerous bishops, all which are perfectly the same as our own. It will be sufficient merely to refer to these sources of information. Catalogues of the books of the Old Testament have been given by Athanasius, by Cyril, by Augustine, by Jerome, by Rufin, by the Council of Laodicea, in their LX. canon, and by the Council of Carthage. There is also a catalogue in the Talmud, which perfectly corresponds with ours. And when it is considered that all these catalogues exactly correspond with our present canon of the Hebrew Bible, the evidence must appear complete to every impartial mind, that the canon of the Old Testament is settled upon the clearest historical grounds. There seems to be nothing to be wished for further in confirmation of this point.

II.—CANON OF THE NEW TESTAMENT.

Many persons who write and speak on the subject of the New Testament Canon, appear to entertain a wrong impression in regard to it; as if the books of the New Testament could not be of authority until they were sanctioned by some ecclesiastical council, or by some publicly expressed opinion of the fathers of the church; and as if any portion of their authority depended on their being collected into one volume. But the truth is, that every one of these books was of authority, as far as known, from the moment of its publication; and its right to a place in the canon is not derived from the sanction of any church or council, but from the fact that it was written by inspiration. And the appeal to testimony is not to prove that any council of bishops, or others, gave sanction to the book, but to show that it is indeed the genuine work of Matthew, or John, or Peter, or Paul, whom we know to have been inspired.

The books of the New Testament were, therefore, of full authority before they were collected into one volume; and it would have made no difference if they had never been included in one volume, but had retained that separate form in which they were first published. And it is by no means certain that these books were, at a very early period, bound in one volume. As far as we have any testimony on the subject, the probability is, that it was more customary to include them in two volumes, one of which was called the GOSPEL, and the other the APOSTLES. Some of the oldest MSS. of the New Testament extant, appear to have been put up in this form; and the fathers often refer to the Scriptures of the New Testament under these two titles. The question—when was the canon constituted?—admits, therefore, of no other proper answer than this, that as soon as the last book of the New Testament was written and published, the canon was completed. But if the question relates to the time when these books were collected and published in a single volume, or in two volumes, it admits of no definite answer; for those churches which were situated nearest to the place where any particular books were published, would, of course, obtain copies much earlier than churches in a remote part of the world. For a considerable period, the collection of these books in each church must have been necessarily incomplete; for it would take some time to send to the church or people with whom the autographs were deposited, and to write off fair copies. This necessary process will also account for the fact, that some of the smaller books were not received by the churches so early nor so universally as the larger. The solicitude of the churches to possess immediately the more extensive books of the New Testament, would doubtless induce them to make a great exertion to acquire copies; but probably the smaller would not be so much spoken of, nor would there be so strong a desire to obtain them without delay. Considering how difficult it is now, with all our improvements in the typographical art, to multiply copies of the Scriptures with sufficient rapidity, it is truly wonderful how so many churches as were founded during the first century, to say nothing of individuals, could all be supplied with copies of the New Testament, when there was no speedier method of producing them, than by writing every letter with the pen! The pen of a ready writer must then, indeed, have been of immense value. The idea entertained by some, especially by Doddwell, that these books lay for a long time locked up in the coffers of the churches to which they were addressed, and totally unknown to the rest of the world, is in itself most improbable, and is repugnant to all the testimony which exists on the subject. Even as early as the time when Peter wrote his second epistle, the writings of Paul were in the hands of the churches, and were classed with the other Scriptures. 2 Peter iii. 14, 15. And the citation from these books, by the earliest Christian writers, living in different countries, demonstrates that from the time of their publication, they were sought after with avidity, and were widely dispersed. How intense the interest which the first Christians felt in the writings of the apostles, can scarcely be conceived by us, who have been familiar with these books from our earliest years. How solicitous would they be, for example, who had never seen Paul, but had heard of his wonderful conversion, and extraordinary labours and gifts, to read his writings? And probably they who had enjoyed the high privilege of hearing this apostle preach, would not be less desirous of reading his Epistles! As we know, from the nature of the case, as well as from testimony, that many uncertain accounts of Christ's discourses and miracles had obtained circulation, how greatly would the primitive Christians rejoice to obtain an authentic history, from the pen of an apostle, or from one who wrote precisely what was dictated by an apostle? We need no longer wonder, therefore, that every church should wish to possess a collection of the writings of the apostles; and knowing them to be the productions of inspired men, they would want no farther sanction to their authority. All that was requisite was to be certain that the book was indeed written by the apostle whose name it bore. Hence some things in Paul's Epistles, which seem to common readers to be of no importance, are of the utmost consequence. Such as,—I, Tertius, who wrote this Epistle, &c. The salutation with mine own hand. So I write in every Epistle. Ye see how large a letter I have written unto you with mine own hand. The salutation by the hand of me, Paul. The salutation of Paul with mine own hand, which is the token in every Epistle. This apostle commonly employed an amanuensis; but that the churches to which he wrote might have the assurance of the genuineness of his Epistles, from seeing his own handwriting, he constantly wrote the SALUTATION himself. So much care was taken to have these sacred writings well authenticated on their first publication. And on the same account it was that he and the other apostles were so particular in giving the names and the characters of those who were the bearers of their Epistles. And it seems that they were always committed to the care of men of high estimation in the church; and commonly more than one appears to have been intrusted with this important commission.

If it be inquired, what became of the autographs of these sacred books, and why they were not preserved, since this would have prevented all uncertainty respecting the true reading, and would have relieved the biblical critic from a large share of labour? it is sufficient to answer, that nothing different has occurred, in relation to these autographs, from that which has happened to all other ancient writings. No man can produce the autograph of any book as old as the New Testament, unless it has been preserved in some extraordinary way, as in the case of the manuscripts of Herculaneum; neither could it be supposed, that in the midst of such vicissitudes, revolutions, and persecutions, as the Christian church endured, this object could have been secured by any thing short of a miracle. And God knew, by a superintending providence over the sacred Scriptures, they could be transmitted with sufficient accuracy, by means of apographs, to the most distant generations. Indeed, there is reason to believe that the Christians of early times were so absorbed and impressed with the glory of the truths revealed, that they gave themselves little concern about the mere vehicle by which they were communicated. They had matters of such deep interest, and so novel, before their eyes, that they had neither time nor inclination for the minutiae of criticism. It may be, therefore, that they did not set so high a value on the possession of the autograph of an inspired book as we should, but considered a copy, made with scrupulous fidelity, as equally valuable with the original. And God may have suffered these autographs of the sacred writings to perish, lest, in process of time, they should have become idolized, like the brazen serpent; or lest men should be led superstitiously to venerate the mere parchment, and ink, and form, and letters, employed by an apostle. Certainly, the history of the church is such as to render such an idea far from being improbable.

The slightest attention to the works of the fathers will convince any one that the writings of the apostles were held, from the beginning, in the highest estimation: that great pains were taken to distinguish the genuine productions of these inspired men from all other books; that they were sought out with uncommon diligence, and read with profound attention and veneration, not only in private, but publicly in the churches; and that they are cited and referred to universally as decisive on every point of doctrine, and as authoritative standards for the regulation of faith and practice.

This being the state of the case when the books of the New Testament were communicated to the churches, we are enabled, in regard to most of them, to produce testimony of the most satisfactory kind, that they were admitted into the Canon, and received as inspired, by the universal consent of Christians in every part of the world. And as to those few books, concerning which some persons entertain doubts, it can be shown, that, as soon as their claims were fully and impartially investigated, they also were received with universal consent. And that other books, however excellent as human compositions, were never put upon a level with the canonical books of the New Testament; that spurious writings, under the names of the apostles, were promptly and decisively rejected, and that the churches were repeatedly warned against such apocryphal books.

I. Catalogues.—Here, as in the case of the Old Testament, we find that, at a very early period, catalogues of these books were published, by most of the distinguished fathers whose writings have come down to us; the same has been done, also, by several councils, whose decrees are still extant.

These catalogues are for the most part, perfectly harmonious. In a few of them, some books now in the Canon are omitted, for which omission a satisfactory reason can commonly be assigned.

The first regular catalogue of the books of the New Testament, which we find on record, is by Origen, who lived about one hundred years after the death of the apostle John, and whose extensive biblical knowledge highly qualified him to judge correctly in this case.

In this catalogue, he mentions, "The Four Gospels, the Acts of the Apostles, Fourteen Epistles of Paul, Two of Peter, Three of John," and "The Book of Revelation." This enumeration includes all the present Canon, except the Epistles of James and Jude, but these were omitted by accident, not design; for in other parts of his writings, he acknowledges these Epistles as a part of the Canon. And while Origen furnishes us with so full a catalogue of the books now in the Canon, he inserts no others, which proves that in his time the Canon was well settled among the learned; and that the distinction between inspired writings and human compositions was as clearly marked as at any subsequent period.

2. The next catalogue of the books of the New Testament, (to which I will refer,) is that of Eusebius, the learned historian of the church; to whose diligence and fidelity, in collecting ecclesiastical facts, we are more indebted than to the labours of all other men, for that period which intervened between the days of the apostles and his own times. Eusebius may be considered as giving his testimony about one hundred years after Origen. His catalogue may be seen in his Ecclesiastical History.—Eusebius, Ecc. Hist. l. iii. c. 25, compared with c. 3. In it he enumerates every book which we now have in the Canon, and no others; but he mentions that the Epistle of James, the Second of Peter, and Second and Third of John, were doubted by some; and that Revelation was rejected by some, and received by others; but Eusebius himself declares it to be his opinion that it should be received without doubt.

There is no single witness among the whole number of ecclesiastical writers, who was more competent to give accurate information on this subject than Eusebius. He had spent a great part of his life in searching into the antiquities of the Christian church; and he had an intimate acquaintance with all the records relating to ecclesiastical affairs, many of which are now lost; and almost the only information which we have of them has been transmitted to us by this diligent compiler.

3. Athanasius, so well known for his writings and his sufferings in defence of the divinity of our Saviour, in his Festal Epistle, and in his Synopsis of Scripture, has left a catalogue of the books of the New Testament, which perfectly agrees with the Canon now in use.

4. Cyril, in his Catechetical work, has also given us a catalogue, perfectly agreeing with ours, except that he omits the book of Revelation. Why that book was so often left out of the ancient catalogues and collections of the Scriptures, shall be mentioned hereafter. Athanasius and Cyril were contemporary with Eusebius; the latter, however, may more properly be considered as twenty or thirty years later.

5. Then, a little after the middle of the fourth century, we have the testimony of all the bishops assembled in the Council of Laodicea. The catalogue of this council is contained in the sixth Canon, and is exactly the same as ours, except that the book of Revelation is omitted. The decrees of this council were in a short time received into the Canons of the universal church; and among the rest, this catalogue of the books of the New Testament. Thus we find that as early as the middle of the fourth century, there was a universal consent, in all parts of the world to which the Christian church extended, as to the books which constituted the Canon of the New Testament, with the single exception of the book of Revelation; and that this book was also generally admitted to be canonical, we shall take the opportunity of proving in the sequel of this work.

6. But a few years elapsed from the meeting of this council, before Epiphanius, bishop of Salamis, in the island of Cyprus, published his work On Heresies, in which he gives a catalogue of the Canonical books of the New Testament, which in every respect, is the same as the Canon now received.

7. About the same time, Gregory Nazianzen, bishop of Constantinople, in a poem, "On the True and Genuine Scriptures," mentions distinctly all the books now received, except Revelation.

8. A few years later, we have a list of the books of the New Testament in a work of Philastrius, bishop of Brixia, in Italy, which corresponds, in all respects, with those now received, except that he mentions no more than thirteen of Paul's Epistles. If the omission was designed, it probably relates to the Epistle to the Hebrews.

9. At the same time lived Jerome, who translated the whole Bible into Latin. He furnishes us with a catalogue answering to our present Canon in all respects. He does, however, speak doubtfully about the Epistle to the Hebrews, on account of the uncertainty of its author. But in other parts of his writings, he shows that he received this book as Canonical, as well as the rest.—Epist. ad Paulinum.

10. The catalogue of Rufin varies in nothing from the Canon now received.—Expos. in Symbol. Apost.

11. Augustine, in his work on "Christian Doctrine," has inserted the names of the books of the New Testament, which in all respects are the same as ours.

12. The council of Carthage, at which Augustine was present, have furnished a catalogue, which perfectly agrees with ours. At this council, forty-four bishops attended. The list referred to is found in their forty-eighth Canon.

12. The unknown author, who goes under the name of Dionysius the Areopagite, so describes the books of the New Testament as to show that he received the very same as are now in the Canon.

II. Another satisfactory source of evidence in favour of the Canon of the New Testament, as now received, is the fact that these books, and these books alone were quoted as Sacred Scripture, by all the fathers, living in parts of the world the most remote from each other. The truth of this assertion will fully appear when we come to speak particularly of the books which compose the Canon. Now, how can it be accounted for, that these books, and these alone, should be cited as authority in Asia, Africa, and Europe? No other reason can be assigned, than one of these two,—either, they knew no other books which claimed to be Canonical; or, if they did, they did not esteem them of equal authority with those which they cited. On either of these grounds the conclusion is the same,—THAT THE BOOKS QUOTED AS SCRIPTURE ARE ALONE THE CANONICAL BOOKS. To apply this rule to a particular case.—The First Epistle of Peter is Canonical, because it is continually cited by the most ancient Christian writers in every part of the world; but the book called The Revelation of Peter is Apocryphal, because none of the early fathers have taken any testimonies from it. The same is true of the Acts of Peter, and The Gospel of Peter. These writings were totally unknown to the primitive church, and are therefore spurious. This argument is perfectly conclusive, and its force was perceived by the ancient defenders of the Canon of the New Testament. Eusebius repeatedly has recourse to it; and, therefore, those persons who have aimed to unsettle our present Canon, as Toland and Dodwell, have attempted to prove that the early Christian writers were in the habit of quoting indifferently, and promiscuously, the books which we now receive, and others which are now rejected as Apocryphal. But this is not correct, as has been shown by Nye, Richardson, and others. The true method of determining this matter is by a careful examination of all the passages in the writings of the fathers, where other books besides those now in the Canon have been quoted. Some progress was made in collecting the passages in the writings of the fathers, in which any reference is made to the Apocryphal books, by the learned Jeremiah Jones, in his "New Method of Settling the Canon of the New Testament," but the work was left incomplete. This author, however, positively denies that it is common for the fathers to cite these books as Scripture, and asserts that there are only a very few instances in which any of them seem to have fallen into this mistake.

III. A third proof of the genuineness of the Canon of the New Testament may be derived from the fact, that these books were publicly read as Scripture in all the Christian churches.

IV. A fourth argument, to prove that our Canon of the New Testament is substantially correct, may be derived from the early versions of this sacred book into other languages.

Although the Greek language was extensively known through the Roman empire when the apostles wrote, yet the Christian church was in a short time extended into regions where the common people, at least, were not acquainted with it, nor with any language except their own vernacular tongue. While the gift of tongues continued, the difficulty of making known the Gospel to such people would, in some measure, be obviated; but when these miraculous powers ceased, the necessity of a version of the Gospels and Epistles into the language of the people would become manifest. As far, therefore, as we may be permitted to reason from the nature of the case, and the necessities of the churches, it is exceedingly probable that versions of the New Testament were made shortly after the death of the apostles, if they were not begun before. Can we suppose that the numerous Christians in Syria, Mesopotamia, and the various parts of Italy, would be long left without having these precious books translated into a language which all the people could understand? But we are not left to our own reasonings on this subject. We know that at a very early period there existed Latin versions of the New Testament, which had been so long in use before the time of Jerome, as to have become considerably corrupt, on which account he undertook a new version, which soon superseded those that were more ancient. Now, although nothing remains of these ancient Latin versions, but uncertain fragments, yet we have good evidence that they contained the same books as were inserted in Jerome's version, now denominated the Vulgate.

But perhaps the old Syriac version of the New Testament, called Peshito, furnishes the strongest proof of the Canonical authority of all the books which are contained in it. This excellent version has a very high claim to antiquity; and in the opinion of some of the best Syriac scholars, who have profoundly examined this subject, was made before the close of the first century.

The arguments for so early an origin are not, indeed, conclusive, but they possess much probability, whether we consider the external or internal evidence. The Syrian Christians have always insisted that this version was made by the apostle Thaddæus; but without admitting this claim, which would put it on a level with the Greek original, we may believe that it ought not to be brought down lower than the second century. It is universally received by all the numerous sects of Syrian Christians, and must be anterior to the existence of the oldest of them. Manes, who lived in the second century, probably had read the New Testament in the Syriac, which was his native tongue; and Justin Martyr, when he testifies that the Scriptures of the New Testament were read in the assemblies of Christians on every Sunday, probably refers to Syrian Christians, as Syria was his native place, where also he had his usual residence. And Michaelis is of opinion that Melito, who wrote about A.D. 170, has expressly declared that a Syrian version of the Bible existed in his time. Jerome also testifies explicitly that, when he wrote, the Syriac Bible was publicly read in the churches; for, says he, "Ephrem the Syrian is held in such veneration, that his writings are read in several churches immediately after the Lessons from the Bible." It is also well known that the Armenian version, which itself is ancient, was made from the Syriac.

On the general evidence of the genuineness of our Canon, I would subjoin the following remarks:—

1. The agreement among those who have given catalogues of the books of the New Testament, from the earliest times, is almost complete. Of thirteen catalogues to which we have referred, seven contain exactly the same books as are now in the Canon. Three of the others differ in nothing but the omission of the book of Revelation, for which they had a particular reason, consistent with their belief of its Canonical authority; and in two of the remaining catalogues, it can be proved that the books omitted, or represented as doubtful, were received as authentic by the persons who have given the catalogues. It may be asserted, therefore, that the consent of the ancient church, as to what books belonged to the Canon of the New Testament, was complete. The sacred volume was as accurately formed, and as clearly distinguished from other books, in the third, fourth, and fifth centuries, as it has ever been since.

2. Let it be considered, moreover, that the earliest of these catalogues was given by Origen, who lived within a hundred years of the death of the apostle John, and who, by his reading, travels, and long residence in Palestine, had a full knowledge of all the transactions and writings of the church, until his own time. In connexion with this, let it be remembered that these catalogues were drawn up by the most learned, pious, and distinguished men in the church, or by councils; and that the persons furnishing them resided in different and remote parts of the world; as, for example, in Jerusalem, Cæsarea, Carthage and Hippo, in Africa, Constantinople, Cyprus, Alexandria in Egypt, Italy, and Asia Minor. Thus it appears that the Canon was early agreed upon, and that it was every where the same; therefore we find the fathers, in all their writings, appealing to the same Scriptures; and none are charged with rejecting any Canonical book, except heretics.

3. It appears, from the testimony adduced, that it was never considered necessary that any council or bishop should give sanction to these books, in any other way than as witnesses, testifying to the churches that these were indeed the genuine writings of the apostles. These books, therefore, were never considered as deriving their authority from the church, or from councils, but were of complete authority as soon as published; and were delivered to the churches to be a guide and standard in all things relating to faith and practice. The fathers would have considered it impious for any bishop or council to pretend to add any thing to the authority of inspired books, or to claim the right to add other books to those handed down from the apostles. The church is founded on the apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ being the chief corner-stone; but the sacred Scriptures are not dependent for their authority on any set of men who lived since they were written.

4. We may remark, in the last place, the benignant providence of God towards his church, in causing these precious books to be written, and in watching over their preservation in the midst of dangers and persecutions; so that, notwithstanding the malignant designs of the enemies of the church, they have all come down to us un mutilated, in the original tongue in which they were penned by the apostles.

Our liveliest gratitude is due to the great Head of the church for this divine treasure, from which we are permitted freely to draw whatever is needful for our instruction and consolation. And it is our duty to prize this precious gift of divine revelation above all price. On the law of the Lord we should meditate day and night. It is a perfect rule; it shines with a clear light; it exercises a salutary influence on the heart; it warns us when we are in danger; reclaims us when we go astray; and comforts us when in affliction. The word of the Lord is "more to be desired than gold, yea, than much fine gold, sweeter also than honey, and the honey-comb." They who are destitute of this inestimable volume call for our tenderest compassion, and our exertions in circulating the Bible should never be remitted until all are supplied with this divine treasure; but they who possess this sacred volume, and yet neglect to study it, are still more to be pitied, for they are perishing in the midst of plenty. In the midst of light they walk in darkness. God has sent to them the word of life, but they have lightly esteemed the rich gift of his love. Oh that their eyes were opened, that they might behold wondrous things in the law of the Lord!—Ps. cxix. 18. Alexander on the Canon. See also Cosin's Scholastical History of the Canon; Du Pin's Complete History of the Canon and Writers of the Old and New Testament; *Jer. CANONS, ECCLESIASTICAL, statutes or rules fixed by councils, and possessing the force of ecclesiastical law. From the time of Constantine the Great, the first Christian emperor, many councils were held, and canons or laws drawn up, for the government of the church; they were collected into three volumes by Ivo, bishop of Chartres, in France, about the fourteenth year of our King Henry I., and are called the Decrees; they were corrected about thirty-five years afterwards by Gratian, a Benedictine monk, and are now the most ancient volumes of the ecclesiastical law. They were published in England in the reign of King Stephen.

The next in order of time were the Decretals; they were letters of the Popes, for the determination of some controversy; and of these there are likewise three volumes. They laid an obligation on the laity as well as the clergy. The first volume of these decretals was compiled by Raimund Barcinus, chaplain to Pope Gregory IX., and published about the fourteenth year of our King Henry III. It was appointed to be read in all schools, and admitted as law in all the ecclesiastical courts of England. About sixty years afterwards, Simon, a monk of Walden, read these laws in the University of Cambridge, and the next year in that of Oxford. The second volume was collected and methodized by Pope Boniface VIII., and published about the twenty-seventh year of our King Edward I. The third volume was collected by Pope Clement V., and published in the council of Vienna, and likewise in England, in the second year of Edward II.; they took, from that Pope, the name of Clementine. These decretals were never received here, nor any where but in the Pope's dominions. John Andreas, a famous canonist in the fourteenth century, wrote a commentary on these decretals, which he entitled "Novellæ," from a very beautiful daughter he had, named Novella, whom he bred a scholar. But these foreign canons, even when the papal authority was at the highest in England, were of no force where they were found to contradict the prerogative of the king or the laws of the land.

The ecclesiastical jurisdiction of the See of Rome, in England, was founded on the Canon law; and this created quarrels between kings, and several archbishops and prelates, who adhered to those papal usurpations; for such foreign canons as were received here, had no force from any papal legate, or provincial authority, but solely from the consent and approbation of the king and people.

Besides the foreign canons, there were several laws and constitutions made here for the government of the church; and all these received their force from the royal assent; and if, at any time, the ecclesiastical courts did, by their sentences, endeavour to enforce obedience to such canons, the courts at common law, upon complaint made, would grant prohibitions. These canons were all collected and explained by Lyndwood, Dean of the Arches, in the reign of Henry VI.

But, having been made in the times of papal authority, they were revised, some time after the Reformation, by commissioners appointed for that purpose; among whom was Archbishop Cranmer. The work is entitled "Reformatio Legum Ecclesiasticarum, ex auctoritate Regis Hen. VIII. inchoata, et per Edw. VI. protracta." But the king's death prevented its being confirmed. This book was put into elegant Latin by Dr. Hadden, University Orator at Cambridge, with the assistance of Sir John Cheek, who was tutor to King Edward VI.

The authority vested in the Church of England, of making canons, was ascertained by a statute of Henry VIII., commonly called the Act of the Clergy's Submission; by which they acknowledged that the convocation had been always assembled by the king's writ; after which follows this enacting clause, viz. :—"That they shall not attempt, allege, or claim, or put in use, any constitutions or canons, without the king's assent." So that, though the power of making canons resided in the clergy, met in convocation, their force was derived from the authority of the king assenting to, and confirming them.

The old canons continued in force till the reign of James I., when, the clergy being lawfully assembled in convocation, that king gave them leave, by his letters patent, to treat, consult, and agree on canons; which they did, and presented them to the king, who gave his royal assent to them, and by other letters patent, did for himself, his heirs, and successors, ratify and confirm the same. These canons were a collection out of the several preceding canons and injunctions; and, being authorised by the king's commission, according to the form of the statute of the 25 Hen. VIII., they were warranted by act of parliament, and became part of the law of the land, and as binding in ecclesiastical matters as any statute whatever in civil. Some of the canons in 1603 are now obsolete, as the 74th, which requires that the benefited clergy shall wear gowns with standing collars, and square caps.

In the reign of Charles I., several canons were passed by the clergy in convocation. They were approved by the king and privy council, the judges and other eminent persons of the long robe being present; after which, they were subscribed in the House of Lords by the bishops, none refusing but the Bishop of Gloucester, for which he was suspended ab officio et beneficio by both houses. Notwithstanding which solemn approbation, these canons gave great offence. Some were displeased with the seventh, entitled "a declaration concerning rites and ceremonies." But the greatest clamour was against the sixth, entitled "an oath enjoined for the preventing all innovations in doctrine and government." It was likewise objected to them that they were not made pursuant to the above-mentioned statute of the 25th of Hen. VIII., because they were made in convocation, after the parliament was dissolved. After the Restoration, when the bishops were restored by an act of parliament to their jurisdiction, there was a proviso in the act, that it should not confirm the canons made in 1640. And thus the ecclesiastical laws were left as they were before the year 1640.

CANON, a person who possesses a prebend or revenue allotted for the performance of divine service in a cathedral or collegiate church. Canons are of no great antiquity. Paschier observes, that the name was not known before Charlemagne; at least, the first we hear of are in Gregory de Tours, who mentions a college of canons instituted by Baldwin XVI., archbishop of that city, in the time of Clotharius I. The common opinion attributes the institution of this order to Chrodegangus, bishop of Mentz, about the middle of the eighth century.

CANONS, BOOK OF, ordinances prepared for Scotland by order of Charles I., and designed completely to subvert the constitution of the Scottish church. They declared the power of the king in all matters spiritual to be absolute and unlimited; and they pronounced sentence of excommunication against all who should declare the government of the church, by bishops and archbishops, to be unscriptural and unlawful.

CANONICAL HOURS are certain stated times of the day assigned more especially by the Romish church to the offices of prayer and devotion; such are matins, lauds, &c. In England, the canonical hours are from eight to twelve in the forenoon; before or after which, marriage cannot be legally performed in any church.

CANONICAL LETTERS, in the ancient church, were testimonials of the orthodox faith which the bishops and clergy sent each other to keep up the Catholic communion, and distinguish orthodox Christians from heretics.

CANONICAL LIFE, the rule of living prescribed by the ancient clergy who lived in community. The canonical life was a kind of medium between the monastic and clerical lives.

CANONICAL OBEDIENCE is that submission which, by the ecclesiastical laws, the inferior clergy are to pay to their bishops, and the religious to their superiors.

CAPUCHINS, religious of the order of St. Francis. They owe their origin to Matthew de Bassi, a Franciscan of the duchy of Urbino; who, having seen St. Francis represented with a sharp pointed Capuche, or cowl, began to wear the like in 1525, with the permission of Pope Clement VII. His example was soon followed by two other religious, named Lewis and Raphael de Fossembrun; and the Pope, by a brief, granted these three monks leave to retire to some hermitage, and retain their new habit. The retirement they chose was the hermitage of the Camaldolites near Massacio where they were very charitably received.

This innovation in the habit of the order gave great offence to the Franciscans, whose provincial persecuted these poor monks, and obliged them to fly from place to place. At last, they took refuge in the palace of the Duke de Camerino, by whose credit they were received under the obedience of the Conventuals, in the quality of Hermits Minors, in the year 1527. The next year, the Pope approved this union, and confirmed to them the privilege of wearing the square capuche, and admitting among them all who would take the habit. Thus the order of the Capuchins, so called from wearing the capuche, began in the year 1528.

Their first establishment was at Colmenzono, about a league from Camerino, in a convent of the order of St. Jerome, which had been abandoned. But their numbers increasing, Lewis de Fossembrun built another small convent at Montmelon, in the territory of Camerino. The great number of conversions which the Capuchins made by their preaching, and the assistance they gave the people in a contagious distemper, with which Italy was afflicted the same year, 1528, gained them an universal esteem.

In 1529, Lewis de Fossembrun built for them two other convents; the one at Alvacina, in the territory of Fabriano, the other at Fossembrun, in the duchy of Urbino. Matthew de Bassi, being chosen their vicar-general, drew up constitutions for the government of this order. They enjoined, among other things, that the Capuchins should perform divine service without singing; that they should say but one mass a day in their convents; they directed the hours of mental prayer, morning and evening, the days of disciplining themselves, and those of silence: they forbade the monks to hear the confessions of seculars, and enjoined them always to travel on foot: they recommended poverty in the ornaments of their church, and prohibited in them the use of gold, silver, and silk: the pavilions of the altars were to be of stuff, and the chalices of tin.

This order soon spread itself all over Italy, and into Sicily. In 1573, Charles IX. demanded of Pope Gregory XIII. to have the order of Capuchins established in France, which that Pope consented to; and their first settlement in that kingdom was in the little town of Picpus, near Paris, which they soon quitted, to settle at Meudon, from whence they were introduced into the capital of the kingdom. In 1606, Pope Paul V. gave them leave to accept of an establishment which was offered them in Spain. They even passed the seas to labour for the conversion of the infidels; and their order is become so considerable that it is at present divided into more than sixty provinces, consisting of near 1600 convents, and 25,000 monks, besides the missions of Brazil, Congo, Barbary, Greece, Syria, and Egypt.

Among those who have preferred the poverty and humility of the Capuchins to the advantages of birth and fortune, was the famous Alphonso d'Este, Duke of Modena and Reggio, who, after the death of his wife Isabella, took the habit of this order at Munich, in the year 1626, under the name of Brother John Baptist, and died in the convent of Castelnovo, in 1644. In France likewise, the Duke de Joyeuse, after having distinguished himself as a great general, became a Capuchin in September, 1587.

Father Paul observes, that "the Capuchins preserve their reputation, by reason of their poverty; and that if they should suffer the least change in their institution, they would acquire no immoveable estates by it, but would lose the alms they now receive." He adds: "It seems, therefore, as if here an absolute period were put to all future acquisitions and improvements in this gainful trade; for whoever should go about to institute a new order, with a power of acquiring estates, such an order would certainly find no credit in the world; and if a profession of poverty were a part of the institution, there could be no acquisitions made whilst that lasted; nor would there be any credit left when that was broke."

There is likewise an order of Capuchin Nuns, who follow the rule of St. Clara. Their first establishment was at Naples, in 1538, and their foundress was the venerable mother Maria Laurentia Longa, of a noble family of Catalonia, a lady of the most uncommon piety and devotion. Some Capuchins coming to settle at Naples, she obtained for them, by her credit with the archbishop, the church of St. Euphebia, without the city; soon after which she built a monastery of virgins, under the name of "Our Lady of Jerusalem," into which she retired in 1534, together with nineteen young women, who engaged themselves, by solemn vows, to follow the third rule of St. Francis. The Pope gave the government of this monastery to the Capuchins; and, soon after, the nuns quitted the third rule of St. Francis to embrace the more rigorous rule of St. Clara, from the austerity of which they had the name of "Nuns of the Passion," and that of "Capuchines" from the habit they took, which was that of the Capuchins.

After the death of their foundress, another monastery of Capuchines was established at Rome, near the Quirinal palace, and was called "The Monastery of the Holy Sacrament;" and a third, in the same city, built by Cardinal Baronius. These foundations were approved, in the year 1600, by Pope Clement VIII., and confirmed by Gregory XV. There were afterwards several other establishments of Capuchines: in particular one at Paris, in 1604, founded by the Duchess de Mercœur, who put crowns of thorns on the heads of the young women whom she placed in her monastery.

CAPUTIATI, a denomination which appeared in the twelfth century, so called from a singular kind of cap which distinguished their party. They wore upon their caps a leaden image of the Virgin Mary, and declared publicly that their purpose was to level all distinctions, to abrogate magistracy, and to remove all subordination among mankind, and to restore that primitive liberty, that natural equality, which were the inestimable privilege of the first mortals.

CARDINAL, an eminent dignity in the Roman Church; among the Latins the word Cardinalis signifies principal, and in this sense were Venti Cardinales, four cardinal or chief winds; Princeps Cardinalis, a sovereign prince; Missæ Cardinalis, and Altare Cardinale, for the great mass or great altar of a church. It was also a name that was given to certain officers of the Emperor Theodosius, as to generals of armies; to the Præfecti in Asia and Africa, because they possessed the chief offices in the empire.

CARDINAL, ORIGIN OF THE OFFICE. There were two sorts of churches in towns; one sort was as the parish churches of these times, and were called titles; the others were hospitals for the poor, and were called deaneries: the first were served by priests, and the other governed by deans; the other chapels in the towns were called oratories, where mass was celebrated without administering the sacraments. The chaplains of these oratories were called local priests, that is, priests that belonged to some particular place. And to put a greater distinction between these churches, the parish churches were called cardinales, or cardinal titles, and the priests that officiated in them, and administered the sacraments, were called cardinals. This was chiefly used at Rome, where the cardinals attended the pope whilst he celebrated mass, and in the processions, and therefore Leon IV. calls them Presbyteros sui cardinis. In the council held at Rome in 853, the deacons who looked after the deaneries, had also the title of cardinals, either because they were the chiefest deacons, or because they assisted with the cardinals, i. e. priests at the pope's mass. The greatest function of the Roman cardinals was to go to the pope's council, and to the synods, and to give their opinions concerning ecclesiastical affairs. It was one of them that was generally chosen pope; for it was rare that any bishop was chosen in those days. It being recorded in the Ecclesiastical History, that Pope Stephen VII, chosen in 896, caused his predecessor Formosus to be dug up again, and annulled all his ordinances, alleging that he was made pope against the disposition of the holy decrees in the time that he was bishop of Ostia. Finally, these cardinals have engrossed to themselves the power of choosing a pope, since the council celebrated at Rome, in 1059, under Nicholas II. In process of time, the name of cardinal, which was common to all titular priests or curates, was appropriated to those of Rome, and afterwards to seven bishops of the neighbourhood of Rome. All these cardinals were divided under five patriarchal churches, as St. John of Lateran, St. Mary Major, St. Peter of the Vatican, St. Paul's, and St. Lawrence's. In following times the pope gave the title of cardinal to other bishops besides those here mentioned; and it is said the first that had this honour conferred upon him was Conradus, Archbishop of Mayence, who received it from Pope Alexander III., who also conferred the same honour on Gardin of Sala, Archbishop of Milan, in 1165, and since that time some bishops were created Cardinal Priests of Rome, with one of the titles thereof; so William Archbishop of Rheims was made cardinal, with the title of St. Sabina, by Pope Clement III., or, according to others, by Alexander III. And finally, Clement V. and his successors gave the title of cardinal priests to many other bishops, which custom has been followed since. As for the deacon cardinals, it must be observed, that in the beginning there were seven in the Church of Rome, and in the other churches; this number was augmented, at Rome, to fourteen, and at last they created eighteen, who were called cardinal deacons, or principal, to distinguish them from others that had not the care of deaneries. After were counted twenty-four deaneries in the city of Rome; and now there are fourteen affected to the deacon cardinals. The priest cardinals are to the number of fifty, which, with the six cardinal bishops of Ostia, Porro, Sabina, Palestrina, Frascati, and Albano, who have no other titles but those of their bishoprics, make generally the number of seventy. Innocent IV. gave the cardinals the red cap in the council of Lyons, held in 1243; Paul II. the red gown in 1464. Gregory XIV. bestowed the red cap upon the regular cardinals, who wore but a hat before. Urban VIII. gave them the title of eminence, for they had before but that of most illustrious. When the pope has a mind to create any cardinals, he writes their names that he designs for this dignity, and gets them read in the consistory, after he has told the cardinals Fratres habetis, that is, "You have for brothers," &c. The cardinal patron sends for those that are at Rome, and conducts them to his holiness to receive their red caps from him; until then they are incognito, and cannot come to the meeting; and as for those that are absent, the pope dispatches one of his chambermen of honour to carry them their cap; but they are obliged to receive the hat at his own hands. When they come to Rome they are received in cavalcade. The cardinal's dress is a sattane, a rochet, a mantelet, or short purple mantle over their rochet; the mozette, and a papal cape over the rochet in public and solemn actions. The colour of their garment differs according to the times: either it is red, or of the colour of dried roses or violets. The regular cardinals wear no silk, nor any other colour but that of their order, but the red hat and cap are common to them all. When cardinals are sent to princes' courts, it is in quality of Legates a latere; and when they are sent to any town, their government is called legation. There are five legations, viz. that of Avignon, of Ferrara, of Bologna, of Ravenna, and of Perouse. Here follows Fr. Maimbourg's curious remarks upon this subject:—When the cathedral church was vacant, the popes sent one of the neighbouring bishops to govern it, until another bishop was chosen, who took possession of it as of his proper church, and received its title, which the administering bishop, or he that took care of it during the vacancy, had not. This was what they called a cardinal bishop in those times, from the word cardo, which signifies a hinge, showing by that, that the titular bishop was tied to his church to exercise continually of his proper authority all the functions of his bishopric. This is what the word cardinal signifies in its natural and true interpretation, as can be clearly seen in many letters of St. Gregory the Great; for this pope understanding that the church of Aleria, in the isle of Corsica, was vacant, he wrote to a bishop of Corsica, called Leo, to go to govern it, and afterwards established Martin there to be the cardinal bishop thereof; so here is a succession of two bishops, whereof the one was but visitor or administrator, and the other titular. The same Gregory satisfied the clergy and nobility of Naples, that he approved their desire of having Paul bishop of Neri, and their visitor made their cardinal bishop; whence it is easy to see, that in this pope's time, and before him, all titular bishops, who by their ordination were tied to their church, were all called cardinal bishops. The same may be said of the priests and deacons, to whom their bishops had given some benefice or charge that tied them to any church in their diocese; and also the archdeacons, and the other dignities, were cardinals of the churches they governed. The other priests and deacons that had no such tie were not called cardinals. And it was for this reason that those the popes sent into provinces, and the nuncios he sent to Constantinople, were indeed deacons of the Roman Church, but not cardinals. By this same reason, all the curates tied by their titles to the parishes wherein they administered the sacraments, were cardinal priests. He was also called a cardinal priest who officiated in chief in any great man's chapel or oratory; so that there were deacon, priest, and bishop cardinals in all the dioceses of the world. And as for the Church of Rome, there was no other cardinal bishop in Pope Gregory's time but he himself, who in quality of proper bishop of the particular Church of Rome, was tied there as to his title. The priest cardinals were all the curates of Rome, and all the other priests that served in any other chapel or oratory. The deacons and cardinal archdeacons were such as had a title where to exercise their functions. This is what the cardinals of the Church of Rome were in St. Gregory's time, and near four hundred years after him. But in the eleventh age, the popes, whose grandeur was much increased, taking crowns, which was begun the first time by Pope Dalmasus II., in 1048; they began also to settle a court, and a regular council of cardinals, bishops, priests, and deacons, different from those that had this title before. The cardinal bishops were they that were suffragans of the pope as metropolitan. The priest and cardinal deacons were chosen by the pope at pleasure, in all the provinces of Christendom, whether bishops, priests, abbots, princes, commanders, monks, or other religious, to whom he gave the title of churches, without obliging them to officiate in them. And so as the name of pope, which in the five or six first ages was common to all bishops, was afterwards appropriated to the Roman Pontiff; so likewise the name of cardinal, which had been common to all titular bishops, priests, and deacons, in regard of the churches they were linked to, as St. Gregory speaks, does now belong only to the cardinals of the Church of Rome, who are in the highest rank of that church. Nevertheless it is observed, that even since the establishment of this College of Cardinals, the bishops maintaining their pre-eminency, have had the first place in assemblies and public meetings in the pope's own presence. This is seen in the Act of the Dedication of the Church of Marmon-tier, by Pope Urban II., in 1090, when he came to France to keep the famous Council of Clermont; for in that ceremony, Hugues, Archbishop of Lyons, was next the pope, and after him followed the other archbishops and bishops, followed by the priests and deacons that were cardinals, and of the pope's retinue. In 769, the Council of Rome, held under Pope Stephen IV., decreed, that none should be chosen pope but a priest or deacon cardinal. In 1130, the cardinals began to be masters of the pope's election under Innocent II., and made themselves the sole choosers, to the exclusion of the rest of the clergy of Rome under Alexander III., in 1160. So rising more and more, it is at last come to this, that though they be but priests and deacons, yet the dignity of cardinal alone places them above bishops.

CARMELITES, or WHITE FRIARS. Religious of the order of Our Lady of Mount Carmel. They pretend to derive their original from the prophets Elijah and Elisha; and this occasioned a very warm controversy between this order and the Jesuits, about the end of the seventeenth century, both parties publishing several works, and petitioning the Popes Innocent XI. and Innocent XII.; the latter of whom silenced them both, by a brief of the 20th of November, 1698.

What we know of their original is, that, in the twelfth century, Aimerie, legate of the Holy See in the East, and patriarch of Antioch, collected together several hermits in Syria, who were exposed to the violence and incursions of the barbarians, and placed them on Mount Carmel, formerly the residence of the prophets Elijah and Elisha; from which mountain they took the name of Carmelites. Albert, patriarch of Jerusalem, gave them rules in 1205, which Pope Honorius III. confirmed in 1224.

The peace concluded by the Emperor Frederick II. with the Saracens, in the year 1229, so disadvantageous to Christendom, and so beneficial to the infidels, occasioned the Carmelites to quit the Holy Land, under Alan, the fifth general of the order. He first sent some of the religious to Cyprus, who landed there in the year 1238, and founded a monastery in the forest of Fortania. Some Sicilians, at the same time, leaving Mount Carmel, returned to their own country, where they founded a monastery in the suburbs of Messina. Some English departed out of Syria, in the year 1440, to found others in England. Others of Provence, in the year 1244, founded a monastery in the desert of Aigualates, a league from Marseilles: and thus, the number of their monasteries increasing, they held their first European general chapter in the year 1245, at their monastery of Aylesford, in England.

After the establishment of the Carmelites in Europe, their rule was in some respects altered: the first time, by Pope Innocent IV., who added to the first article a precept of chastity, and relaxed the eleventh, which enjoins abstinence at all times from flesh, permitting them, when they travelled, to eat boiled flesh. This pope likewise gave them leave to eat in a common refectory, and to keep asses or mules for their use. Their rule was again mitigated by the Popes Eugenius IV. and Pius II. Hence the order is divided into two branches, viz. the Carmelites of the ancient observance, called the moderate or mitigated, and those of the strict observance, who are the barefooted Carmelites; a reform set on foot, in 1540, by S. Theresa, a nun of the convent of Avila, in Castile: these last are divided into two congregations, that of Spain, and that of Italy.

The habit of the Carmelites was at first white, and the cloak laced at the bottom with several lists; but Pope Honorius IV. commanded them to change it for that of the Minims. Their scapulary is a small woollen habit, of a brown colour, thrown over their shoulders. They wear no linen shirts, but instead of them linsey-woolsey.

CARPOCRATIANS, heretics, who sprang up in the second century; followers of Carpocrates, of the island of Cephallenia, according to Epiphanius, or, according to Theodoret and Clemens Alexandrinus, of the city of Alexandria. This Carpocrates was a man of the worst morals, and addicted to magic. Eusebius says expressly, he was the father of the heresy of the Gnostics; and it is true that all the infamous things imputed to the Gnostics, are ascribed likewise to the Carpocratians. It is sufficient to mention two of their principles: the one is, a community of wives; the other, that a man cannot arrive at perfection, nor deliver himself from the power of the princes of this world, as they expressed it, without having passed through all sorts of criminal actions; laying it down for a maxim, that there is no action bad in itself, but only from the opinion of men. This induced them to establish a new kind of metempsychosis, that those who have not passed through all sorts of actions in the first life, may do it in a second, and, if that be not sufficient, in a third, and so on, till they have discharged this strange obligation. Accordingly, they are charged with committing the most infamous things in their Agapæ, or love-feasts.

As to their theology, they attributed the creation of the world to angels; they said that Jesus Christ was born of Joseph and Mary in a manner like other men; that his soul alone was received into heaven, his body remaining on the earth; and, accordingly, they rejected the resurrection of the body.

They marked their disciples at the bottom of the right ear with a hot iron, or with a razor.

They had images of Jesus Christ as well in painting as in sculpture, which they said were made by Pilate: they kept them in a little box or chest. They had likewise the images of Pythagoras, Plato, Aristotle, and other philosophers. They put crowns on all these images, and paid them the same superstitious honours which the pagans did to their idols, adoring them, and offering sacrifice to them. A woman of this sect, named Marcellina, came to Rome, in the pontificate of Anicetus, where she made a great many proselytes. She worshipped the images of Jesus Christ, Paul, Homer, and Pythagoras, and offered incense to them.

Carpocrates had a son, named Epiphanius, who, by means of the Platonic philosophy, gave a greater extent to the fabulous opinions of the Carpocratians. He died at seventeen years of age, but in that short time had acquired so great a reputation among the disciples of his father, that, after his death, he was revered by them as a god, insomuch that they built a temple to him in the island of Cephalenia, and the Cephalenians, every first day of the month, solemnized the feast of his apotheosis, offering sacrifices to him, and singing hymns to his honour.

Epiphanius relates of himself, that in his youth he accidentally fell into company with some women of this sect, who revealed to him the most horrible secrets of the Carpocratians. They were armed with beauty sufficient to make an impression on a person of his age; but, by the grace of God, he says, he escaped the snare which the devil had laid for him.—See Gnostics.

CARTHUSIANS, a religious order, founded in the year 1080, by one Bruno, a very learned man, of the bishopric of Cologne, and professor of philosophy at Paris. The occasion of its institution is related as follows: a friend of Bruno's, who had been looked upon as a good liver, being dead, Bruno attended his funeral. Whilst the service was performing in the church, the dead man, who lay upon a bier, raised himself up and said, "By the just judgment of God, I am accused." The company being astonished at this unusual accident, the burial was deferred to the next day, when the concourse of people being much greater, the dead man again raised himself up and said, "By the just judgment of God, I am damned." This miracle, it is pretended, wrought such an effect on Bruno, and six more, that they immediately retired to the desert of Chartreux, in the diocese of Grenoble, in Dauphiné, where Hugh, bishop of that diocese, assigned them a spot of ground, and where Bruno built his first monastery, under the following rigid institutes:

His monks were to wear a hair-cloth next their body, a white cassock, and over it a black cloak: they were never to eat flesh; to fast every Friday on bread and water; to eat alone in their chambers, except upon certain festivals; and to observe an almost perpetual silence: none were allowed to go out of the monastery, except the prior and procurator, and they only about the business of the house.

The Carthusians, so called from the place of their first institution, are a very rigid order. They are not to go out of their cells, except to church, without leave of their superior. They are not to speak to any person, even their own brother, without leave. They may not keep any part of their portion of meat or drink till the next day, except herbs or fruit. Their bed is of straw, covered with a felt or coarse cloth; their clothing, two hair-cloths, two cowls, two pair of hose, a cloak, &c. all coarse. Every monk has two needles, some thread, scissors, a comb, a razor, a hone, an ink-horn, pens, chalk, two pumice-stones; likewise two pots, two porringers, a basin, two spoons, a knife, a drinking cup, a water-pot, a salt, a dish, a towel; and, for fire, tinder, flint, wood, and an axe.

In the refectory, they are to keep their eyes on the meat, their hands on the table, their attention on the reader, and their heart fixed on God. When allowed to discourse, they are to do it modestly, not to whisper, nor talk aloud, nor to be contentious. They confess to the prior every Saturday. Women are not allowed to come into their churches, that the monks may not see any thing which may provoke them to lewdness.

It is computed there are a hundred and seventy-two houses of Carthusians, whereof five are of nuns, who practise the same austerities as the monks. They are divided into sixteen provinces, each of which has two visitors. There have been several canonized saints of this order; four cardinals, seventy archbishops and bishops, and a great many very learned writers.

The story of the motive of St. Bruno's retirement into the desert was inserted in the Roman Breviary, but was afterwards left out, when that Breviary was reformed, by order of Pope Urban VIII.; and this gave occasion to several learned men of the seventeenth century to publish writings on that subject, some to vindicate the truth of the story, and others to invalidate it.

In the year 1170, Pope Alexander III. took this order under the protection of the holy see. In 1391, Boniface IX. exempted them from the jurisdiction of the bishops. In 1420, Martin V. exempted them from paying the tenths of the lands belonging to them; and Julius II., in 1508, ordered that all the houses of the order, in whatever part of the world they were situated, should obey the prior of the Grand Chartreuse, and the general chapter of the order.

The convents of this order are generally very beautiful and magnificent; that of Naples, though but small, surpasses all the rest in ornaments and riches. Nothing is to be seen in the church and house but marble and jasper. The apartments of the prior are rather those of a prince, than a poor monk. There are innumerable statues, bas-reliefs, paintings, &c., together with very fine gardens; all which, joined with the holy and exemplary life of the good religious, draws the curiosity of all strangers who visit Naples.

The Carthusians settled in England about the year 1180. They had several monasteries here, particularly at Witham in Somersetshire, Hinton in the same county, Beauval in Nottinghamshire, Kingston-upon-Hull, Mount-Grace in Yorkshire, Eppewort in Lincolnshire, Shene in Surrey, and one near Coventry. In London they had a famous monastery, since called, from the Carthusians who settled there, the Charter-house.

CASUALTY, an event that is not foreseen or intended. See CONTINGENCY.

CASUIST, one that studies and settles cases of conscience. The Jesuits Escobar, Sanchez, Suarez, Busenbaum, and others, have acquired notorious celebrity by their ingenuity in the invention of such cases, and for the ambiguity and singularity of their solutions. Escobar made a collection of the opinions of all the casuists before him. M. Le Feore, preceptor of Louis XIII., called the books of the casuists the art of quibbling with God, which does not seem far from truth, by reason of the multitude of distinctions and subtleties with which they abound. Mayer has published a bibliotheca of casuists, containing an account of all the writers on cases of conscience, ranged under three heads; the first comprehending the Lutheran, the second the Calvinist, and the third the Romish casuists.

CASUISTRY, called by Kant the dialectics of conscience, is the doctrine and science of conscience and its cases, with the rules and principles of resolving the same; drawn partly from natural reason or equity, and partly from the authority of Scripture, the canon law, councils, fathers, &c. To casuistry belongs the decision of all difficulties arising about what a man may lawfully do or not do; what is sin or not sin; what things a man is obliged to do in order to discharge his duty, and what he may let alone without breach of it.

Some suppose that all books of casuistry are as useless as they are tiresome. One who is really anxious to do his duty must be very weak, it is said, if he can imagine that he has much occasion for them; and with regard to one who is negligent of it, the style of those writings is not such as is likely to awaken him to more attention. The frivolous accuracy which casuists attempt to introduce into subjects which do not admit of it, almost necessarily betray them into dangerous errors; and at the same time render their works dry and disagreeable, abounding in abstruse and metaphysical distinctions, but incapable of exciting in the heart any of those emotions which it is the principal use of books of morality to produce.

On the other hand, I think it may be observed, that, though these remarks may apply to some, they cannot apply to all books of casuistry. It must be acknowledged that nice distinctions, metaphysical reasonings, and abstruse terms, cannot be of much service to the generality, because there are so few who can enter into them; yet, when we consider how much light is thrown upon a subject by the force of good reasoning, by viewing a case in all its bearings, by properly considering all the objections that may be made to it, and by examining it in every point of view: if we consider also how little some men are accustomed to think, and yet at the same time possess that tenderness of conscience which makes them fearful of doing wrong; we must conclude that such works as these, when properly executed, may certainly be of considerable advantage. The reader may consult Ames's Power and Cases of Conscience; Bishop Taylor's Ductor Dubitantium; Dr. Saunderson's De Obligatione Conscientiæ; Pike and Haywood's Cases; and Saurin's Christian Casuistry, in the 4th vol. of his Sermons, p. 265, English edition; and Baxter's Christian Directory.

CATAPHRYGIAN HERESY, the erroneous system of Montanus, and so called, because that heresiarch began to exercise his pretended prophetic gifts in the lower or more southerly part of Phrygia. See MONTANUS.

CATECHISING, instructing by asking questions and correcting the answers. Catechising is an excellent mean of informing the mind, engaging the attention, and affecting the heart, and is an important duty incumbent on all who have children under their care. Children should not be suffered to grow up without instruction, under the pretence that the choice of religion ought to be perfectly free, and not biased by the influence and authority of parents, or the power of education. As they have capacities, and are more capable of knowledge by instruction than by the exercise of their own reasoning powers, they should certainly be taught. This agrees both with the voice of nature and the dictates of revelation. Deut. vi. 7; Prov. xxii. 6; Eph. vi. 4. The propriety of this being granted, it may next be observed, that, in order to facilitate their knowledge, short summaries of religion, extracted from the Bible, in the way of question and answer, may be of considerable use. 1. Hereby, says Dr. Watts, the principles of Christianity are reduced into short sentences, and easier to be understood by children.—2. Hereby, these principles are not only thrown into a just and easy method, but every part is naturally introduced by a proper question; and the rehearsal of the answer is made far easier to a child than it would be, if the child were required to repeat the whole scheme of religion.—3. This way of teaching has something familiar and delightful in it, because it looks more like conversation and dialogue.—4. The very curiosity of the young mind is awakened by the question to know what the answer will be; and the child will take pleasure in learning the answer by heart, to improve its own knowledge. See next article.

CATECHISM, a form of instruction by means of questions and answers. There have been various catechisms published by different authors, but many of them have been but ill suited to convey instruction to juvenile minds. Catechisms for children should be so framed as not to puzzle and confound, but to let the beams of divine light into their minds by degrees. They should be accommodated as far as possible to the weakness of their understandings; for merely learning sentences by rote, without comprehending the meaning, will be of but little use. In this way, they will know nothing but words: it will prove a laborious task, and not a pleasure; confirm them in a bad habit of dealing in sounds instead of ideas; and, after all, perhaps create in them an aversion to religion itself. Dr. Watts advises that different catechisms should be composed for different ages and capacities; the questions and answers should be short, plain, and easy; scholastic terms, and logical distinctions, should be avoided; the most practical points of religion should be inserted, and one or more well chosen texts of Scripture should be added to support almost every answer, and to prove the several parts of it. The Doctor has admirably exemplified his own rules, in the catechism he has composed for children at three or four years of age; that for children at seven or eight; his Assembly's catechism, proper for youth at twelve or fourteen; his preservative from the sins and follies of childhood; his catechism of Scripture names; and his historical catechism. These are superior to any I know, and which I cannot but ardently recommend to parents and all those who have the care and instruction of children.

The catechism of the church of England is drawn up by way of question and answer. Originally, it consisted of no more than a repetition of the baptismal vow, the Creed, and the Lord's Prayer; but King James I. ordered the bishops to add to it a short and plain explanation of the sacraments, which was accordingly performed by Bishop Overall, then Dean of St. Paul's, and approved by the rest of the bishops.

The times appointed for catechising are Sundays and holidays. By the first book of King Edward VI., it was not required to be done above once in six weeks. But upon Bucer's objecting to the interval of time as too long, the rubric was altered, but expressed, notwithstanding, in indefinite terms, leaving it to be done as often as occasion requires. Indeed, the fifty-ninth canon enjoins every parson, vicar, or curate, upon every Sunday and holiday, to teach and instruct the youth and ignorant persons of his parish, in the catechism set forth in the Book of Common Prayer; and that under pain of a sharp reproof for the first omission, suspension for the second, and excommunication for the third.—See CATECHIST and CATECHISING.

CATECHIST, one whose charge is to instruct by questions, or to question the uninstructed concerning religion.

The catechists of the ancient churches were usually ministers, and distinct from the bishops and presbyters, and had their catechumena, or auditories, apart. But they did not constitute any distinct order of the clergy, being chosen out of any order. The bishop himself sometimes performed the office; at other times presbyters, readers, or deacons. It was his business to expose the folly of the pagan superstition; to remove prejudices, and answer objections; to discourse on behalf of the Christian doctrines; and to give instruction to those who had not sufficient knowledge to qualify them for baptism.

CATECHUMENS, the lowest order of Christians in the ancient church. They were called Catechumens, from the Greek word κατηχεω, which signifies to instruct in the first rudiments of any art or science. They had some title to the common name of Christian, being a degree above pagans and heretics, though not consummated by baptism. They were admitted to the state of Catechumens by imposition of hands, and the sign of the cross. The children of believing parents were admitted Catechumens as soon as ever they were capable of instruction; but at what age those born of heathen parents might be admitted, is not so clear. As to the time of their continuance in this state, there was no general rule fixed about it; but the practice varied according to the difference of times and places, and the readiness and proficiency of the Catechumens themselves. The council of Eliberis appointed two years' probation for new converts; and Justinian, in one of his Novellæ, prescribes the same length of time. The Apostolical Constitutions lengthen the term to three years. Sometimes it was limited to the forty days of Lent. Socrates observes, that, in the conversion of the Burgundians, the French bishop, who converted them, took only seven days to catechise them, and then baptized them. But in case of sickness or imminent death, the Catechumens were immediately baptized with what they called Clinic baptism.

There were four orders or degrees of Catechumens. The first were the ἐκθροούμενοι, or those instructed privately without the church, and kept at a distance from the privilege of entering into the church for some time, to make them the more eager and desirous of it. The next degree above these were the ἀκροούμενοι, audientes. They were so called from being admitted to hear sermons and the Scriptures read in the church, but were not allowed to partake of the prayers. The third sort of Catechumens were the γονυκλιοντες, genu-flectentes; so called because they received imposition of hands, kneeling upon their knees. The fourth order was the βαπτιζόμενοι, φωτιζόμενοι, the competentes and electi, which denote the immediate candidates of baptism, or such as were appointed to be baptized the next approaching festival: before which strict examination was made into their proficiency under the several stages of catechetical exercises. After examination, they were exorcised for twenty days to-ther, and were obliged to fasting and confession. They were to get the Creed and Lord's Prayer by heart, and to repeat them before the bishop at their last examination. Some days before baptism, they went veiled, or with their faces covered; and it was customary to touch their ears, saying, Ephphatha, "be opened;" as also to anoint their eyes with clay; both ceremonies in imitation of our Saviour's practice, and intended to shadow out to the Catechumens their condition both before and after admission into the Christian church.

That part of divine service which preceded the common prayers of the communicants at the altar, that is, the psalmody, the reading of the scriptures, the sermon, &c., was called Missa Catechumenorum; because the Catechumens had the liberty of being present only at this part of the service.

The ancients speak of the sacrament of the Catechumens; and some modern writers, by mistake, suppose that, though they were not allowed to partake of the eucharist, they had something like it, which they call Eulogie Panis, or Panis Benedictus. But it appears from St. Augustine, that this sacrament was not the consecrated bread, but only a little taste of salt; intimating to them by that symbol, that they were to purge and cleanse their souls from sin, salt being the emblem of purity and incorruption. They called this a sacrament, after the custom of the primitive Christians, who gave that name to every thing that was mysterious, or had a spiritual signification in it.

CATENA, a Greek word signifying a chain, in biblical criticism is an exposition of a portion of the Scriptures, formed from collections from several authors. Thus we have Catena of the Greek fathers on the Octateuch, by Procopius; on the Book of Job, by Olympiodorus; and on the Octateuch, the Books of Samuel and Kings, by Nicephorus. These were Greek writers themselves. Beside them, compilations of this sort were made from the early fathers by many later authors, such as Francis Zephyr, Lepomannus, Patrick, Junius, Corderius, &c. Pole's Synopsis may be regarded as a Catena of the modern interpretations of the whole Scriptures, as Wolfius is of a still more ancient class on the New Testament.

CATHARISTS, a sect that spread much in the Latin church in the twelfth century. Their religion resembled the doctrine of the Manichæans and Gnostics [see those articles.] They supposed that matter was the source of evil; that Christ was not clothed with a real body; that baptism and the Lord's supper were useless institutions; with a variety of other strange notions.

CATHEDRAL, the chief church of a diocese; a church wherein is a bishop's see. The word comes from καθεδρα, "chair:" the name seems to have taken its rise from the manner of sitting in the ancient churches or assemblies of private Christians. In these the council, i. e. the elders and priests, were called Presbyterium; at their head was the bishop, who held the place of chairman, Cathedralis or Cathedraticus; and the presbyters, who sat on either side, also called by the ancient fathers Assesores Episcoporum. The episcopal authority did not reside in the bishop alone, but in all the presbyters, whereof the bishop was president. A cathedral, therefore, originally was different from what it is now; the Christians, till the time of Constantine, having no liberty to build any temple. By their churches they only meant assemblies; and by cathedrals, nothing more than consistoria.

CATHOLIC, denotes any thing that is universal or general. 1. The Epistles of James, Peter, Jude, and John are called the seven Catholic Epistles, either because they were not written to any particular person, or church, but to Christians in general, or to Christians of several countries; or because, whatever doubts may at first have been entertained respecting some of them, they were all acknowledged by the Catholic, or universal church, at the time this appellation was attached to them, which we find to have been common in the fourth century. 2. The rise of heresies induced the primitive Christian church to assume to itself the appellation of catholic, being a characteristic to distinguish itself from all sects, who, though they had party names, sometimes sheltered themselves under the name of Christians. The Romish church now distinguishes itself by catholic, in opposition to all who have separated from her communion, and whom she considers as heretics and schismatics, and herself only as the true and Christian church. In the strict sense of the word, there is no catholic church in being; that is, no universal Christian communion.

CELESTINS, a religious order, so called from their founder, Peter de Meuron, afterwards raised to the pontificate under the name of Celestin V.

This Peter, who was born at Isernia, a little town in the kingdom of Naples, in the year 1215, of but mean parents, retired very young to a solitary mountain, in order to dedicate himself wholly to prayer and mortification. The fame of his piety brought several, out of curiosity, to see him; some of whom, charmed with his virtues, renounced the world, to accompany him in his solitude. With these he formed a kind of community in the year 1254; which was approved by Pope Urban IV., in 1264, and erected into a distinct order, called The Hermits of St. Damien.

Peter de Meuron governed this order till 1286, when his love of solitude and retirement induced him to quit the charge. In July, 1294, the great reputation of his sanctity raised him, though much against his will, to the pontificate. He then took the name of Celestin V., and his order that of Celestins, from him. By his bull he approved their constitutions, and confirmed all their monasteries, which were to the number of twenty. But he sat too short a time in the chair of St. Peter to do many great things for his order; for, having governed the church five months and a few days, and considering the great burden he had taken upon him, to which he thought himself unequal, he solemnly renounced the pontificate, in a consistory held at Naples.

After his death, which happened in 1296, his order made a great progress, not only in Italy, but in France likewise; whither the then General Peter of Tivoli sent twelve religious, at the request of King Philip the Fair, who gave them two monasteries; one in the forest of Orleans, and the other in the forest of Compeigne, at Mount Chartres. This order likewise passed into several provinces of Germany. They have about ninety-six convents in Italy, and twenty-one in France, under the title of priories. The Celestins of the province of France have the privilege, by a grant of the Popes Martin V. and Clement VII., of making new statutes whenever they think proper, for the regulation of their order. By virtue of this power they drew up new constitutions, which were received in a provincial chapter in 1667. They are divided into three parts:—the first treats of the provincial chapters, and the elections of superiors; the second contains the regular observances; and the third the visitation and correction of the monks.

The Celestins rise two hours after midnight, to say matins. They eat no flesh at any time, except when they are sick. They fast every Wednesday and Friday, from Easter to the feast of the exaltation of the holy cross; and, from that feast to Easter, every day. As to their habit, it consists of a white gown, a capuche, and a black scapulary. In the choir, and when they go out of the monastery, they wear a black cowl with the capuche: their shirts are of serge.

Celestins, likewise, is the name given to certain hermits, who, during the short pontificate of Celestin V., obtained of that pope permission to quit the order of Friars Minors, to which they belonged, and retire into solitude, there to practise the rule of St. Francis in its utmost strictness. The superiors, being disgusted at this separation, took all methods to reduce these hermits to the obedience of the order; to avoid which persecution, they retired into Greece, and continued some time in an island of Achaia. But Pope Boniface VIII., who succeeded Celestin, being importuned by the order of Friars Minors, revoked the grant of his predecessor, and ordered the Celestin hermits to return to the obedience of their superiors. Accordingly, Thomas Sola, lord of the island where they had fixed, drove them out; and this he did in a time of famine, by which these poor religious were exposed to great misery and want in their journeys, especially as they passed through the countries of the Latins, who looked upon them as schismatics. They were something better treated in the countries of the Greeks, among whom they continued for two years unmolested; but the Patriarch of Constantinople, being returned from Venice, excommunicated them twice, because they did not submit to their superiors; nevertheless, these solitaries did not want for protectors; and the Archbishop of Patras particularly interested himself in their cause.

Brother James du Mont, one of these hermits, returning from Armenia, where he had resided some time, without knowing what had passed in relation to his brethren, came into Italy, and made his submission to the general, who soon after sent him on a mission into the East. Being arrived at Negropont, and hearing of the persecution raised against the Celestin hermits, he endeavoured to accommodate matters, and managed the affair with so much prudence, that the fathers of Romania consented that all these hermits should acknowledge him as their superior, under the dependence of the general. This the general would not consent to; which obliged brother Liberatus and his companions to come into Italy, and represent to the pope that he and his brethren had been always faithful to the church, and that all the accusations against them were mere calumnies.

A chapter general, held at Toulouse, in 1307, obtained an order from Charles II., King of Naples, to the inquisitor of that state, to act against brother Liberatus and his companions. Accordingly, the inquisitor examined them, and declared them innocent; at the same time advising them to retire to Anciano, where he granted them his protection against the pursuits of their enemies. But afterwards, being gained over by their enemies, he cited them a second time before him, and found a pretence to condemn them as heretics and schismatics. In consequence of which sentence they were first imprisoned, and then banished.

CELIBACY, the state of unmarried persons. Celibate, or celibacy, is a word chiefly used in speaking of the single life of the popish clergy, or the obligation they are under to abstain from marriage. The Church of Rome imposes an universal celibacy on all her clergy, from the pope to the lowest deacon and subdeacon. The advocates for this usage pretend that a vow of perpetual celibacy was required in the ancient church as a condition of ordination, even from the earliest apostolic ages. But the contrary is evident from numerous examples of bishops and archbishops, who lived in a state of matrimony, without any prejudice to their ordination or their function. Neither our Lord nor his apostles laid the least restraint upon the connubial union—on the contrary, the Scriptures speak of it as honourable in all, without the least restriction as to persons.—Heb. xiii. 4. Matt. xix. 10, 12. 1 Cor. vii. 2, 9. Paul even assigns forbidding to marry as characteristic of the apostasy of the latter times. 1 Tim. iv. 3. The fathers, without making any distinction between clergy and laity, asserted the lawfulness of the marriage of all Christians. Marriage was not forbidden to bishops in the Eastern Church till the close of the seventh century. Celibacy was not imposed on the Western clergy in general till the end of the eleventh century, though attempts had been made long before. Superstitious zeal for a sanctimonious appearance in the clergy seems to have promoted it at first; and crafty policy, armed with power, no doubt riveted this clog on the sacerdotal order in later periods of the church. Pope Gregory VII. appears in this business to have had a view to separate the clergy as much as possible from all other interests, and to bring them into a total dependence upon his authority; to the end that all temporal power might, in a high degree, be subjected to the papal jurisdiction. Forbidding to marry, therefore, has evidently the mark of the beast upon it. See MARRIAGE.

CELSUS, a philosopher of the second century, and of the Epicurean school, who composed a book against Christianity, to which he gave the title of Ἀληθῆς λόγος, which Origen, in his refutation of it, has, to a considerable extent, rescued from oblivion. It is invaluable, on account of the admissions of the grand facts and doctrines of the gospel, as preached by the apostles, and contained in their writings, by an enemy, who lived little more than one hundred and thirty years after the ascension of our Lord. He has nearly eighty quotations from the books of the New Testament, which he not only appeals to as existing, but as universally received by the Christians of that age as credible and divine. He is most minute in his references to the circumstances of the life of Christ and his apostles, which shows that he was well acquainted with them, and that no one denied them. He every where ridicules the idea of our Lord's divinity, contrasting with it that of his poverty, sufferings, and death; which proves not only that the Christians of that early age avowed their belief in the doctrine, but that Celsus himself, though an unbeliever, found it in the documents to which he refers, as the source of his acquaintance with the Christian system. "Did your God, when under punishment," he asks, "say any thing like this?" "You will have him to be God," he insists, "who ended an infamous life, with a miserable death." "If," he proceeds, "he thought fit to undergo such things; and if, in obedience to the Father, he suffered death, it is apparent they could not be painful and grievous to him, he being a God, and consenting to them," &c. See LARDNER and ORIGEN, con. Cels.

CEMETERY, a place set apart for the burial of the dead. Anciently none were buried in churches or churchyards; it was even unlawful to inter in cities, and the cemeteries were without the walls. Among the primitive Christians these were held in great veneration. It even appears from Eusebius and Tertullian, that in the early ages they assembled for divine worship in the cemeteries. Valerian seems to have confiscated the cemeteries and other places of divine worship; but they were restored again by Gallienus. As the martyrs were buried in these places, the Christians chose them for building churches on, when Constantine established their religion; and hence some derive the rule, which still obtains in the Church of Rome, never to consecrate an altar without putting under it the relics of some saint.

CENSURE, the act of judging and blaming others for their faults. Faithfulness in re-proving another differs from censoriousness: the former arises from love to truth, and respect for the person; the latter is a disposition that loves to find fault. However just censure may be where there is blame, yet a censorious spirit or rash judging must be avoided. It is usurping the authority and judgment of God. It is unjust, uncharitable, mischievous, productive of unhappiness to ourselves, and often the cause of disorder and confusion in society. See RASH JUDGING.

CENTURIES OF MAGDEBURG, the first comprehensive work of the Protestants on church history, and so called because it was divided into centuries, each volume containing a hundred years, and was first written at Magdeburg. Matthias Flaccius formed the plan of it in 1552, in order to prove the agreement of the Lutheran doctrine with that of the primitive Christians, and the difference between the latter and that of the Catholics. John Wigand, Matth. Judex, Basil Faber, Andrew Corvinus, and Thomas Holzthuter, were after Flaccius, the chief writers and editors. Some Lutheran princes and noblemen patronized it, and many learned men assisted in the work, which was drawn with great care and fidelity, from the original sources, compiled with sound judgment, and written in Latin. It was continued by the centuriatores, as the editors were called, only to the year 1300; and was published at Basle, 1559-1574, in thirteen volumes, folio. A modern edition by Baumgarten and Semler, but which reaches only to the year 500, appeared at Nuremberg, 1757-1765, in six volumes, quarto. A good abridgment was prepared by Lucas Oslander; the Tubingen edition of which (1607-1608) comprehends the period from the fourteenth to the sixteenth century. The Catholics, finding themselves attacked in this alarming way, and confuted by matters of fact, Baronius wrote his Annals in opposition to the Centuriæ.—Ency. Amer.

CERDONIANS, a sect in the first century, so called from Cerdon, who flourished 140 or 141, and came to Rome from Syria. His disciples espoused most of the opinions of Simon Magus and the Manichæans. They asserted two principles, good and bad. The first they called the Father of Jesus Christ; the latter the Creator of the world. They denied the incarnation and the resurrection, and reject the books of the Old Testament.

CEREMONY, an assemblage of several actions, forms, and circumstances, serving to render a thing magnificent and solemn. Applied to religious services, it signifies the external rites and manner wherein the ministers of religion perform their sacred functions. In 1646, M. Ponce published a history of ancient ceremonies, tracing the rise, growth, and introduction of each rite into the church, and its gradual advancement to superstition. Many of them were borrowed from Judaism, but more from paganism. Dr. Middleton has given a fine discourse on the conformity between the pagan and popish ceremonies, which he exemplifies in the use of incense, holy water, lamps and candles before the shrines of saints, votive gifts round the shrines of the deceased, &c. In fact, the altars, images, crosses, processions, miracles, and legends, nay, even the very hierarchy, pontificate, religious orders, &c., of the present Romans, he shows, are all copied from their heathen ancestors. An ample and magnificent representation in figures of the religious ceremonies and customs of all nations in the world, designed by Picart, is added, with historical explanations, and many curious dissertations.

It has been a question, whether we ought to use such rites and ceremonies, which are merely of human appointment. On one side it has been observed that we ought not. Christ alone is king in his church; he hath instituted such ordinances and forms of worship as he hath judged fit and necessary; and to add to them seems, at least, to carry in it an imputation on his wisdom and authority, and hath this unanswerable objection to it, that it opens the door to a thousand innovations (as the history of the church of Rome hath sufficiently shown,) which are not only indifferent in themselves, but highly absurd, and extremely detrimental to religion. That the ceremonies were numerous under the Old Testament dispensation is no argument; for, say they, 1. We respect Jewish ceremonies, because they were appointed of God; and we reject human ceremonies because God hath not appointed them. 2. The Jewish ceremonies were established by the universal consent of the nation; human ceremonies are not so. 3. The former were fit and proper for the purposes for which they were appointed; but the latter are often the contrary. 4. The institutor of the Jewish ceremonies provided for the expense of it; but no provision is made by God to support human ceremonies, or what he has not appointed.

These arguments seem very powerful; but on the other side it has been observed, that the desire of reducing religious worship to the greatest possible simplicity, however rational it may appear in itself, and abstractedly considered, will be considerably moderated in such as bestow a moment's attention upon the imperfection and infirmities of human nature in its present state. Mankind, generally speaking, have too little elevation of mind to be much affected with those forms and methods of worship in which there is nothing striking to the outward senses. The great difficulty here lies in determining the length which it is prudent to go in the accommodation of religious ceremonies to human infirmity; and the grand point is to fix a medium in which due regard may be shown to the senses and imagination, without violating the dictates of right reason, or tarnishing the purity of true religion. It has been said, that the Romish church has gone too far in its condescension to the infirmities of mankind; and this is what the ablest defenders of its motley worship have alleged in its behalf. But this observation is not just; the church of Rome has not so much accommodated itself to human weakness, as it has abused that weakness, by taking occasion from it to establish an endless variety of ridiculous ceremonies, destructive of true religion, and only adapted to promote the riches and despotism of the clergy, and to keep the multitude still hoodwinked in their ignorance and superstition. How far a just antipathy to the church puppet-shows of the Papists has unjustly driven some Protestant churches into the opposite extreme, is a matter that certainly deserves a serious consideration. See Dr. Stennett's Ser. on Conformity to the World; Robinson's Ser. on Ceremonies; Booth's Essay on the Kingdom of Christ; Mosheim's Ecclesiastical History, with Mac Laine's Notes, vol. i. p. 203, quarto edition. Jones's Works, vol. iv. p. 267.

CERINTHUS, one of the earliest heretics, by birth a Jew, who after having studied philosophy in Egypt, went into Asia Minor, where he disseminated his erroneous doctrines. Various opinions have obtained respecting the time at which he flourished, but it is now pretty generally agreed, that it must have been in the first century. Waterland, Michaelis, and others, are decided in their conviction, that the Apostle John wrote to confute his heresy; and indeed, it seems impossible to entertain a doubt on the subject, considering the direct bearing of many passages of his writings on the principles of which it consisted; and especially the express declaration of Irenæus, who was well acquainted with Polycarp, that "John wished, by the publication of his Gospel, to remove the error which had been sown in men's minds by Cerinthus." Some have asserted that he was one of the Judaizers referred to in the New Testament, but without sufficient foundation. He was a gnostic in his notion of the creation of the world, which he conceived to have been formed by angels; and his attachment to that philosophy may explain what otherwise seems inconsistent, that he retained some of the Mosaic ceremonies, such as the observance of sabbaths and circumcision, though like other gnostics, he ascribed the law and the prophets to the angel who created the world. What gave most eminence to his name was the fresh change which he introduced in the notion concerning Christ, while the gnostics had all of them been Docetæ; Cerinthus maintained that Jesus had a real body, but that he was a mere man, the son of Joseph and Mary. In other points he agreed with the gnostics, and believed that Christ was one of the eons who descended on Jesus at his baptism. The notion of Jesus being born of human parents was taught by him with precision, and not without success. He is also regarded as the first person who held the doctrine of a mundane millennium, and is said to have promised his followers the grossest pleasures, and the most sensual gratifications. It is likely that it is to this part of his views that we are to ascribe the opinion which he maintained, contrary to the generality of the gnostics, that Christ had not yet risen, but that he would rise hereafter, viz. at the period of the millennium. It is not improbable that Paul is combating this very heresy in the fifteenth chapter of 1st Corinthians. If he received any part of the New Testament, it is likely it was only the Gospel of Matthew, and that not in its pure state, but as it existed κατ' Ἑβραίων.

According to Irenæus, "there were some who had heard Polycarp tell that John the disciple of our Lord, being at Ephesus, and going to bathe, and seeing Cerinthus in the place, hurried out of the bath without bathing, and mided, Let us flee, lest even the bath should fall to pieces, while Cerinthus, the enemy of truth, is in it." Theodoret and Epiphanius relate the same story, which has nevertheless been questioned by Lampe and Oeder; but it is credited by Mosheim and other eminent moderns. Jerome is stated to have added that, according to Irenæus, the bath actually fell, but no such passage is to be found in the works of Jerome.

CHALDEE PARAPHRASE, in the rabbinical style, is called Targum. There are three Chaldee paraphrases in Walton's Polyglott, viz. 1. of Onkelos; 2. of Jonathan, son of Uziel; 3. of Jerusalem; but there are seventeen in all.

CHALICE, the cup used to administer the wine in the sacrament, and by the Roman Catholics in the mass. The use of the chalice, or communicating in both kinds, is by the church of Rome denied to the laity, who communicate only in one kind, the clergy alone being allowed the privilege of communicating in both kinds; in direct opposition to our Saviour's words,—"Drink ye all of it."

CHANCEL, a particular part of the fabric of a church. Eusebius, describing that of Paulinus, says, "It was divided from the rest by certain rails of wood, curiously and artificially wrought in the form of net-work, to make it inaccessible to the multitude." These rails the Latins call cancelli, whence comes the English word chancel.

The chancel in England is the rector's freehold, and part of his glebe; and therefore he is obliged to repair it; but where the rectory is improper, the impropiator must do it.

CHANCELLOR, a lay officer under a bishop, who is judge of his court. In the first ages of the church the bishops had those officers, who were called church lawyers, and were bred up in the knowledge of the civil and canon law: their business was to assist the bishop in his diocese.

We read of no chancellors in England during all the Saxon reigns, nor after the conquest, till the reign of Henry II., but that king requiring the attendance of the bishops in his councils of state, and other public affairs, it was thought necessary to substitute chancellors in their room for the despatch of those causes which were proper for their jurisdiction.

A bishop's chancellor hath his authority from the law; and his jurisdiction is not, like that of a commissary, limited to a certain place, and certain causes, but extends throughout the whole diocese, and to all ecclesiastical matters; not only for reformation of manners, in punishment of criminals, but in all causes concerning marriages, last wills, administrations, &c.

CHANT is used for the vocal music of churches. In church history we meet with divers kinds of these: as 1. Chant Ambrosian, established by St. Ambrose; 2. Chant Gregorian, introduced by Pope Gregory the Great who established schools of chanters, and corrected the church music. This at first was called the Roman song; afterwards the plain song, as the choir and people sing in unison.

CHANTRY, a little chapel, or particular altar, in a cathedral church, built and endowed for the maintenance of a priest to sing masses, in order to release the soul of the donor out of purgatory. There were many of these in England before the Reformation; and any man might build a chantry without the leave of the bishop. In the 37th year of Henry VIII. the chantries were given to the king, who had power to issue commissions to seize those endowments; but that being the last year of his reign, several chantries escaped being seized by virtue of those commissions; but they were afterwards vested in his successor, Edward VI.

CHAPEL, a place of divine worship, so called. The word is derived from the Latin capella. In former times, when the kings of France were engaged in war, they always carried St. Martin's hat into the field, which was kept in a tent as a precious relic; from whence the place was called capella, and the priests, who had the custody of the tent, capellani. Afterwards the word capella became applied to private oratories.

There are various kinds of chapels in Britain. 1. Domestic chapels, built by noblemen or gentlemen for private worship in their families. 2. Free chapels, such as are founded by kings of England. They are free from all episcopal jurisdiction, and only to be visited by the founder and his successors, which is done by the lord chancellor: yet the king may license any subject to build and endow a chapel, and by letters patent exempt it from the visitation of the ordinary. 3. Chapels in universities, belonging to particular universities. 4. Chapels of ease, built for the ease of one or more parishioners that dwell too far from the church, and are served by inferior curates, provided for at the charge of the rector, or of such as have benefit by it, as the composition or custom is. 5. Parochial chapels, which differ from parish churches only in name; they are generally small, and the inhabitants within the district few. If there be a presentation ad ecclesiam instead of capellam, and an admission and institution upon it, it is no longer a chapel, but a church for themselves and families. 6. Chapels which adjoin to and are part of the church; such were formerly built by honourable persons as burying places. 7. The places of worship used by the Methodists and Protestant dissenters, otherwise denominated meeting-houses, are now almost universally called chapels; with respect to which it is required by law, that they shall be certified in the court of quarter sessions, or to the bishop's court, when, on the payment of a small sum, the registration takes place. The doors are not permitted to be kept locked during the time of worship; and, to prevent the congregation from being disturbed, whoever molests it, or interrupts the worship, is, on conviction at the sessions, to forfeit 20*l.*, by statute I. of William and Mary.

CHAPELS, UNION, places of worship in which the Church of England service is performed in the morning, and the usual dissenting mode of worship is used in the evening. They were designed to unite persons of both parties: hence their name.

CHAPLAIN, a person who performs divine service in a chapel, or is retained in the service of some family to perform divine service.

The origin of the term is generally explained in the following manner:—Bishop Martin is said to have worn a hood (capa), which was regarded as possessing miraculous powers, and was, therefore, preserved after his death in a separate house, called, from this hood, capella (chapel), and the person stationed in the chapel to show it to superstitious spectators was termed chaplain. Charlemagne is reported to have possessed St. Martin's hood among the relics, and to have erected a chapel, called by the name of St. Martin, at the place in Germany where Fürth afterwards arose. He also built similar chapels at Nuremberg and Altenfurth. Another less probable derivation of the word deduces it indeed from capella, but explains it to signify the box in which the Romish missionaries carried the requisites for celebrating the mass, who were thence denominated chaplains.

According to a statute of Henry VIII. the persons vested with a power of retaining chaplains, together with the number each is allowed to qualify, are as follow:—an archbishop, eight; a duke, or bishop, six; marquis or earl, five; viscount, four; baron, knight of the garter, or lord chancellor, three: a duchess, marchioness, countess, baroness, the treasurer or comptroller of the king's house, clerk of the closet, the king's secretary, dean of the chapel, almoner, and master of the rolls, each of them two; chief justice of the king's bench, and warden of the Cinque Ports, each one. All these chaplains may purchase a license or dispensation, and take two benefices, with cure of souls. A chaplain must be retained by letters testimonial under hand and seal, for it is not sufficient that he serve as chaplain in the family.

In England there are forty-eight chaplains to the king, who wait four each month, preach in the chapel, read the service to the family, and to the king in his private oratory, and say grace in the absence of the clerk of the closet. While in waiting, they have a table and attendance, but no salary. In Scotland, the king has six chaplains, with a salary of 50*l.* each; three of them having, in addition, the deanery of the chapel royal divided between them, making up above 100*l.* to each. Their only duty at present is to say prayers at the election of peers for Scotland to sit in parliament.

CHAPLET, a certain instrument of monkish piety, made use of by the Roman Catholics, Greeks, Armenians, and other eastern communions. It is a string of beads, by which they measure, or count, the number of their prayers. The invention of it is ascribed, by the historians of the crusades, to Peter the Hermit, who first taught those warriors to pray by tale. St. Dominic, founder of the Dominicans, greatly raised the credit of this devout instrument, by giving out that the blessed Virgin had brought him one from heaven. If Peter the Hermit first taught it the Roman Catholics, it is probable he himself borrowed it from the Turks, who, to this day, make use of a chaplet, or string of beads, in their prayers; and the Turks seem to have had it from the East Indians, who likewise make use of a kind of chaplet. It is also used by the Lamas.

(CHAPTER, from the Latin caput, head, signifies,—

1. One of the principal divisions of a book, and, in reference to the Bible, one of the larger sections into which its books are divided. This division, as well as that consisting of verses, was introduced to facilitate reference, and not to indicate any natural or accurate division of the subjects treated in the books. The invention has been by some ascribed to Lanfranc, by others to Langton, both archbishops of Canterbury; but it is now pretty generally agreed that the real inventor was Hugo de Sancto Caro, who lived in the thirteenth century, and wrote a commentary on the Scriptures, and first introduced it, when preparing a concordance of the Latin vulgate.

2. A community of ecclesiastics belonging to a cathedral or collegiate church. The chief or head of the chapter is the dean: the body consists of canons or prebends. In England, as elsewhere, the deans and chapters had the right to choose the bishops; but Henry VIII. assumed this right as a prerogative of the crown. The chapter has now no longer a place in the administration of the diocese during the life of the bishop, but succeeds to the whole episcopal jurisdiction during the vacancy of the see. In Prussia, Protestant bishops have been lately elected, and still more recently an archbishop, without the vote of a chapter, by a mere order of government.

(CHAPTERS, THE THREE, an appellation given in the sixth century to the following productions:—1. The writings of Theodoret of Mopsuestia. 2. The books which Theodoret of Cyrus wrote against the twelve anathemas which Cyril had published against the Nestorians. 3. The letter which Ibas of Edessa had written concerning the council of Ephesus, and the condemnation of Nestorius. These writings being supposed to favour the Nestorian doctrine, Theodore, bishop of Caesarea, who was a zealous Monophysite, prevailed on the Emperor Justinian to publish an edict in the year 544, in which they were ordered to be condemned. This edict was opposed by the African and Western bishops, especially by Vigilius, the Roman pontiff; the consequence of which was that the pontiff was ordered to appear at Constantinople, where he first rejected, and then retracted his rejection of the chapters. They were afterwards condemned anew by Justinian.

CHARGE: 1. A sermon preached by the bishop to his clergy. 2. Among the Dissenters, it is a sermon preached to a minister at his ordination, generally by some aged or able preacher, and containing a view of the Christian ministry in its nature, duties, trials, and encouragements.

CHARITY, one of the three grand theological graces, consisting in the love of God and our neighbour, or the habit or disposition of loving God with all our heart, and our neighbour as ourselves. "Charity," says an able writer, "consists not in speculative ideas of general benevolence floating in the head, and leaving the heart, as speculations often do, untouched and cold; neither is it confined to that indolent goodnature which makes us rest satisfied with being free from inveterate malice, or ill will to our fellow creatures, without prompting us to be of service to any. True charity is an active principle. It is not properly a single virtue; but a disposition residing in the heart as a fountain; whence all the virtues of benignity, candour, forbearance, generosity, compassion, and liberality flow as so many native streams. From general goodwill to all, it extends its influence, particularly to those with whom we stand in nearest connexion, and who are directly within the sphere of our good offices. From the country or community to which we belong, it descends to the smaller associates of neighbourhood, relations, and friends, and spreads itself over the whole circle of social and domestic life. I mean not that it imports a promiscuous undistinguishing affection which gives every man an equal title to our love. Charity, if we should endeavour to carry it so far, would be rendered an impracticable virtue, and would resolve itself into mere words, without affecting the heart. True charity attempts not to shut our eyes to the distinction between good and bad men; not to warm our hearts equally to those who befriend and those who injure us. It reserves our esteem for good men, and our complacency for our friends. Towards our enemies it inspires forgiveness and humanity. It breathes universal candour and liberality of sentiment. It forms gentleness of temper, and dictates affability of manners. It prompts corresponding sympathies with them who rejoice and them who weep. It teaches us to slight and despise no man. Charity is the comforter of the afflicted, the protector of the oppressed, the reconciler of differences, the intercessor for offenders. It is faithfulness in the friend, public spirit in the magistrate, equity and patience in the judge, moderation in the sovereign, and loyalty in the subject. In parents, it is care, and attention; in children, it is reverence and submission. In a word, it is the soul of social life. It is the sun that enlivens and cheers the abodes of men; not a meteor which occasionally glares, but a luminary, which in its orderly and regular course dispenses a benignant influence." See Barrow's Works, vol. i. ser. 27, 28; Blair's Ser., vol. iv. ser. 2; Scott's Ser., ser. 14; Tillotson's Ser., ser. 158; Paley's Mor. Phil., vol. i. p. 231; and articles BENEVOLENCE, LOVE.

CHARM, a kind of spell, supposed by the ignorant to have an irresistible influence, by means of the concurrence of some infernal power, both on the minds, lives, and properties of those whom it has for its object.

"Certain vain ceremonies," says Dr. Doddridge, "which are commonly called charms, and seem to have no efficacy at all for producing the effects proposed by them, are to be avoided; seeing if there be indeed any real efficacy in them, it is generally probable they owe it to some bad cause; for one can hardly imagine that God should permit good angels in any extraordinary manner to interpose, or should immediately exert his own miraculous power on trifling occasions, and upon the performance of such idle tricks as are generally made the condition of receiving such benefits."

CHASIDIM, OR "PRIESTS," a Jewish sect, which we must not confound with the party who took the same name in the time of the Maccabees, and rendered themselves famous by the zeal with which they contended for the national institutions. This sect dates its origin no farther back than the year 1740, when its doctrines were first broached by Israel Baalsham, in the small country-town of Flussty, in Poland. In the course of about twenty years, his fame, as an exorcist, and master of the cabbala, spread to such a degree, that he obtained a great number of followers in Poland, Moldavia, and Wallachia. This Rabbi gave out, that he alone was possessed of the true mystery of the sacred name; that his soul at certain times left the body, in order to receive revelations in the world of spirits; and that he was endowed with miraculous powers, by which he was able to control events, both in the physical and intellectual world. His followers were taught to look to him for the absolution of every crime they might commit; to repress every thing like reflection on the doctrines of religion; to expect the immediate appearance of the Messiah; and, in sickness, to abstain from the use of medicine; assured that their spiritual guides, of whom several made their appearance on the death of the founder, were possessed of such merits as would procure for them instant recovery. The accusations of gross immorality brought against the members of this sect by the Lithuanian Rabbi, Israel Loebel, have been called in question, and are supposed rather to have originated in prejudice, than to have any foundation in truth; but it is affirmed by one who has had the best opportunities of investigating, that their morals are most obnoxious, and that the representations that have been given of them are by no means exaggerated. They are not only at enmity with all the other Jews, but form the bitterest and most bigoted enemies of the Christian religion. They believe that the Messiah, whom they are hourly expecting, will be a mere man, but will come with such an effulgence of glory, as to produce a complete regeneration in the heart of every Jew, and deliver them thenceforth from every evil. To their Rabbins, whom they honour with the name of Zadiks, or "Righteous," they pay almost divine homage. The extravagance of their gestures during their public service entitles them to the appellation of the "Jewish Jumpers." Working themselves up into ecstasies, they break out into fits of laughter, clap their hands, jump up and down the synagogue in the most frantic manner; and turning their faces towards heaven, they clench their fists, and, as it were, dare the Almighty to withhold from them the objects of their requests. This sect has so increased of late years, that in Russian Poland and European Turkey, it is reported to exceed in number that of the Rabbinites in these countries.

CHASTITY, purity from fleshly lust. In men it is termed continence. See CONTINENCE. There is a chastity of speech, behaviour, and imagination, as well as of body. Grove gives us the following rules for the conservation of chastity.—1. To keep ourselves fully employed in labours either of the body or the mind: idleness is frequently the introduction to sensuality.—2. To guard the senses, and avoid every thing which may be an incentive to lust. Does the free use of some meats and drinks make the body ungovernable? Does reading certain books debauch the imagination and inflame the passions? Do temptations often enter by the sight? Have public plays, dancings, effeminate music, idle songs, loose habits, and the like, the same effect? He who resolves upon chastity cannot be ignorant what his duty is in all these and such like cases.—3. To implore the Divine Spirit, which is a spirit of purity; and by the utmost regard to his presence and operations to endeavour to retain him with us. Grove's Moral Philos. p. 2. sec. 6.

CHAZINZARIANS, a sect which arose in Armenia in the seventh century. They are so called from the Armenian word chazus, which signifies a cross, because they were charged with adoring the cross.

CHEREM, (Heb. כֶּרֶם), the second sort of anathema among the Jews. The first (called Niddui) is merely separation, or the lesser excommunication. The second (Cherem), or the greater excommunication, deprived the excommunicated person of most of the advantages of civil society. He could have no commerce with any one, could neither buy nor sell, except such things as were absolutely necessary to life; nor resort to the schools, nor enter into the synagogues; and no one was permitted to eat and drink with him. The sentence of Cherem was to be pronounced by ten persons only, or at least in the presence of ten persons. But the excommunicated person might be absolved by three judges, or even by one, provided he were a doctor of the law. The form of this excommunication was loaded with a multitude of curses and imprecations, taken from different places of the scripture. See ANATHEMA and EXCOMMUNICATION.

CHERUBICAL HYMN. An hymn of great note in the ancient Christian church. The original form of it, as it stands in the Constitutions, was in these words: "Holy, Holy, Holy, Lord God of hosts; heaven and earth are full of thy glory, who art blessed for ever. Amen." This thrice repeating the word "holy" was in imitation of the Seraphim in the vision of Isaiah. Afterwards, the church added some words to it, and sung it in this form: ἅγιος ὁ θεός, ἅγιος ὁ ἰσχυρός, ἅγιος ἀθάνατος, ἐλέησον ἡμᾶς. i. e. "Holy God, Holy Mighty, Holy Immortal, have mercy upon us." This form is ascribed to Proclus, Bishop of Constantinople, and Theodosius the younger, A. D. 446. The church used this form to declare her faith in the Holy Trinity, applying the title of "Holy God" to the Father, "Holy Mighty" to the Son, and "Holy Immortal" to the Holy Ghost. Thus it continued till the Emperor Anastasius, or, as some say, Peter Gnapheus, Bishop of Antioch, caused the words ὁ σταυρώθεις δι' ἡμᾶς, "that was crucified for us," to be added to it: which was done with a view to introduce the heresy of the Theopaschites, who asserted that the divine nature itself suffered on the cross. To avoid this inconvenience, Calandio, Bishop of Antioch in the time of the Emperor Zeno, made another addition to it, of the words "Christ our king," reading it thus: "Holy God, Holy Mighty, Holy Immortal, Christ our king, that was crucified for us, have mercy on us." These last additions occasioned great confusions and tumults in the Eastern church, whilst the Constantinopolitan and Western churches stiffly rejected them, and some, the better to maintain the old way of applying it to the whole Trinity, instead of the words, "crucified for us," expressly said, "Holy Trinity, have mercy on us."

This hymn was chiefly sung in the middle of the communion service; as it is at this day in the communion service of the Church of England. It is likewise called by the Greek name Trisagion, i. e. "thrice holy," from the trine repetition of the word "holy."

CHOIR, that part of a church, or cathedral, where the singers, or choristers, chant, or sing divine service. The word, according to Isidore, is derived à coronis circumstantium, because, anciently, the choristers were disposed round the altar. It is properly the chancel.

In the first Common-Prayer Book of King Edward VI. the rubric at the beginning of morning prayer, ordered the priest, "being in the choir, to begin the Lord's-prayer:" so that it was the custom of the minister to perform divine service at the upper end of the chancel near the altar. Against this, Bucer, by the direction of Calvin, made a great outcry, pretending "it was an antichristian practice for the priest to say prayers only in the choir, a place peculiar to the clergy, and not in the body of the church among the people, who had as much right to divine worship as the clergy." This occasioned an alteration of the rubric, when the Common-Prayer Book was revised in the 5th year of King Edward, and it was ordered, that prayers should be said in such part of the church, "where the people might best hear." However, at the accession of Queen Elizabeth to the throne, the ancient practice was restored, with a dispensing power left in the ordinary of determining it otherwise if he saw just cause. Convenience at last prevailed, and by degrees introduced the custom of reading prayers in the body of the church, so that now service is no longer performed in the choir or chancel, excepting in cathedrals.

CHOREPISCOPI (της χωρας ἐπισκοποι, bishops of the country.) In the ancient church, when the dioceses became enlarged by the conversions of pagans in the country and villages at a great distance from the city church, the bishops appointed themselves certain assistants whom they called Chorepiscopi, because by their office they were bishops of the country. There have been great disputes among the learned concerning this order, some thinking that they were mere presbyters; others that there were two sorts, some that had received episcopal ordination, and some that were presbyters only; others think that they were all bishops. See Campbell's Lect. on Eccles. Hist. Lect. vii.

CHRISM, oil consecrated by the bishop, and used in the Romish and Greek churches in the administration of baptism, confirmation, ordination, and extreme unction.

CHRISOME, in the office of baptism, was a white vesture which the priest put upon the child, saying, "Take this white vesture for a token of innocence."

CHRIST, the Lord and Saviour of mankind. He is called Christ, or Messiah, because he is anointed, sent, and furnished by God to execute his mediatorial office. See JESUS CHRIST.

CHRISTIAN, a term used in a more lax and vague sense to denote one who professes the religion of Christ, or who does not belong to any of the other divisions of mankind, such as Jews, Mohammedans, Deists, Pagans and Atheists; or, in a more strict, scriptural, and theological sense, one who really believes the gospel, imbibes the spirit, is influenced by the grace, and obedient to the will of Christ. The former is merely political and conventional; the latter is sacred and proper.

The disciples and followers of Christ, were first denominated Christians at Antioch, A. D. 42. They distinguished themselves in the most remarkable manner, by their conduct and their virtues. The faithful, whom the preaching of St. Peter had converted, hearkened attentively to the exhortations of the apostles, who failed not carefully to instruct them as persons who were entering upon an entire new life. They attended the temple daily, doing nothing different from the other Jews, because it was yet not time to separate from them. But they made a still greater progress in virtue; for they sold all that they possessed, and distributed their goods to the wants of their brethren. The primitive Christians were not only remarkable for the consistency of their conduct, but were also very eminently distinguished by the many miraculous gifts and graces bestowed by God upon them.

The Jews were the first and the most inveterate enemies the Christians had. They put them to death as often as they had it in their power; and when they revolted against the Romans, in the time of the emperor Adrian, Barchochebas, who was at the head of that revolt, employed against the Christians the most rigorous punishments to compel them to blasphemy and renounce Jesus Christ. And we find that even in the third century they endeavoured to get into their hands Christian women, in order to scourge and stone them in their synagogues. They cursed the Christians three times a day in their synagogues; and their rabbins would not allow them to converse with Christians upon any occasion; nor were they contented to hate and detest them, but they despatched emissaries all over the world to defame the Christians, and spread all sorts of calumnies against them. They accused them, among other things, of worshipping the sun, and the head of an ass; they reproached them with idleness, and being a useless set of people. They charged them with treason, and endeavouring to erect a new monarchy against that of the Romans. They affirmed, that in celebrating their mysteries, they used to kill a child, and eat his flesh. They accused them of the most shocking incests, and of intemperance in their feasts of charity. But the lives and behaviour of the first Christians were sufficient to refute all that was said against them, and evidently demonstrated that these accusations were mere calumny, and the effect of inveterate malice.

Pliny the younger, who was governor of Pontus and Bithynia between the years 103 and 105, gives a very particular account of the Christians in that province, in a letter which he wrote to the emperor Trajan, of which the following is an extract: "I take the liberty, Sir, to give you an account of every difficulty which arises to me: I had never been present at the examinations of the Christians; for which reason I know not what questions have been put to them, nor in what manner they have been punished. My behaviour towards those who have been accused to me, has been this: I have interrogated them, in order to know whether they were really Christians. When they have confessed it, I have repeated the same question two or three times, threatening them with death if they did not renounce this religion. Those who have persisted in their confession have been by my order led to punishment. I have even met with some Roman citizens guilty of this frenzy, whom, in regard to their quality, I have set apart from the rest, in order to send them to Rome. These persons declare that their whole crime, if they are guilty, consists in this: that on certain days they assemble before sunrise, to sing alternately the praises of Christ, as of God; and to oblige themselves, by the performance of their religious rites, not to be guilty of theft or adultery, to observe inviolably their word, and to be true to their trust. This disposition has obliged me to endeavour to inform myself still further of this matter, by putting to the torture two of their women-servants whom they called deaconesses; but I could learn nothing more from them than that the superstition of these people is as ridiculous as their attachment to it is astonishing."

It is easy to discover the cause of the many persecutions to which the Christians were exposed during the first three centuries. The purity of the Christian morality, directly opposite to the corruption of the pagans, was doubtless one of the most powerful motives of the public aversion. To this may be added the many calumnies unjustly spread about concerning them by their enemies, particularly the Jews; and this occasioned so strong a prejudice against them, that the pagans condemned them without inquiring into their doctrine, or permitting them to defend themselves. Besides, their worshipping Jesus Christ as God, was contrary to one of the most ancient laws of the Roman empire, which expressly forbade the acknowledging of any god which had not been approved of by the senate. But, notwithstanding the violent opposition made to the establishment of the Christian religion, it gained ground daily, and very soon made surprising progress in the Roman empire. In the third century there were Christians in the senate, in the camp, in the palace; in short every where but in the temple and the theatres; they filled the towns, the country, and the islands. Men and women of all ages and conditions, and even those of the first dignities, embraced the faith; insomuch that the pagans complained that the revenues of their temples were ruined. They were in such great numbers in the empire, that (as Tertullian expresses it) were they to have retired into another country, they would have left the Romans only a frightful solitude. For persecutions of the Christians, see PERSECUTION.

Christians may be considered as nominal and real. There are vast numbers who are called Christians, not because they possess any love for Christ, but because they happen to be born in what is called a Christian country, educated by Christian parents, and sometimes attend Christian worship. There are also many whose minds are well informed respecting the Christian system, who prefer it to every other, and who may make an open profession of it; and yet, after all, feel but little of the real power of Christianity. A real Christian is one whose understanding is enlightened by the influences of divine grace, who is convinced of the depravity of his nature, who sees his own inability to help himself, who is taught to behold God as the chief good, the Lord Jesus as the only way to obtain felicity, and the Holy Spirit as the grand agent in applying the blessings of the Gospel to his soul. His heart is renovated, and inclined to revere, honour, worship, trust in, and live to God. His affections are elevated above the world, and centre in God alone. He embraces him as his portion, loves him supremely, and is zealous in the defence and support of his cause. His temper is regulated, his powers roused to vigorous action, his thoughts spiritual, and his general deportment amiable and uniform. In fine, the true Christian character exceeds all others as much as the blaze of the meridian sun outshines the feeble light of the glowworm.

CHRISTIANS OF ST. THOMAS, a sect of Christians on the coast of Malabar, in the East Indies, to which region the Apostle Thomas is said to have carried the gospel. They belong to those Christians who, in the year 499, united to form a Syrian and Chaldean church, in central and eastern Asia, and are, like them, Nestorians; but it is supposed they existed much earlier, as they are believed to be the Indian Christians from whom a bishop came to the council at Nice in 325. They have retained rather more strongly than the more western Nestorians, the features of their descent from the earliest Christian communities. They still celebrate the agape; portion maidens from the property of the church; and provide for the poor. Their ideas respecting the Lord's Supper incline to those of the Protestants, but in celebrating it they use bread with salt and oil. At the time of baptism they anoint the body of the infant with oil. These two ceremonies, with that of the consecration of priests, are the only sacraments which they acknowledge. Their priests are distinguished by the tonsure, are allowed to marry, and were, till the sixteenth century, under a Nestorian patriarch at Babylon, now at Mosul, from whom they receive their bishop, and upon whom they are also dependent for the consecration of their priests. Their churches contain, except the cross, no symbols nor pictures. Their liturgy is similar to the Syrian, and is performed in the Syrian language.

When the Portuguese occupied the East Indies, the Roman Catholic clergy endeavoured to subject the Christians of St. Thomas to the government of the Pope. The archbishop of Goa succeeded, in 1599, in persuading them to submit, and form part of his diocese; in consequence of which they were obliged to renounce the Nestorian faith, adopt a few Catholic ceremonies, and obey a Jesuit, who became their bishop. But after the Portuguese were supplanted by the Dutch, on the coast of Malabar, this union ceased, and they returned to their ancient forms. At present their number amounts to nearly 80,000. They are, under the British government, free from any ecclesiastical restraint, and form among themselves a kind of spiritual republic, under a bishop chosen by themselves, and in which the priests and elders administer justice, using excommunication as a means of punishment. Col. Munro, the late Resident at Travancore, interested himself much for this people, and erected a college at Chotim, for the education both of priests and others, and he made an endowment to support a number of teachers and students. In their political relations to the natives they belong to the class of the Nairs, or nobility of the second rank, are allowed to ride on elephants, and to carry on commerce and agriculture, instead of practising mechanical trades, like the lower classes. Travellers describe them as very ignorant, but at the same time of very good morals. See Monthly Mag. for 1804, p. 60, and Dr. Kerr's Report to Lord Bentinck, on the state of the Christians inhabiting the kingdom of Cochin and Travancore.—Evan. Mag. 1807, p. 473.

CHRISTIANITY, the religion of Christians.

I. CHRISTIANITY, foundation of.—Most, if not all, Christians, whatever their particular tenets may be, acknowledge the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments as the sole foundation of their faith and practice. But as these books, or at least particular passages in them, have, from the ambiguity of language, been variously interpreted by different commentators, these diversities have given birth to a multiplicity of different sects. These, however, or, at least, the greatest number of them, appeal to the scriptures of the Old and New Testaments as the ultimate standard—the only infallible rule of faith and manners. If asked by what authority these books claim an absolute right to determine the consciences and understandings of men with regard to what they should believe, and what they should do, they answer, that all Scripture, whether for doctrine, correction, or reproof, was given by immediate inspiration from God. If again interrogated how those books which they call Scriptures are authenticated, they reply, that the Old and New Testaments are proved to be the word of God, by evidences both external and internal. See § 2, and article REVELATION.

II. CHRISTIANITY, evidences of the truth of.—The external evidences of the authenticity and divine authority of the Scriptures have been divided into direct and collateral. The direct evidences are such as arise from the nature, consistency, and probability of the facts, and from the simplicity, uniformity, competency, and fidelity of the testimonies by which they are supported. The collateral evidences are either the same occurrences supported by heathen testimonies, or others which concur with and corroborate the history of Christianity. Its internal evidences arise either from its exact conformity with the character of God, from its aptitude to the frame and circumstances of man, or from those supernatural convictions and assistances which are impressed on the mind by the immediate operation of the Divine Spirit. We shall here chiefly follow Dr. Doddridge, and endeavour to give some of the chief evidences which have been brought forward, and which every unprejudiced mind must confess are unanswerable.

First. Taking the matter merely in theory, it will appear highly probable that such a system as the Gospel should be, indeed, a divine revelation. 1. The case of mankind is naturally such as to need a divine revelation, 1 John v. 19; Rom. i.; Eph. iv. 2. There is from the light of nature considerable encouragement to hope that God would favour his creatures with so needful a blessing as a revelation appears. 3. We may easily conclude, that if a revelation were given, it would be introduced and transmitted in such a manner as Christianity is said to have been. 4. That the main doctrines of the gospel are of such a nature as we might in general suppose those of a divine revelation would be—rational, practical, and sublime—Heb. xi. 6; Mark xii. 20; 1 Tim. ii. 5; Matt. v. 48; x. 29, 30; Philippians iv. 8; Rom. ii. 6—10.

Secondly. It is, in fact, certain that Christianity is, indeed, a divine revelation: for, I. The books of the New Testament, now in our hands, were written by the first preachers and publishers of Christianity. In proof of this, observe, 1. That it is certain that Christianity is not a new religion, but that it was maintained by great multitudes quickly after the time in which Jesus is said to have appeared. 2. That there was certainly such a person as Jesus of Nazareth, who was crucified at Jerusalem, when Pontius Pilate was governor there. 3. The first publishers of this religion wrote books which contained an account of the life and doctrine of Jesus their master, and which went by the name of those that now make up our New Testament. 4. That the books of the New Testament have been preserved, in the main, uncorrupted to the present time, in the original language in which they were written. 5. That the translation of them now in our hands may be depended upon as, in all things most material, agreeable to the original. Now, II. From allowing the New Testament to be genuine, according to the above proof, it will certainly follow that Christianity is a divine revelation; for, in the first place, it is exceedingly evident that the writers of the New Testament certainly knew whether the facts were true or false. John i. 3; xix. 27, 35; Acts xxvii. 7—9. 2. That the character of these writers, so far as we can judge by their works, seems to render them worthy of regard, and leaves no room to imagine they intended to deceive us. The manner in which they tell their story is most happily adapted to gain our belief. There is no air of declamation and harangue; nothing that looks like artifice and design; no apologies, no encomiums, no characters, no reflections, no digressions; but the facts are recounted with great simplicity, just as they seem to have happened; and those facts are left to speak for themselves. Their integrity, likewise, evidently appears in the freedom with which they mention those circumstances which might have exposed their Master and themselves to the greatest contempt amongst prejudiced and inconsiderate men, such as they knew they must generally expect to meet with. John i. 45, 46; vii. 52; Luke ii. 4, 7; Mark vi. 3; Matt. viii. 20; John vii. 48. It is certain that there are in their writings the most genuine traces not only of a plain and honest, but a most pious and devout, a most benevolent and generous disposition, as every one must acknowledge who reads their writings. 3. The apostles were under no temptation to forge a story of this kind, or to publish it to the world, knowing it to be false. 4. Had they done so, humanly speaking, they must quickly have perished in it, and their foolish cause must have died with them, without ever gaining any credit in the world. Reflect more particularly on the nature of those grand facts, the death, resurrection, and exaltation of Christ, which formed the great foundation of the Christian scheme, as first exhibited by the apostles. The resurrection of a dead man, and his ascension into an abode in the upper world, were such strange things, that a thousand objections would immediately have been raised against them; and some extraordinary proof would have been justly required as a balance to them. Consider the manner in which the apostles undertook to prove the truth of their testimony to these facts; and it will evidently appear that, instead of confirming their scheme, it must have been sufficient utterly to have overthrown it, had it been itself the most probable imposture that the wit of man could ever have contrived. See Acts iii., ix., xiv., xix., &c. They did not merely assert that they had seen miracles wrought by Jesus, but that he had endowed them with a variety of miraculous powers; and these they undertook to display, not in such idle and useless tricks as sleight of hand might perform, but in such solid and important works as appeared worthy of divine interposition, and entirely superior to human power. Nor were these things undertaken in a corner, in a circle of friends or dependents; nor were they said to be wrought, as might be suspected, by any confederates in the fraud; but they were done often in the most public manner. Would impostors have made such pretensions as these? or, if they had, must they not immediately have been exposed and ruined? Now, if the New Testament be genuine, then it is certain that the apostles pretend to have wrought miracles in the very presence of those to whom their writings were addressed; nay, more, they profess likewise to have conferred those miraculous gifts in some considerable degrees on others, even on the very persons to whom they write, and they appeal to their consciences as to the truth of it. And could there possibly be room for delusion here? 5. It is likewise certain that the apostles did gain early credit, and succeeded in a most wonderful manner. This is abundantly proved by the vast number of churches established in early ages at Rome, Corinth, Ephesus, Colosse, &c. &c. 6. That, admitting the facts which they testified concerning Christ to be true, then it was reasonable for their contemporaries, and is reasonable for us, to receive the Gospel which they have transmitted to us as a divine revelation. The great thing they asserted was, that Jesus was the Christ, and that he was proved to be so by prophecies accomplished in him, and by miracles wrought by him, and by others in his name. If we attend to these, we shall find them to be no contemptible arguments; but must be forced to acknowledge that, the premises being established, the conclusion most easily and necessarily follows; and this conclusion, that Jesus is the Christ, taken in all its extent, is an abstract of the Gospel revelation, and therefore is sometimes put for the whole of it. Acts viii. 37; xvii. 18. (See articles MIRACLE and PROPHECY.) 7. The truth of the Gospel has also received further and very considerable confirmation from what has happened in the world since it was first published. And here we must desire every one to consider what God has been doing to confirm the Gospel since its first publication, and he will find it a further evidence of its divine original. We might argue at large from its surprising propagation in the world; from the miraculous powers with which not only the apostles, but succeeding preachers of the Gospel, and other converts, were endowed; from the accomplishment of prophecies recorded in the New Testament; and from the preservation of the Jews as a distinct people, notwithstanding the various difficulties and persecutions through which they have passed. We must not, however, forget to mention the confirmation it receives from the methods which its enemies have taken to destroy it; and these have generally been either persecution or falsehood, or cavilling at some particulars in Revelation, without entering into the grand argument on which it is built, and fairly debating what is offered in its defence. The cause has gained considerably by the opposition made to it; the more it has been tried, the more it has been approved; and we are bold to say no honest man, unfettered by prejudice, can examine this system in all its parts, without being convinced that its origin is divine.

III. CHRISTIANITY, general doctrines of.—“It must be obvious,” says an ingenious author, “to every reflecting mind, that, whether we attempt to form the idea of any religion à priori, or contemplate those which have already been exhibited, certain facts, principles, or data must be pre-established; from whence will result a particular frame of mind, and course of action suitable to the character and dignity of that Being by whom the religion is enjoined, and adapted to the nature and situation of those agents who are commanded to observe it. Hence Christianity may be divided into credenda, or doctrines, and agenda, or precepts. As the great foundation of his religion, therefore, the Christian believes the existence and government of one eternal and infinite Essence, which for ever retains in itself the cause of its own existence, and inherently possesses all those perfections which are compatible with its nature; such are its almighty power, omniscient wisdom, infinite justice, boundless goodness, and universal presence. In this indivisible essence the Christian recognizes three distinct subsistences, yet distinguished in such a manner as not to be incompatible either with essential unity, or simplicity of being, or with their personal distinction; each of them possesses the same nature and properties to the same extent. This infinite Being was graciously pleased to create a universe replete with intelligences, who might enjoy his glory, participate his happiness, and imitate his perfections. But as these beings were not immutable, but left to the freedom of their own will, degeneracy took place, and that in a rank of intelligence superior to man. But guilt is never stationary. Impatient of itself, and cursed with its own feelings, it proceeds from bad to worse, whilst the poignancy of its torments increases with the number of its perpetrations. Such was the situation of Satan and his apostate angels. They attempted to transfer their turpitude and misery to man, and were, alas! but too successful. Hence the heterogeneous and irreconcilable principles which operate in his nature; hence that inexplicable medley of wisdom and folly, of rectitude and error, of benevolence and malignity, of sincerity and fraud, exhibited through his whole conduct; hence the darkness of his understanding, the depravity of his will, the pollution of his heart, the irregularity of his affections, and the absolute subversion of his whole internal economy. The seeds of perdition soon ripened into overt acts of guilt and horror. All the hostilities of nature were confronted, and the whole sublunary creation became a theatre of disorder and mischief. Here the Christian once more appeals to fact and experience. If these things are so—if man be the vassal of guilt, and the victim of misery, he demands how this constitution of things can be accounted for? how can it be supposed that a being so wicked and unhappy should be the production of an infinitely good and infinitely perfect Creator? He, therefore, insists that human nature must have been disarranged and contaminated by some violent shock, and that, of consequence, without the light diffused over the face of things by Christianity, all nature must remain in inscrutable and inexplicable mystery. To redress these evils, to re-establish the empire of rectitude and happiness, to restore the nature of man to its primitive dignity, to satisfy the remonstrances of infinite justice, to purify every original or contracted stain, to expiate the guilt and destroy the power of vice, the Son of God, from whom Christianity takes its name, and to whom it owes its origin, descended from the bosom of his Father, assumed the human nature, became the representative of man; endured a severe probation in that character; exhibited a pattern of perfect righteousness, and at last ratified his doctrine, and fully accomplished all the ends of his mission, by a cruel, unmerited, and ignominious death. Before he left the world, he delivered the doctrines of salvation, and the rules of human conduct, to his apostles, whom he empowered to instruct the world in all that concerned their eternal felicity, and whom he invested with miraculous gifts to ascertain the reality of what they taught. To them he likewise promised another comforter, even the Divine Spirit, who should remove the darkness, console the woes, and purify the stains of human nature. Having remained for a part of three days under the power of death, he rose again from the grave; appeared to his disciples, and many others; conversed with them for some time, then re-ascended to heaven; from whence the Christian expects him, according to his promise, to appear as the Sovereign Judge of the living and the dead, from whose awards there is no appeal, and by whose sentence the destiny of the righteous and the wicked shall be eternally fixed. Soon after his departure to the right hand of his Father (where, in his human nature, he sits supreme of all created beings, and invested with the absolute administration of heaven and earth,) the Spirit of grace and consolation descended on his apostles with visible signatures of divine power and presence. Nor were his salutary operations confined to them, but extended to all who did not by obstinate guilt repel his influences. These, indeed, were less conspicuous than at the glorious era when they were visibly exhibited in the persons of the apostles. But though his energy be less observable, it is by no means less effectual to all the purposes of grace and mercy. The Christian is convinced that there is, and shall continue to be, a society upon earth who worship God as revealed in Jesus Christ, who believe his doctrines, who observe his precepts, and who shall be saved by the merits of his death, in the use of these external means of salvation which he hath appointed. He also believes that the sacraments of Baptism and the Lord's Supper, the interpretation and application of Scripture, the habitual exercise of public and private devotion, are obviously calculated to diffuse and promote the interests of truth and religion, by superinducing the salutary habits of faith, love, and repentance. He is firmly persuaded that, at the consummation of all things, when the purposes of Providence, in the various revolutions of progressive nature are accomplished, the whole human race shall once more issue from their graves; some to immortal felicity in the actual perception and enjoyment of their Creator's presence, and others to everlasting shame and misery."

CHRISTIANITY, morality and superiority &c. —It has been well observed, "that the two grand principles of action, according to the Christian, are the love of God, which is the sovereign passion in every gracious mind, and the love of man, which regulates our actions according to the various relations in which we stand, whether to communities or individuals. This sacred connexion ought never to be totally extinguished by any temporary injury. It ought to subsist in some degree even among enemies. It requires that we should pardon the offences of others, as we expect pardon for our own; and that we should no further resist evil than is necessary for the preservation of personal rights and social happiness. It dictates every relative and reciprocal duty between parents and children, masters and servants, governors and subjects, friends and friends, men and men; nor does it merely enjoin the observation of equity, but likewise inspires the most sublime and extensive charity—a boundless and disinterested effusion of tenderness for the whole species, which feels their distress, and operates for their relief and improvement.”

“Christianity,” it has also been observed, (and with the greatest propriety,) “is superior to all other religions. The disciple of Jesus not only contends, that no system of religion has ever yet been exhibited so consistent with itself, so congruous to philosophy and the common sense of mankind, as Christianity; he likewise avers that it is infinitely more productive of real consolation than all other religious or philosophical tenets which have ever entered into the soul, or been applied to the heart of man. For what is death to that mind which considers eternity as the career of its existence? What are the frowns of men to him who claims an eternal world as his inheritance? What is the loss of friends to that heart which feels, with more than natural conviction, that it shall quickly rejoin them in a more tender, intimate, and permanent intercourse, than any of which the present life is susceptible? What are the vicissitudes of external things to a mind which strongly and uniformly anticipates a state of endless and immutable felicity? What are mortifications, disappointments, and insults, to a spirit which is conscious of being the original offspring and adopted child of God; which knows that its omnipotent Father will, in proper time, effectually assert the dignity and privileges of its nature? In a word, as this earth is but a speck in the creation, as time is not an instant in proportion to eternity, such are the hopes and prospects of the Christian in comparison of every sublunary misfortune or difficulty. It is, therefore, in his judgment, the eternal wonder of angels, and indelible opprobrium of man, that a religion so worthy of God, so suitable to the frame and circumstances of our nature, so consonant to all the dictates of reason, so friendly to the dignity and improvement of intelligent beings, so pregnant with genuine comfort and delight, should be rejected and despised by any of the human race.”

V. CHRISTIANITY, external propagation of.—The first community of the followers of Christ was formed at Jerusalem, soon after the death and resurrection of their master. Another at Antioch, in Syria, first assumed, about the year 45, the name of Christians, which had originally been given them by their enemies, as a term of reproach; and the travels and ministry of the apostles, and other missionaries, soon spread Christianity through the Roman empire. Palestine, Syria, Natolia, Greece, the islands of the Mediterranean, Italy, and the northern coast of Africa, as early as the first century, contained numerous societies of Christians. Their lives were spiritual and holy, their ecclesiastical practices simple, and conformable to the nature of their religion, and the humble circumstances in which they were placed, and they continued to acquire strength amidst all kinds of persecution. At the end of the second century, Christians were to be found in all the provinces; and at the end of the third century almost half the inhabitants of the Roman empire, and of several neighbouring countries, professed the faith of Christ. About this time, endeavours to preserve a unity of belief, and of church discipline, occasioned numberless disputes among those of different opinions, and led to the establishment of an ecclesiastical tyranny, than which nothing is more contrary to the spirit and design of Christianity. At the beginning of the fourth century, when the Christians obtained toleration by means of Constantine the Great, and their religion became that of the empire, the bishops assumed to themselves the power of authoritatively deciding on matters of faith, and making enactments relative to the government of the church. Their views were promoted by the favour of the emperors, (with slight interruptions in the reign of Julian, and some of his successors,) by the increased splendour and various ceremonials of public worship; by the decline of classical learning; the increasing superstition resulting from the increase of ignorance; and by the establishment of convents and monks. In this form, appealing more to the senses than to the understanding, Christianity, which had been introduced among the Goths in the fourth century, was spread among the other Teutonic nations in the west and north of Europe, and subjected to its power, during the seventh and eighth centuries, the rude warriors who founded new kingdoms on the ruins of the Western Empire, while it was losing ground in Asia and Africa, before the encroachment of the Saracens, by whose rigorous measures hundreds of thousands of professed Christians were converted to Mohammedanism; the heretical sects which had been disowned by the orthodox church, being almost the only Christians who maintained their profession in the East.

During the progress of Mohammedanism, which in Europe extended only to Spain and Sicily, the Popes of Rome, who were advancing systematically to the ecclesiastical domination in the west, gained more in the north, and soon after in the east of this quarter of the world, by the conversion of the Slavonic and Scandinavian nations, than they had lost in other regions. For the Mohammedans had chiefly overrun the territory of the Eastern Church, which had been since the fifth century no longer one with the Western, and had by degrees become entirely separate from it. In the tenth century that church received a large accession of adherents, by the conversion of the Russians, who have ever since continued to be its principal supporters. But the crusaders, who were led partly by religious enthusiasm, partly by the desire of conquest and adventure, to attempt the recovery of the holy sepulchre, gained the new kingdom of Jerusalem, not for the Greek emperor, but for themselves and the Papal hierarchy. The confusion which this finally unsuccessful undertaking introduced into the civil and domestic affairs of the western nations, gave the Roman Church a favourable opportunity of increasing its possessions, and asserting its pretensions to universal monarchy. The intercourse of nations, however, and the return of the crusaders, combined with more liberal views propagated by individuals of a more philosophic turn of mind, and above all, the indignation excited by the scandalous corruptions and vices of the clergy, stood greatly in its way. These kindled an opposition among all the societies and sects against the hierarchy. The foundation and multiplication of ecclesiastical orders, particularly the Franciscans and Dominicans, professedly for the care of souls and the instruction of the people, which had been neglected by the secular priests, did not remedy the evil, because they laboured, in general, more actively to promote the interests of the church and the papacy, than to remove superstition and ignorance; and bold speculations which would not yield to their persuasions, were less likely to be extirpated by the power of the Inquisition, which armed itself with fire and sword. The vast difference of religion, as then taught and practised, from the religion of Jesus Christ; the utter insufficiency of what the church taught to satisfy the mind and heart of men, in reference to their religious wants, became obvious to numbers, partly from their knowledge of Christianity derived from the Bible, which now began to be studied in secret, in spite of the prohibitions of the church; and partly from the bold eloquence and undaunted appeals of individuals among those who were disgusted with prevailing abuses. The ecclesiastical orders were also desirous of pursuing an independent course; offended princes forgot the services of the papal power, in promoting the civilization of barbarous nations, in the first centuries of the middle ages; and the Popes themselves made little effort to reform or conceal the corruption of their court and of the clergy. They even afforded the scandalous spectacle of a schism in the church, which was distracted for more than thirty years, by the quarrels between her candidates, who both asserted their right to the papal chair. Nor could any thing settle this dispute but the decrees of the council of Constance, (1414—1418,) which were very unfavourable to the papal power. The doctrines of Wickliffe had already given rise to a party opposed to the popedom; and the secession of the adherents of the Bohemian reformation extorted from the council of Basle certain compacts, which being firmly maintained, proved to the friends of reformation what might be effected by a firm and united opposition to the abuses of the Roman Church.

At length Luther was raised up, who, in conjunction with a noble band of witnesses for the truth, exposed the unscriptural dogmas and corrupt practice of the papal hierarchy, translated the Scriptures into the vernacular languages of the nations of Europe; pronounced the authority of God, as expressed in the Bible, to be the ultimate standard of appeal, and opened and explained the divine word in its various and important bearings on the highest interests of man. A spirit of free inquiry was thus awakened, which has not ceased, to the present hour, to produce effects favourable to the emancipation of the human mind both from secular and spiritual tyranny; and in proportion as its legitimate influence has been felt, have been the advantages accruing to the interests of genuine Christianity. Not only has the light of the gospel dispelled to a great extent the mists of ignorance and superstition, in which the whole of Europe was involved, but the religion of Christ, in its purer forms, has been conveyed by the colonists to America, where its benign influence is extensively felt, and from which, there is reason to believe, it will ere long be extended over the southern regions of that vast continent, where unexampled cruelties have for centuries been exercised by the votaries of Roman superstition.

Notwithstanding the obstacles which have been thrown in the way of Christianity, partly by the abettors of infidelity, the apathy and divisions of Protestantism, the unscriptural doctrines that have been taught by many of its ministers, and the unholy effects which have resulted from the connexion of church and state, that divine system has been gradually gaining ground, and is now making rapid progress towards universal conquest. By the exertion of missionary, Bible, tract, and other societies, the truth is not only being brought prominently to light throughout Europe, but in Africa, India, and the islands of the Pacific, its power has been extensively felt; and the period seems rapidly approaching when, in fulfilment of ancient prophecy, the knowledge of the Lord shall cover the earth, as the waters do the sea.

VI. CHRISTIANITY, success of.—Despised as Christianity has been by many, yet it has had an extensive progress through the world, and still continues to be professed by great numbers of mankind; though it is to be lamented many are unacquainted with its genuine influence. It was early and rapidly propagated through the whole Roman empire, which then contained almost the whole known world; and herein we cannot but admire both the wisdom and the power of God. "Destitute of all human advantages," says a good writer, "protected by no authority, assisted by no art; not recommended by the reputation of its author, not enforced by eloquence in its advocates, the word of God grew mightily, and prevailed. Twelve men, poor, artless, and illiterate, we behold triumphing over the fiercest and most determined opposition; over the tyranny of the magistrate, and the subtleties of the philosopher; over the prejudices of the Gentile, and the bigotry of the Jew. They established a religion which held forth high and venerable mysteries, such as the pride of man would induce him to suspect, because he could not perfectly comprehend them; which preached doctrines pure and spiritual, such as corrupt nature was prone to oppose, because it shrunk from the severity of their discipline; which required its followers to renounce almost every opinion they had embraced as sacred, and every interest they had pursued as important; which even exposed them to every species of danger and infamy; to persecution unmerited and unpitied; to the gloom of a prison, and to the pangs of death. Hopeless as this prospect might appear to the view of short-sighted man, the Gospel yet emerged from the obscurity in which it was likely to be overwhelmed by the complicated distresses of its friends, and the unrelenting cruelty of its foes. It succeeded in a peculiar degree, and in a peculiar manner; it derived that success from truth, and obtained it under circumstances where falsehood must have been detected and crushed."

"Although," says the elegant Porteus, "Christianity has not always been so well understood, or so honestly practised, as it ought to have been; although its spirit has been often mistaken, and its precepts misapplied, yet, under all these disadvantages, it has gradually produced a visible change in those points which most materially concern the peace and quiet of the world. Its beneficent spirit has spread itself through all the different relations and modifications of life, and communicated its kindly influence to almost every public and private concern of mankind. It has insensibly worked itself into the inmost frame and constitution of civil states. It has given a tinge to the complexion of their governments, to the temper and administration of their laws. It has restrained the spirit of the prince and the madness of the people. It has softened the rigour of despotism, and tamed the insolence of conquest. It has, in some degree, taken away the edge of the sword, and thrown even over the horrors of war a veil of mercy. It has descended into families, has diminished the pressure of private tyranny; improved every domestic endearment; given tenderness to the parent, humanity to the master, respect to superiors, to inferiors, ease; so that mankind are, upon the whole, even in a temporal view, under infinite obligations to the mild and pacific temper of the Gospel, and have reaped from it more substantial worldly benefits than from any other institution upon earth. As one proof of this, among many others, consider only the shocking carnage made in the human species by the exposure of infants, the gladiatorial shows, which sometimes cost Europe twenty or thirty thousand lives in a month; and the exceedingly cruel usage of slaves, allowed and practised by the ancient pagans. These were not the accidental and temporary excesses of a sudden fury, but were legal and established, and constant methods of murdering and tormenting mankind. Had Christianity done nothing more than brought into disuse, as it confessedly has done, the two former of these inhuman customs entirely, and the latter to a very great degree, it had justly merited the title of the benevolent religion; but this is far from being all. Throughout the more enlightened parts of Christendom there prevails a gentleness of manners widely different from the ferocity of the most civilized nations of antiquity; and that liberality with which every species of distress is relieved, is a virtue peculiar to the Christian name."

But we may ask further, what success has it had on the mind of man, as it respects his eternal welfare? How many thousands have felt its power, rejoiced in its benign influence, and under its dictates been constrained to devote themselves to the glory and praise of God? Burdened with guilt, incapable of finding relief from human resources, the mind has here found peace unspeakable, in beholding that sacrifice which alone could atone for transgression. Here the hard and impenitent heart has been softened, the impetuous passions restrained, the ferocious temper subdued, powerful prejudices conquered, ignorance dispelled, and the obstacles to real happiness removed. Here the Christian, looking round on the glories and blandishments of this world, has been enabled, with a noble contempt, to despise all. Here death itself, the king of terrors, has lost its sting; and the soul, with a holy magnanimity, has borne up in the agonies of a dying hour, and sweetly sung itself away to everlasting bliss.

In respect to its future spread, we have reason to believe that all nations shall feel its happy effects. The prophecies are pregnant with matter as to this belief. It seems that not only a nation or a country, but the whole habitable globe, shall become the kingdom of our Lord and of his Christ: and who is there that has ever known the excellency of this system; who is there that has ever experienced its happy efficacy; who is there that has ever been convinced of its divine origin, its delightful nature, and peaceful tendency, but what must join the benevolent and royal poet in saying, "Let the whole earth be filled with its glory, amen, and amen?"

Encyclop.*, art. CHRISTIANITY; and Milman's History of Christianity.

CHRISTIANS, pronounced Christians, the name of a denomination in the United States of America, adopted to express their renunciation of all sectarianism. They sprang up about the year 1800, and have become numerous in all parts of the country, the number of their churches being estimated at about 1000; that of their communicants from 75,000 to 100,000, and that of persons attending their ministry, nearly 300,000. Each church is an independent body; they recognize no creed, nor do they admit of any authority in matters of doctrine; the scriptures, which every individual must interpret for himself, are their only rule of faith: admission into the church is obtained by a simple profession of belief in Christianity, accompanied by evidence of sincerity and piety. In New England they separated principally from the Calvinistic Baptists; in the southern states, from the Methodists; and in the western, from the Presbyterians. There was, therefore, at first, a great diversity of opinion and practice among them, each church retaining some of the peculiarities of the sect from which it seceded. In New England, the churches were established on the principle of close communion, which was soon abandoned. In the south and west they were Pædobaptists, but have since become Baptists. Nearly all were originally Trinitarians; but the doctrine of the Trinity, and other concomitant doctrines, they have now abandoned. To maintain a connexion between the churches, one or more conferences are formed in each state, consisting of members delegated from each church. In 1833 there were thirty-two of these conferences, which again form by delegation the United States General Christian Conference. They have several periodical works ("Christian Herald," Portsmouth, New Hampshire; "Gospel Luminary," New York; "Christian Messenger," Kentucky,) but no theological seminary, believing that whoever understands the gospel may teach it. They consider Christ to be the Son of God, miraculously conceived, whose death was a ratification of the new covenant, not a propitiatory sacrifice; and the Holy Spirit as the power or energy of God exerted in correcting the wicked and strengthening the good.

CHRISTMAS, the day on which the nativity of our blessed Saviour is celebrated.

The first traces that we find of the observation of this day, are in the second century, about the time of the Emperor Commodus. The decretal epistles, indeed, carry it up a little higher, and say that Telesphorus, who lived in the reign of Antoninus Pius, ordered divine service to be celebrated, and an angelic hymn to be sung the night before the nativity of our Saviour. That it was kept before the time of Constantine we have a melancholy proof; for whilst the persecution raged under Dioclesian, who then kept his court at Nicomedia, that tyrant, among other acts of cruelty, finding multitudes of Christians assembled together to celebrate Christ's nativity, commanded the church doors where they were met to be shut, and fire to be put to it, which soon reduced them and the church to ashes.

In the Roman Church three masses are performed:—one at midnight, one at day-break, and one in the morning; and both in the Greek and Roman Churches the Manger, the Holy Family, &c., are sometimes represented at large. Some convents at Rome, chiefly the Franciscana, are famous for attracting the people by such theatrical exhibitions.

This feast is also celebrated in the Church of England, and in the Lutheran churches, but is rejected by the Church of Scotland and the Dissenters; though, in England, some of the latter embrace the opportunity of having preaching, it being a day on which little or no business is done; others object to this as apparently symbolizing with human inventions.

The custom of making presents on Christmas-eve is derived from an old heathen usage, practised among the northern nations, at the feast of the birth of Sol, on the 25th of December, to which it succeeded, and retained the name of Yule or Jul; i. e. the "Wheel" or revolution of the sun.

Whether this festival was always observed on the 25th of December, is a point which has been greatly disputed. Dr. Cave is of opinion, that it was at first kept by the Eastern church in January, and confounded with the Epiphany; till, receiving better information from the Western churches, they changed it to that day. Chrysostom, in an homily on this very subject, affirms, that it was not above ten years since, in that church. (that of Antioch), it began first to be observed upon that day; and he offers several reasons to prove that to be the true day of Christ's nativity. Clemens Alexandrinus reckons, from the birth of Christ to the death of Commodus, exactly one hundred and ninety-four years, one month, and thirteen days. These years, being taken according to the Egyptian account, and reduced to the Julian style, make the birth of Christ to fall on the 25th or 26th of the month of December. Yet, notwithstanding this, the same father tells us, in the same place, that there were some who, more curiously searching after the year and day of Christ's nativity, affixed the latter to the 25th of the month Pachon. Now, in that year in which Christ was born, the month Pachon commenced the 20th of April; so that, according to this computation, Christ was born on the 16th of May. Hence we may see how little certainty there is in this matter, since, so soon after the event, the learned were divided in opinion concerning it.

Mr. Selden, in his "Table-Talk," speaking of this festival says, "Christmas succeeds the Saturnalia; the same time, the same number of holydays; then the master waited upon the servant like the lord of misrule.

"Our meats and our sports (much of them) have relation to church-works. The coffin of our Christmas pies, in shape long, is in imitation of the cratch. Our choosing kings and queens, on Twelfth-night, hath reference to the three kings. So likewise our eating of fritters, whipping of tops, roasting of herrings, jack of lents, &c., were all in imitation of church-works, emblems of martyrdom. Our tansies at Easter have reference to the bitter herb, though, at the same time, it was always the fashion for a man to have a gammon of bacon, to show himself to be no Jew."

CHRISTO SACRUM, a society founded at Delft, in Holland, in 1801, by Onder de Wingard, an aged burgomaster of that city. Its object is to reconcile all denominations who admit the divinity of Jesus Christ, and redemption through the merits of his death. It originally consisted of only four persons, but is said to have increased to between two and three thousand. Members are admitted from all Christian communions, but no efforts are used to make proselytes.

CHRONICLE, SAMARITAN, of Abul-Phathach, a history of events, otherwise known under the name of the "Book of Joshua," a copy of which, now in the University of Oxford, was procured by Huntington, from the Samaritans at Naplose, and another was in the possession of the learned Schnurrer. The former extends from the creation of the world to the year of our Lord 1492; the latter only to the time of Mohammed.

CHURCH, Scottish Kirk, Danish, &c., Kirke, German Kirche, is generally derived from the Greek Κυριακόν, what belongs, or is appropriated to the Lord (Κυριος); though some think it is from the German Küren, to elect, choose out, and so corresponding to the Greek ἐκκλησία, from εκ out of, and καλεω I call.

1. The Greek word Ἐκκλησία properly denotes an assembly met about business, whether lawful or unlawful, Acts xix. 32, 39.—2. It is understood of the collective body of Christians, or all those over the face of the earth who profess to believe in Christ, and acknowledge him to be the Saviour of mankind. Eph. iii. 21. 1 Tim. iii. 15. Eph. iv. 11, 12.—3. By the word church, also, we are to understand the whole body of God's chosen people, in every period of time. Those on earth are also called the militant, and those in heaven the triumphant church. Heb. xii. 23. Acts xx. 28. Eph. i. 22. Matt. xvi. 28.—4. By a particular church we understand an assembly of Christians united together, and meeting in one place for the solemn worship of God. To this agrees the definition given by the compilers of the thirty-nine articles of the Church of England:—"A congregation of faithful men, in which the true word of God is preached, and the sacraments duly administered, according to Christ's ordinances, in all those things that of necessity are requisite to the same." Acts ix. 31. Gal. i. 2, 22. 1 Cor. xiv. 34. Acts xx. 17. Col. iv. 15.—5. The word is now used also to denote any particular denomination of Christians distinguished by particular doctrines, ceremonies, &c.; as the Romish Church, Greek Church, English Church, &c.—6. The word church is also improperly used to denote the building in which the members of the Establishment meet for public worship. The Christians of the first century worshipped in private houses, or in the open air, in remote places, because they were not acknowledged by the state, and were often persecuted. It was not till the third century that they could venture to give more publicity to their service, and build places of worship. After the fourth century churches became large, and, in many instances, magnificent edifices. Many heathen temples were converted into churches; and, in the middle ages, edifices were erected for the professed worship of Him who "dwelleth not in temples made with hands," which in loftiness and grandeur were never surpassed. Excepting St. Paul's in London, the Protestants have not erected any very splendid church; and, indeed, their principal object in the construction of their places of worship is, what it ever ought to be, the accommodation of the hearers. In the Roman Catholic and Greek Communions, on the contrary, the effect on the eye is every thing.

CHURCHES, APOSTOLIC, such Christian societies as were formed in the days and with the sanction of the Apostles. It clearly appears that such churches were not national; they were not even provincial; for, though there were many believers and professing Christians in Judea, in Galilee, in Samaria, in Macedonia, in Galatia, and other provinces, yet we never read of a provincial church in any of those places. The particular societies of Christians in these districts are mentioned in the plural number. 2 Cor. viii. 1. Gal. i. 2. Acts ix. 31. No mention is made of diocesan churches in the New Testament. In the days of the apostles, bishops were so far from presiding over more churches than one, that sometimes a plurality of bishops presided over the same church. See Phil. i. 1. Nor do we find any mention made of parochial churches. Some of the inhabitants of a parish may be Infidels, Mohammedans, or Jews; but the apostolic churches consisted of such as made an open profession of their faith in Christ, and subjection to the Gospel. Rom. i. 7. 1 Cor. xiv. 33. On these principles it is maintained that the primitive churches of Christ were properly congregational. The first church at Jerusalem met together in one place at the same time. Acts i. 14, 15. The Church of Antioch did the same. Acts xiv. 27. The Church of Corinth the same. 1 Cor. xiv. 23. The same did the church at Troas. Acts xx. 7. There was a church at Cenchrea, a port of Corinth, distinct from the church in that city. Rom. xvi. He that was a member of one church was not a member of another. The Apostle Paul, writing to the Colossian society, says:—"Epaphras, who is one of you, saluteth you." Col. iv. 12.

Such a church is a body distinguished from the civil societies of the world by the spiritual nature and design of its government; for though Christ would have order kept in his church, yet this is to be done solely by the influence of his authority without any coercive force; a thing inconsistent with the very nature of such a society, whose end is instruction, and a practice suitable to it, which can never in the nature of things be accomplished by penal laws or external coercion. Isa. xxxiii. 22. Matt. xxiii. 8, 10. John xviii. 36. Psa. ii. 6. 2 Cor. x. 4, 5. Zech. iv. 6, &c.

1. Church members are those who compose or belong to such a church. As to the visible church, it may be observed, that real saintship is not the distinguishing criterion of the members of it. None, indeed, can without it honestly offer themselves to church fellowship; but they cannot be refused admission for the mere want of it; for, 1. God alone can judge the heart. Deceivers may counterfeit saintship.—2. Many that were admitted members in the churches of Judea, Corinth, Philippi, Laodicea, Sardis, &c., afterwards proved that they were unregenerated. Acts v. 1, 10. viii. 13, 23. 1 Cor. v. 11. Phil. iii. 18, 19. As to the real church, 1. The true members of it are such as are born again. John iii. 3.—2. They come out from the world. 1 Cor. vi. 17.—3. They openly profess love to Christ. James ii. 14, 26. Mark viii. 34, &c.—4. They walk in all the ordinances of the Lord blameless. None but such are proper members of the true church; nor should any be admitted to any particular church without scriptural evidence of these characteristics.

2. Church Fellowship is the communion that the members enjoy, one with another.

The ends of church fellowship are, 1. The maintenance and exhibition of a system of sound principles. 2 Tim. i. 13. 1 Tim. vi. 3, 4. 1 Cor. viii. 5, 6. Heb. ii. 1. Eph. iv. 21.

—2. The support of the ordinances of Gospel worship in their purity and simplicity. Rom. xv. 6.—The impartial exercise of church government and discipline. Heb. xii. 15. Gal. vi. 1. 2 Tim. ii. 24, 26. Tit. iii. 10. 1 Cor. v. James iii. 17.—4. The promotion of holiness in all manner of conversation. Phil. i. 27; ii. 15, 16. 2 Pet. iii. 11. Phil. iv. 8.

The more particular duties are, 1. Earnest study to keep peace and unity. Eph. iv. 3. Phil. ii. 2, 3; iii. 15, 16.—2. Bearing of one another's burdens. Gal. vi. 1, 2.—3. Earnest endeavours to prevent each other's stumbling. 1 Cor. x. 2, 3. Heb. x. 24, 27. Rom. xiv. 13.—4. Stedfast continuance in the faith and worship of the Gospel. Acts ii. 42.—5. Praying for and sympathising with each other. 1 Sam. xii. 23. Eph. vi. 18.

The advantages are, 1. Peculiar incitements to holiness. Heb. x. 25. 2. There are some promises applicable to none but those who attend the ordinances of God, and hold communion with the saints. Psa. xcii. 13, Isa. xxv. 6. Psa. cxxxii. 13, 16. Psa. cxxvi. 8. Jer. xxxi. 12.—3. Such are under the watchful eye and care of their pastor. Heb. xiii. 7.—4. Subject to the friendly reproof or kind advice of the saints. 1 Cor. xii. 25.—5. Their zeal and love are animated by reciprocal conversation. Mal. iii. 16. Prov. xxvii. 17.—6. They may restore each other if they fall. Eccl. iv. 10. Gal. vi. 1.—7. More easily promote the cause, and spread the Gospel elsewhere.

3. Church ordinances are, 1. Reading of the Scriptures. Neh. ix. 3. Acts xvii. 11. Neh. viii. 3, 4. Luke iv. 16.—2. Preaching and expounding. 1 Tim. iii. 2. 2 Tim. ii. 24. Eph. iv. 8. Rom. x. 15. Heb. v. 4.—3. Hearing. Isa. lv. 1. James i. 21. 1 Pet. ii. 2. 1 Tim. iv. 13.—4. Prayer. Ps. v. 1, 2; xcvi. 6; cxxi. 1; xxviii. 2. Acts xii. 12; i. 14.—5. Singing of psalms. Ps. xlvii. 1—6. Col. iii. 16. 1 Cor. xiv. 15. Eph. v. 19.—6. Thanksgiving. Ps. l. 14; c. James v. 13.—7. The Lord's Supper. 1 Cor. xi. 23, &c. Acts xv. 7. Baptism is not properly a church ordinance, since it ought to be administered before a person is admitted into church fellowship. See BAPTISM.

4. Church officers are those appointed by Christ for preaching the word, and the superintendence and management of church affairs; such as bishops and deacons. See those articles.

5. As to church order and discipline, it may be observed, that every Christian society formed on the apostolic plan is strictly independent of all other religious societies. No other church, however numerous or respectable; no person or persons, however eminent for authority, abilities, or influence, have any right to assume arbitrary jurisdiction over such a society. They have but one master, who is Christ. See Matt. xviii. 15, 19. Even the officers which Christ has appointed in his church have no power to give new laws to it; but only, in conjunction with the other members of the society, to execute the commands of Christ. They have no dominion over any man's faith, nor any compulsive power over the consciences of any. Every particular church has a right to judge of the fitness of those who offer themselves as members. Acts ix. 26. If they are found to be proper persons, they must then be admitted; and this should always be followed with prayer, and with a solemn exhortation to the persons received. If any member walk disorderly, and continue to do so, the church is empowered to exclude him, 1 Cor. v. 7. 2 Thesa. iii. 6. Rom. xvi. 17, which should be done with the greatest tenderness; but if evident signs of repentance should be discovered, such must be received again. Gal. vi. 1.

CHURCH, ABYSSINIAN, that portion of the professing church of Christ which exists in Abyssinia, or the ancient Ethiopia. It is properly a branch of the Coptic, and is governed by a patriarch who is styled Abuna, and chosen from among the Coptic priests, subject to the Patriarch of Alexandria, whose usual residence is at Cairo. The Abyssinians admit of only one nature in Jesus Christ, and thus belong to the Monophysites; but they differ from the Eutychians in maintaining that this single nature is composed of two,—the divine and human. They have different orders of priesthood; and the emperor himself receiving holy orders, exercises a kind of supremacy in ecclesiastical affairs. The clergy are maintained from the productions of the country. They have monks and canons. They practise circumcision on females as well as males; abstain from the meats prohibited by the Mosaic law; observe both Saturday and the Lord's day as sabbaths; and are bound by the levirate. They invoke angels, pray for the dead; have numerous legends, and fictitious miracles; and believe in a kind of purgatory, or middle state, in which the departed are being prepared for bliss. They have no graven images, but worship pictures. They do not believe in transubstantiation, and have the communion in both kinds.

Attempts have been made both on the part of the Church of Rome, and on that of Protestants, to effect a change in their views, but with little success. See Bruce's Travels and Jones's Dict. of Religious Opinions.

CHURCH, ARMENIAN. In the beginning of the fourth century the Armenians embraced the Christian faith. Their written language owes its cultivation to the translation of the Bible, shortly after that event. The most flourishing period of their literature was in the sixth century, at the time of their separation from the Greek Church, after the council of Chalcedon.

Since that period Armenia has undergone so many revolutions, that it must appear more remarkable that the Armenians should still persevere in the Christian faith, than that they should now deviate in many particulars from the original doctrines of their Church. Their history is very interesting, and, according to Dr. Buchanan, of all the Christians in Central Asia, they have preserved themselves most free from Mohammedan and Papal corruptions.

The state of their Church underwent a considerable change, early in the seventeenth century, in consequence of the incursions of Abbas the Great, King of Persia, into Armenia. This prince, to prevent the Turks from approaching to his frontier, laid waste that part of Armenia that lay contiguous to his dominions, and ordered the inhabitants to retire into Persia; and, in the general emigration that ensued, the more opulent and better sort of the Armenians removed to Ispahan, the capital of Persia, where the generous monarch granted them a beautiful suburb for their residence, with the free exercise of their religion, and where they have a considerable monastery, the seat of the bishop at this day. During the whole of his reign, these happy exiles experienced the most liberal treatment, and enjoyed the sweets of liberty and abundance; but after his death the scene changed: his successors were not equally generous; persecution ensued, and the Armenian church declined daily, both in credit and numbers. The storm of persecution that arose upon them, shook their constancy; many of them apostatized to the Mohammedan religion: so that it was justly to be feared that this branch of the Armenian Church would gradually perish. On the other hand, the state of religion in that Church derived considerable advantages from the settlement of a vast number of Armenians in different parts of Europe for the purposes of commerce. These merchants, who had fixed their residence, during this century, at London, Amsterdam, Marseilles, and Venice, were not unmindful of the interests of religion in their native country; and their situation furnished them with favourable opportunities of exercising their zeal in this good cause, and particularly of supplying their Asiatic brethren with Armenian translations of the holy Scriptures, and other theological books, from the European presses, especially from those of England and Holland. These pious and instructive productions, being dispersed among the Armenians who lived under the Persian and Turkish governments, contributed, no doubt, to preserve that illiterate and superstitious people from falling into the most consummate and deplorable ignorance.

The Armenian was considered as a branch of the Greek Church, till nearly the middle of the sixth century, when the heresy of the Monophysites spread far and wide through Africa and Asia, comprehending the Armenians also among its votaries. But, though the members of this church still agree with the other Monophysites in the main doctrines of that sect, relating to the unity of the divine and human nature in Christ, they differ from them in so many points of faith, worship, and discipline, that they do not hold communion with that branch of the Monophysites who are Jacobites in the more limited sense of that term, nor with either the Copts or the Abyssinians.

Sir P. Ricaut gives the following statement of the doctrines of their church:

They allow and accept the articles of faith according to the Council of Nice; and are also acquainted with the Apostles' Creed, which they have in use. As to the Trinity, they accord with the Greeks, acknowledging three Persons in one Divine nature, and that the Holy Ghost proceeds only from the Father. They believe that Christ descended into hell, and that he freed the souls of all the damned from thence, by the grace and favour of his glorious presence; not for ever, or by a plenary pardon or remission, but only as reprieved unto the end of the world, at which time they shall again be returned unto eternal flames.

He denies that this church is attached to the Eutychian or Monophysite heresy; and, in support of this opinion, produces a translation of its Tavananh, or creed, containing the sum of the Armenian faith, which they teach their children, and which is repeated by them in the course of divine service, in the same manner as the Apostles' Creed by us. But this instrument is far from being conclusive, and, on this subject, Sir P. departs from general opinion.

They maintain that the souls and bodies of the prophet Elias and the Virgin Mary, only, are in heaven. Yet, notwithstanding their opinion that no other prophets or saints shall be admitted into heaven until the day of judgment, by a certain imitation of the Greek and Latin Churches, they invoke them with prayers; reverence and adore their pictures or images, and burn lamps and candles before them.

Their manner of worship is performed after the eastern fashion, by prostrating their bodies, and kissing the ground three times, (which the Turks likewise practise in their prayers.) At their first entrance into church, they uncover their heads, and cross themselves three times; but afterwards cover their heads, and sit cross-legged on carpets, after the manner of the Turks. The most part of their public divine service they perform in the morning, before day, which is very commendable; and I have been greatly pleased to meet hundreds of Armenians in a summer morning, about sun-rising, returning from their devotions at the church, wherein, perhaps, they had spent two hours before, not only on festival, but on ordinary days of work. In like manner, they are very devout on vigils to feasts, and Saturday evenings, when they all go to church, and returning home, perfume their houses with incense, and adorn their little pictures with lamps. In their monasteries, the whole Psalter of David is read over every twenty-four hours; but in the cities and parochial churches it is otherwise observed; for the Psalter is divided into eight divisions, and every division into eight parts; at the end of every one of which is said the Gloria Patri, &c.

The Armenian is the language that is still used in the services of this church; and in her rites and ceremonies there is so great a resemblance to those of the Greeks, that a particular detail here might be superfluous. Their liturgies also are either essentially the same with those of the Greeks, or at least ascribed to the same authors. And the fasts which they observe annually are not only more numerous, but kept with greater rigour and mortification than is usual in any other Christian community.

In addition to these fasts, they fast on Wednesdays and Fridays throughout the year, except in the weeks between Easter and Ascension-day, and in that which follows the feast of the Epiphany. Their seasons of festivity correspond, in general, with those of other churches, except that they commemorate our Lord's nativity, not on the 25th of December, but on the 6th of January, thereby celebrating, in one festival, his birth, epiphany, and baptism.

Their most favourite saints, who have each of them a day in the calendar, are Surp Savorich, (or St. Gregory,) Surp Chevorich, (or St. Demetrius,) Surp Nicolo, and Surp Serchis, (or St. George.)

They practise the trine immersion, which they consider to be essential to baptism : and "after baptism, they apply the Myron, or Chrism ; anointing the forehead, eyes, ears, breast, palms of the hands, and soles of the feet, with consecrated oil, in form of a cross ; and then they administer unto the child the holy eucharist, which they do only by rubbing the lips with it. Surp Usium, as they call the holy eucharist, they celebrate only on Sundays and festivals, though on other days they perform the public services of the church ; whereby it appears that they have other morning services besides that of the communion. They put no water into the wine, nor leaven into the bread, as do the Greeks ; and their manner of distributing the communion is by sopping the bread into the wine, so that the communicant receives both species together, which is different from the form and custom of the Latin, Greek, and Reformed Churches. They differ from the Greeks in that they administer bread unleavened, made like a wafer ; they differ from the Romans in that they give both species to the laity, which the priest doth by putting his fingers into the chalice, out of which he takes the wafer soaked in the wine and delivers that unto the communicant."

When the Armenians withdrew from the communion of the Greek Church, they made no change in their ancient episcopal form of church government : they only claimed the privilege of choosing their own spiritual rulers. The name and office of Patriarch was continued ; but three, or, according to Sir P. Ricaut, four prelates shared that dignity. The chief of these resides in the monastery at Echmiazin, near Erivan, and at the foot of Mount Ararat, in Turcomania. His jurisdiction extends over Turcomania, or Armenia Major ; and he is said to number among his suffragans eighteen bishops, besides those who are priors of monasteries. His opulent revenues of 600,000 crowns are considered as a fund for his numerous charities ; for though elevated to the highest rank of ecclesiastical power and preferment, he rejects all the splendid insignia of authority ; and in his ordinary dress and mode of living, he is on a level with the poorest monastic.

The second patriarch of the Armenians, who is called The Catholic, and at present acknowledges his subordination to the patriarch of Echmiazin, resides at Cis, a city near Tarsus, in Cilicia ; he rules over the churches established in Cappadocia, Cilicia, Cyprus, and Syria ; and hath twelve archbishops under his jurisdiction.

The third and last in rank, of the Armenian patriarchs, who has no more than eight or nine bishops under his dominion, resides in the island of Aghtamar, or Aghtainan, on the great lake of Van, or Varasporacan.

Besides these prelates, who are patriarchs in the true sense of that term, the Armenians have other spiritual leaders, who are honoured with the title of Patriarch ; but this indeed is no more than an empty title, unattended with the authority and prerogatives of the patriarchal dignity.

In the Armenian Church, as in the Greek, a monastery is considered as the only proper seminary for dignified ecclesiastics ; for it seems to be a tenet of their church, that abstinence in diet, and austerity of manners, should increase with preferment. Hence, though their priests are permitted to marry once, their patriarchs and mastabets (or martabets) i. e. bishops, must remain in a state of strict celibacy ; at least no married priest can be promoted in their church until he shall have become a widower. It is likewise necessary that their dignified clergy should have assumed the sanctimonious air of an ascetic.

Their monastic discipline is extremely severe. The religious neither eat flesh nor drink wine ; they sometimes continue in prayer from midnight till three o'clock in the afternoon, during which time they are required to read the Psalter through, besides many other spiritual exercises.

The orders or regulations by which they are governed, are those of St. Gregory, St. Basil, and St. Dominic.

Of the Armenian clergy in general, the situation is truly deplorable, as the chief part of their income arises from what we call surplice fees. A principal function among them is the reading of prayers over the graves of the deceased, continued even for years ; and many of these poor priests are seen daily at Constantinople so occupied, especially in the Armenian cemetery of the Campo de Morti.

The Armenians are to be found in every principal city of Asia : they are the general merchants of the East, and are in a state of constant motion from Canton to Constantinople. Their general character is that of a wealthy, industrious, and enterprising people. Once in their lives, they generally perform a pilgrimage to Jerusalem ; and in 1819, the number of Armenian pilgrims was 1400, a number nearly equal to the Greeks.

The Church of Armenia may be rendered an important instrument in the work of evangelizing the western parts of Asia. Divine Providence has placed that ancient church in a most important situation, and has preserved it many centuries, in the midst of a numerous people, who are yet aliens from the Christian community, and strangers to the hope of the gospel.

The glory of this church has indeed long since departed ; but if, after sitting so many ages in the dust, she should at length arise and shine as in former days, it would be like life from the dead ! All the regions of Western Asia would behold her light, and fifty millions of people, now sitting in darkness, would be cheered by her beams. From Ar*menia, the word of life would naturally advance into Persia, Mesopotamia, Syria, Palestine, and Asia Minor; and thus, without a crusade, the Church of Christ might recover those long-lost regions, where the light of divine truth first dawned upon the world, where the Saviour was born, and where the standard of the Cross was first planted.

CHURCH OF ENGLAND is the church established by law in the southern division of this kingdom, and in Ireland.

When and by whom Christianity was first introduced into Britain, cannot perhaps be exactly ascertained. Eusebius, indeed, positively declares that it was by the apostles and their disciples. It is also said that numbers of persons professed the Christian faith here about the year 150; and according to Usher, there was in the year 182 a school of learning, to provide the British churches with proper teachers. Popery, however, was established in England by Austin the monk; and the errors of it we find every where prevalent, till Wickliffe was raised up by Divine Providence to refute them. The Church of England remained in subjection to the Pope until the time of Henry VIII. Henry, indeed, in early life and during the former part of his reign, was a bigoted papist. He burnt the famous Tyndal, (who made one of the first and best translations of the New Testament,) and wrote in defence of the seven sacraments against Luther, for which the Pope gave him the title of "The Defender of the Faith;" but falling out with the Pope about his marriage, he took the government of ecclesiastical affairs into his own hand; and having reformed many abuses, entitled himself supreme head of the church. See REFORMATION.

The doctrines of the Church of England, which are contained in the thirty-nine articles, are certainly Calvinistical, though this has been denied by some modern writers, especially by Dr. Kipling, in a tract entitled "The Articles of the Church of England proved not to be Calvinistic." These articles were founded, for the most part, upon a body of articles compiled and published in the reign of Edward VI. They were first passed in the Convocation, and confirmed by royal authority in 1562. They were afterwards ratified anew in the year 1571, and again by Charles I. The law requires a subscription to these articles, of all persons who are admitted into holy orders. In the course of the last century, disputes arose among the clergy respecting the propriety of subscribing to any human formulary of religious sentiments. An application for its removal was made to parliament in 1772, by the petitioning clergy, and received the most public discussion in the House of Commons, but was rejected in the House of Lords.

The government of the Church of England is episcopal. The king is the supreme head. There are two archbishops and twenty-four bishops. The benefices of the bishops were converted by William the Conqueror into temporal baronies; so that every prelate has a seat and a vote in the House of Peers. Dr. Hoadley, however, in a sermon preached from this text, "My kingdom is not of this world," insisted that the clergy had no pretensions to temporal jurisdiction; which gave rise to various publications, termed, by way of eminence, the Bangorian Controversy, because Hoadley was then Bishop of Bangor. Dr. Wake, Archbishop of Canterbury, formed a project of peace and union between the English and Gallican churches, founded upon this condition, that each of the two communities should retain the greatest part of their respective and peculiar doctrines; but this project came to nothing. In the Church of England there are deans, archdeacons, rectors, vicars, &c.; for an account of which, see the respective articles.

The Church of England has a public form read, called a Liturgy. It was composed in 1547, and has undergone several alterations, the last of which was in 1661. Since that time, several attempts have been made to amend the liturgy, articles, and some other things relating to the internal government, but without effect. See LITURGY.

The greatest part of the inhabitants of England are professedly members of this church; but comparatively few either of her ministers or members strictly adhere to the articles in their true sense. CHURCH, GALICAN, the ci-divant church of France, under the government of its respective bishops and pastors. This church always enjoyed certain franchises and immunities, not as grants from popes, but as derived to her from her first original, and which she took care never to relinquish. These liberties depended upon two maxims: the first, that the pope had no right to order any thing in which the temporalities and civil rights of the kingdom were concerned: the second, that notwithstanding the pope's supremacy was admitted in cases purely spiritual, yet in France, his power was limited by the decrees of ancient councils received in that realm.

The liberties, or privileges, of the Gallican Church are founded upon these two maxims, and the most considerable of them are as follows:—

1. The king of France has a right to convene synods, or provincial and national councils, in which, amongst other important matters relating to the preservation of the state, cases of ecclesiastical discipline are likewise debated.

2. The pope's legates à latere, who are empowered to reform abuses, and to exercise the other parts of their legatine office, are never admitted into France, unless at the desire or with the consent of the king; and whatever the legates do there, is with the approbation and allowance of the king.

3. The legate of Avignon cannot exercise his commission in any of the king's dominions, till after he hath obtained his majesty's leave for that purpose.

4. The prelates of the Gallican Church, being summoned by the pope, cannot depart the realm upon any pretence whatever, without the king's permission.

5. The pope has no authority to levy any tax or imposition upon the temporalities of the ecclesiastical preferments, upon any pretence, either of loan, vacancy, annates, tithes, procurations, or otherwise, without the king's order, and the consent of the clergy.

6. The pope has no authority to depose the king, or grant away his dominions to any person whatever. His holiness can neither excommunicate the king, nor absolve his subjects from their allegiance.

7. The pope likewise has no authority to excommunicate the king's officers, for their executing and discharging their respective offices and functions.

8. The pope has no right to take cognizance, either by himself or his delegates, of any pre-eminences or privileges belonging to the crown of France, the king being not obliged to argue his prerogatives in any court but his own.

9. Counts palatine, made by the pope, are not acknowledged as such in France, nor allowed to make use of their privileges and powers, any more than those created by the emperor.

10. It is not lawful for the pope to grant licenses to churchmen, the king's subjects, or to any others holding benefices in the realm of France, to bequeath the issues and profits of their respective preferments, contrary to any branch of the king's laws, or the customs of the realm; nor to hinder the relations of the beneficed clergy, or monks, to succeed to their estates, when they enter into religious orders, and are professed.

11. The pope cannot grant to any person a dispensation to enjoy any estate or revenues in France, without the king's consent.

12. The pope cannot grant a license to ecclesiastics to alienate church lands, situate and lying in France, without the king's consent, upon any pretence whatever.

13. The king may punish his ecclesiastical officers for misbehaviour in their respective charges, notwithstanding the privilege of their orders.

14. No person has any right to hold any benefice in France, unless he be either a native of the country, naturalized by the king, or has a royal dispensation for that purpose.

15. The pope is not superior to an oecumenical or general council.

16. The Gallican Church does not receive, without distinction, all the canons, and all the decretal epistles, but keeps principally to that ancient collection, called Corpus Canonium, the same which Pope Adrian sent to Charlemagne towards the end of the eighth century, and which, in the year 860, under the pontificate of Nicolas I., the French bishops declared to be the only canon-law they were obliged to acknowledge, maintaining that in this body the liberties of the Gallican Church consisted.

17. The pope has no power, for any cause whatsoever, to dispense with the law of God, the law of nature, or the decrees of the ancient canons.

18. The regulations of the apostolic chamber, or court, are not obligatory to the Gallican Church, unless confirmed by the king's edicts.

19. If the primates or metropolitans appeal to the pope, his holiness is obliged to try the cause, by commissioners or delegates, in the same diocese from which the appeal was made.

20. When a Frenchman desires the pope to give him a benefice lying in France, his holiness is obliged to order him an instrument, sealed under the faculty of his office; and, in case of refusal, it is lawful for the person pretending to the benefice to apply to the parliament of Paris, which court shall send instructions to the bishop of the diocese to give him institution, which institution shall be of the same validity as if he had received his title under the seals of the court of Rome.

21. No mandates from the pope, enjoining a bishop or other collator to present any person to a benefice upon a vacancy, are admitted in France.

22. It is only by sufferance that the pope has what they call a right of prevention, to collate to benefices which the ordinary has not disposed of.

23. It is not lawful for the pope to exempt the ordinary of any monastery, or any other ecclesiastical corporation, from the jurisdiction of their respective dioceses, in order to make the person so exempted immediately dependent on the holy see.

These liberties are esteemed inviolable; and the French kings, at their coronation, solemnly swear to preserve and maintain them. The oath runs thus:—Procurato vobis et perdo meo quod unicuique de vobis et ecclesiis vobis commissis canonis privilegium et debitum legem atque iustitiam servabo.

In the established church the Jansenists were very numerous. The bishoprics and prebends were entirely in the gift of the king; and no other Catholic state, except Italy, had so numerous a clergy as France. There were in this kingdom eighteen archbishops, one hundred and eleven bishops, one hundred and sixty-six thousand clergymen, and three thousand four hundred convents.

Since the repeal of the edict of Nantz, the Protestants have suffered much from persecution. A solemn law, which did much honour to Louis XVI., late king of France, gave to his non-Roman Catholic subjects, as they were called, all the civil advantages and privileges of their Roman Catholic brethren.

The above statement was made previously to the French revolution: great alterations have taken place since that period. And it may be interesting, to those who have not the means of fuller information, to give a sketch of the causes which gave rise to those important events.

About the middle of the last century, a conspiracy was formed to overthrow Christianity, without distinction of worship, whether Protestant or Catholic. Voltaire, D'Alembert, Frederick II., king of Prussia, and Diderot, were at the head of this conspiracy. Numerous other adepts and secondary agents were induced to join them. These pretended philosophers used every artifice that impiety could invent, by union and secret correspondence, to attack, to debase, and annihilate Christianity. They not only acted in concert, sparing no political or impious art to effect the destruction of the Christian religion, but they were the instigators and conductors of those secondary agents whom they had seduced, and pursued their plan with all the ardour and constancy which denotes the most finished conspirators.

The French clergy amounted to one hundred and thirty thousand, the higher orders of whom enjoyed immense revenues; but the cures, or great body of acting clergy, seldom possessed more than twenty-eight pounds sterling a year, and the vicars about half the sum. The clergy, as a body, independent of their titles, possessed a revenue arising from their property in land, amounting to five millions sterling annually; at the same time they were exempt from taxation. Before the levelling system had taken place, the clergy signified to the commons the instructions of their constituents, to contribute to the exigencies of the state in equal proportion with the other citizens. Not contented with this offer, the tithes and revenues of the clergy were taken away; in lieu of which, it was proposed to grant a certain stipend to the different ministers of religion, to be payable by the nation. The possessions of the church were then considered as national property by a decree of the Constituent Assembly. The religious orders, viz., the communities of monks and nuns, possessed immense landed estates; and, after having abolished the orders, the Assembly seized the estates for the use of the nation: the gates of the cloisters were now thrown open. The next step of the Assembly was to establish what is called the civil constitution of the clergy. This, the Roman Catholics assert, was in direct opposition to their religion. But though opposed with energetic eloquence, the decree passed, and was soon after followed by another, obliging the clergy to swear to maintain their civil constitution. Every artifice which cunning, and every menace which cruelty could invent, were used to induce them to take the oath; great numbers, however, refused, (among whom were one hundred and thirty-eight bishops and archbishops,) and were on this account driven from their sees and parishes. Three hundred of the priests were massacred in one day in one city. All the other pastors who adhered to their religion were either sacrificed, or banished from their country, seeking through a thousand dangers a refuge among foreign nations. A perusal of the horrid massacres of the priests who refused to take the oaths, and the various forms of persecution employed by those who were attached to the Catholic religion, must deeply wound the feelings of humanity. Those readers who are desirous of further information are referred to Abbé Barruel's "History of the Clergy."

Some think that there was another cause of the revolution, and which may be traced as far back at the least as the revocation of the edict of Nantz in the seventeenth century, when the great body of French Protestants, who were men of principle, were either murdered or banished, and the rest in a manner silenced. The effect of this sanguinary measure (say they) must needs be the general prevalence of infidelity. Let the religious part of the nation be banished, and a general spread of irreligion must necessarily follow: such were the effects in France. Through the whole of the eighteenth century infidelity was the fashion, and that not only among the princes and noblesse, but even among the greater part of the bishops and clergy. And as they had united their influence in banishing true religion, and cherishing the monster which succeeded it, so they were united in sustaining the calamitous effects which that monster has produced. However unprincipled and cruel the French revolutionists were, and however much the sufferers, as fellow-creatures, are entitled to our pity; yet, considering the event as the just retribution of God, we are constrained to say, "Thou art righteous, O Lord, who art, and wast, and shalt be, because thou hast judged thus; for they have shed the blood of saints and prophets, and thou hast given them blood to drink; for they are worthy."

The Catholic religion is now again established, but with a toleration of the Protestants, under some restriction.—See the Concordat, or religious establishment of the French Republic, ratified September 10th, 1801.

CHURCH, GREEK, that portion of professing Christians who conform in their creed, usages, and church government to the views of Christianity introduced into the former Greek empire, and matured, since the fifth century, under the patriarchs of Constantinople, Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem. A schism between the East and West might early have been anticipated. The foundation of a new Rome at Constantinople; the political partition of the Roman empire into the Oriental or Greek, and the Occidental or Latin; the elevation of the bishop of Constantinople to the place of second patriarch of Christendom, inferior only to the patriarch of Rome, effected in the councils of Constantinople, A. D. 381, and of Chalcedon, 451; the jealousy of the latter patriarch towards the growing power of the former,—were circumstances which, together with the ambiguity of the edict known under the name of the Henoticon, (which see), granted by the Greek emperor Zeno, A. D. 482, produced a formal schism in what till then had formed the Catholic Church. Felix II., patriarch of Rome, pronounced sentence of excommunication against the patriarchs of Constantinople and Alexandria, who had been the leading agents in the Henoticon, in A. D. 484, and thus cut off all ecclesiastical fellowship with the congregations of the East attached to these patriarchs. The sentiments of the imperial court being changed, the Roman patriarch, Hormisdas, was able, indeed, to compel a reunion of the Greek Church with the Latin, in A. D. 519; but this union, never seriously intended, and loosely compacted, was again dissolved by the obstinacy of both parties, and the Roman sentence of excommunication against the Iconoclasts among the Greeks, in 733, and against Photius, the patriarch of Constantinople, in 862. The augmentation of the Greek church, by the addition of newly-converted nations, excited afresh, about this time, the jealousy of the Roman pontiff; and his bearing towards the Greeks was the more haughty in consequence of his having renounced his allegiance to the Greek emperor and had a sure protection against him in the new Frankish-Roman empire. Photius, on the other hand, charged the Latins with arbitrary conduct in inserting an unscriptural addition into the creed, respecting the procession of the Holy Ghost, and in altering many of the usages of the ancient orthodox church: for example, in forbidding their priests to marry, repeating the chrisms, and fasting on Saturday, as the Jewish sabbath. But he complained, with justice, in particular, of the assumptions of the pope, who pretended to be the sovereign of all Christendom, and treated the Greek patriarchs as his inferiors. The deposition of this patriarch, twice effected by the pope, did not terminate the dispute between the Greeks and Latins; and when the patriarch of Constantinople, Michael Cerularius, added to the charges of Photius, against the Latins, an accusation of heresy, in 1054, on account of their use of unleavened bread at their communion, and of the blood of animals that had died by strangulation, as well as on account of the immorality of the Latin clergy in general. Pope Leo IX. having in retaliation excommunicated him in the most insulting manner, a total separation ensued of the Greek church from the Latin. From this time pride, obstinacy, and selfishness frustrated all the attempts which were made to reunite the two churches, partly by the popes, in order to annex the East to their see, partly by the Greek emperors, in order to secure the assistance of the princes of the West against the Mohammedans. Neither would yield to the other in respect to the contested points,—while the Catholic religion acquired a more complete and peculiar character under Gregory VII.; and, in consequence of the scholastic theology, the Greek church retained its creed as arranged by John of Damascus in 730, and its ancient constitutions. The conquest of Constantinople by the French crusaders and the Venetians, A. D. 1204, and the cruel oppressions which the Greeks had to endure from the Latins and the papal legates, only increased their exasperation; and although the Greek emperor Michael II. (Palæologus, who had re-conquered Constantinople in 1261) consented to recognize the pope's supremacy, and by his envoys and some of the clergy who were devoted to him, abjured the points of separation, at the assembly held at Lyons in 1274; and though a joint synod was held in Constantinople in 1277, for the purpose of strengthening the union with the Latin church, the great body of the Greek church was nevertheless opposed to this step; and Pope Martin IV. having excommunicated the emperor Michael in 1281, from political motives, the councils held at Constantinople in 1283 and 1285 by the Greek bishops, restored their old doctrines, and the separation from the Latins.

The last attempt to unite the two churches was made by the Greek emperor, John VII., when very hard pressed by the Turks, together with the patriarch Joseph, in the councils held, first at Ferrara in 1438, and the next year at Florence, Pope Eugene IV. presiding; but the union there concluded, having the appearance of submission to the Roman see, was altogether rejected by the Greek clergy and the nation at large, so that in fact the schism of the two churches continued. The efforts of the Greek emperors, who had always had most interest in these attempts at union, ceased with the overthrow of their empire and the conquest of Constantinople by the Turks in 1453; and the exertions of the Roman Catholics to subject the Greek church effected nothing but the acknowledgment of some few Greek congregations in Italy, Hungary, Galicia, Poland, and Lithuania, which congregations are now known under the name of United Greeks.

In the seventh century, the territory of the Greek church embraced, besides East Illyria, Greece Proper, with the Morea and the Archipelago, Asia Minor, Syria, with Palestine, Arabia, Egypt, and numerous congregations in Mesopotamia and Persia; but the conquests of Mohammed and his successors have deprived it, since 630, of almost all its provinces in Asia and Africa; and even in Europe the number of its adherents was considerably diminished by the Turks in the fifteenth century. On the other hand, it was increased by the accession of several Slavonic nations, and especially of the Russians, who, under the great Prince Vladimir, in the year 988, embraced the creed of the Greek Christians. To this nation the Greek church is indebted for the symbolical book, which, with the canons of the first and second Nicene, of the first, second, and third Constantinopolitan, of the Ephesian, and Chalcedonian general councils, and of the Trullan council, held at Constantinople in 692, is the sole authority of its members in matters of doctrine. After the learned Cyrillus Lucaris, patriarch of Constantinople, had suffered martyrdom for his professed approbation of the principles of Protestantism, A. D. 1629, an exposition of the doctrines held by the Russians was drawn up in the Greek language, by Peter Mogislaus, bishop of Kiev, 1642, under the title of the "Orthodox Confession of the Catholic and Apostolic Church of Christ," signed and ratified 1643, by all the patriarchs of the Greek church, to whom had been added, in 1589, the patriarch of Moscow. It was printed in Holland, in Greek and Latin, 1662, with a preface by the patriarch Nectarius of Jerusalem. In 1696 it was published by the last Russian patriarch; and in 1722, at the command of Peter the Great, by the Holy Synod; it having been previously declared to be in all cases valid as the standard of the Greek church, by a council held at Jerusalem in 1672, and by the Ecclesiastical Rule of Peter the Great, drawn up in 1721, by Theophanes Procoviaz.

Like the Roman Catholic, the Greek Church recognises two sources of doctrine, the Bible and tradition, under which last it comprehends not only those doctrines which were orally delivered by the apostles, but also those which have been approved of by the Greek fathers, especially John of Damascus, as well as by the seven above-named general councils. The other councils, whose authority is valid in the Latin communion, this church does not recognise; nor does it allow the patriarchs or synods to introduce new doctrines. It holds its tenets to be so obligatory and necessary, that they cannot be denied without the loss of salvation. It is the only church which holds that the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father only: thus differing both from the Catholics and Protestants, who agree in deriving the third person both from the Father and the Son. Like the Latin Church, it has seven sacraments: baptism, chrism, the eucharist, confession, penance, ordination, marriage, and extreme unction; it is peculiar, first, in holding that full purification from original sin requires a trine immersion, or aspersion, and in joining chrism with it as the completion of baptism; secondly, in adopting, as to the eucharist, the doctrine of transubstantiation, but ordering the bread to be leavened, the wine to be mixed with water, and both elements to be distributed to the laity, even to children, the communicant receiving the bread in a spoon filled with the consecrated wine; thirdly, all the clergy, with the exception of the monks, and of the higher clergy chosen from among them, down to the bishops inclusively, are allowed to marry a virgin, but not a widow; nor are they allowed to marry a second time; and therefore the widowed clergy are not permitted to retain their livings, but go into a cloister, where they are called hieromonachi.

Rarely is a widowed bishop allowed to preserve his diocese; and from the maxims that marriage is not suitable for the higher clergy in general, and that second marriage at least is improper for the lower, there is no departure. The Greek Church does not regard the marriage of the laity as indissoluble, and frequently grants divorces; but is as strict as the Roman church with respect to the forbidden degrees of relationship, especially of the ecclesiastical relationship of god-parents: nor does it allow the laity a fourth marriage. It differs from the Catholic Church in anointing with the holy oil, not only the dying, but the sick, for the restoration of their health, the forgiveness of their sins, and the sanctification of their souls. It rejects the doctrine of purgatory, does not admit of predestination, denies works of supererogation, and dis-allows of indulgences and dispensations; only a printed form is sometimes given to the dead, at the request and for the comfort of the survivors. It allows no carved, sculptured, or molten images of holy persons or things; but the representations of Christ, of the Virgin Mary, and the saints, which are objects of religious worship both in churches and private houses, must be merely painted, and at most inlaid with precious stones. In the invocation of the saints, and especially of the Virgin, the Greeks are as zealous as the Latins. They also hold relics, crosses, and graves to be sacred; and crossing themselves in the name of Jesus, they consider as having a wonderful and blessed influence. Besides fasting every Wednesday and Friday, they have four general fasts annually.

The service of the Greek Church consists almost entirely in outward forms. Preaching and catechising constitute the least part of it: indeed, in the seventeenth century, preaching was strictly forbidden in Russia, under the Tzar Alexis, to prevent the diffusion of novel doctrines. In Turkey, it is confined almost exclusively to the higher clergy, because they alone possess some degree of knowledge. Each congregation has its own choir of singers, instrumental music being altogether excluded in the Greek Church. Besides the mass, which is regarded as the chief part of the service, the liturgy consists of passages of Scripture, prayers and legends of the saints, and in the recitation of the creed, or of sentences which the priest begins, and the people, officiating in a body, finish.

The convents, for the most part, conform to the strict rule of St. Basil. The Greek abbot is termed higumenos; the abbess, higumene. The abbot of a Greek convent, which has several others under its inspection, is termed archimandrite, and has a rank next to that of a bishop. The lower clergy in the Greek Church consist of readers, singers, deacons, &c., and of priests, such as the popes and protopopes or archpriests, who are the first clergy in the cathedrals and metropolitan churches. The members of the lower clergy can never rise higher than protopopes; since the bishops are chosen from among the monks; and from among the bishops, the archbishops, metropolitans, and patriarchs.

In Russia, there are thirty-one dioceses; with which of them the archiepiscopal dignity shall be united, depends on the will of the emperor. The seats of the four Russian metropolitans are,—Petersburgh, with the jurisdiction of Novogorod; Kiev, with that of Galicia; Kasan, with that of Sviyaschk; and Tobolsk, with that of all Siberia. The patriarchal dignity of Moscow, which the patriarch Nikon is said to have abused, Peter the Great abolished by presenting himself unexpectedly before the bishops, who were assembled, in 1702, to elect a new patriarch, and declaring, "I am your patriarch;" and, in 1721, the whole ecclesiastical government of the empire was intrusted to a college of bishops and secular clergy, called the holy synod, first at Moscow, now at Petersburg. Under this synod now stand, besides the metropolitans, 11 archbishops, 19 bishops, 12,500 parish churches, and 425 convents, 58 of which are connected with monastic schools for the education of the clergy, for the better effecting of which object, they are aided by a large annual pension from the state.

The Greek Church, under the Turkish dominion, remained, as far as was possible under such circumstances, faithful to the original constitution. The dignities of patriarch of Constantinople, Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem, still exist. The first, however, possesses the ancient authority of the former archbishop of Constantinople; takes the lead as œcumenical patriarch in the holy synod at that place, composed of the four patriarchs, a number of metropolitans and bishops, and twelve secular Greeks; exercises the highest ecclesiastical jurisdiction over the Greeks in the whole Turkish empire; and is recognised as head of the Greek Church by the (not united) Greeks in Galicia, in the Bukovina, or Sclavonia, and in the Seven Islands. The other three patriarchs, as almost all the people in their dioceses are Mohammedans, have but a small sphere of action, (the patriarch of Alexandria has but two churches at Cairo,) and live, for the most part, on the aid afforded them by the patriarch of Constantinople. This patriarch has a considerable income, but is obliged to pay nearly half of it as a tribute to the sultan. The Greeks, under the Turkish government, are not allowed to build any new churches—have to pay dearly for permission to repair the old ones—are not allowed to have steeples or bells to their churches, nor even to wear the Turkish dress—generally perform religious service by night—and are, moreover, obliged to pay tolls, from which the Turks are exempt; but the males also pay to the sultan, after their fifteenth year, a heavy poll-tax, under the name of exemption from beheading.

The attachment of the Greek Church to the old institutions has stood in the way of all attempts at improvement: only in Russia, a number of sects have sprung up, which the government not only tolerates, but some of which it supplies with consecration to their clergy through the regular bishops. As might be expected, true religion is at the very lowest ebb in all the departments of this communion; yet strong hopes may be entertained of a revival, from the circumstance that the free use of the holy Scriptures, in the vernacular language, is not interdicted, as in the Church of Rome.

CHURCH, HIGH. See HIGH CHURCHMEN.

CHURCH OF IRELAND is the same as the Church of England, and is governed by four archbishops and eighteen bishops.

CHURCH, LATIN, or WESTERN, comprehends all the churches of Italy, Portugal, Spain, Africa, the north, and all other countries whither the Romans carried their language. Great Britain, part of the Netherlands, of Germany, and of the north of Europe, have been separated from it almost ever since the Reformation.

CHURCH, LUTHERAN. See LUTHERANISM.

CHURCH, REFORMED, comprehends the whole Protestant churches in Europe and America, whether Lutheran, Calvinistic, Independent, Quaker, Baptist, or of any other denomination who dissent from the Church of Rome. The term reformed is now, however, employed on the continent of Europe, to distinguish the Calvinists from the Lutherans.

CHURCH OF ROME, or ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH. The Roman Catholics unanimously own Peter as the founder of the Church of Rome, though it is disputed by some Protestants, whether he ever was in that city. Those who deny it, ground their opinion upon the silence of Luke and Paul in this matter, who, having been both at Rome, would not have failed, say they, to have mentioned Peter, and the Christians converted by him, if he had ever preached the Gospel in that city. They endeavour to confirm this opinion by the chronological history of the Acts of the Apostles, and likewise by the first Epistle of Peter; from the last of which they undertake to prove, that he executed his commission in Asia, and died at Babylon.

To this it is answered, that the silence of Luke is no good argument; for that evangelist, in the Acts of the Apostles, takes no notice of Paul's journey into Arabia, and of his return, first to Damascus, and then to Jerusalem. As to the argument from chronology, those who maintain the affirmative, set up another account of time, more agreeable as they think to the best ecclesiastical historians and chronologers, and exactly coinciding with the Acts of the Apostles, and the Epistles of Peter and Paul. It is, in few words, this:—

In the thirty-fifth year of Christ, Peter and John went to Samaria, where having preached the Gospel, Peter returned to Jerusalem; whither Paul came, three years after his conversion, to visit him, in the year of Christ, 39. The Church having rest, and being unmolested by its enemies, Peter now took the opportunity to visit the several churches already planted by the disciples, in which progress he came to Antioch, the capital of the East; and here, being its first bishop, and having given necessary orders for the government of that church, he returned into Judea, where he visited the towns of Lydda, Joppa, and Cesarea, in the years 40 and 41. After the conversion of the centurion Cornelius, he went to Jerusalem in the year 42. At this time Barnabas and Paul were sent to Antioch, where they preached the Gospel with great success in the year 43. From thence they returned to Jerusalem, where Peter then was, bringing with them the contributions they had collected for the support of the Christians of Judea, in the year 44. In the mean time, Herod Agrippa, king of Judea, put the Apostle James, brother of John, to death, just before Easter, and soon after seized on Peter; who, being miraculously released by an angel, travelled through Antioch into Asia Minor, where he planted new churches in Cappadocia, Galatia, Pontus, and Bithynia; from whence he embarked for Rome, where he arrived the latter end of the year 44, which was the second of the Emperor Claudius. Here, having converted many Jews and Gentiles, he planted a church, of which he himself was the first bishop, in the year 45. He continued to govern this church till his martyrdom, which fell out in the year 69, being the thirteenth of the Emperor Nero; upon which computation he was bishop of Rome twenty-five years; not that he was resident all that time in Rome, for in the year 51, he was obliged to quit the city, because of the Emperor Claudius's edict, which banished all the Jews, under which name they included the Christians; nor was he returned to Rome when Paul was carried prisoner thither, in the year 59, and this may account for the silence of Paul in this matter.

As to the epistle of Peter, dated from Babylon to the Christians in Asia, it is answered, that by Babylon, in that place, is plainly meant the city of Rome; and Eusebius, Jerome, and all the ancient writers, assure us that this epistle was written at Rome.

Lastly, that Peter was at Rome, may be proved, say they, by the concurrent testimony of all antiquity; this truth being asserted by Papias, a disciple of John the Evangelist, by Caius, contemporary with Tertullian, by Clemens Alexandrinus, Origen, Eusebius, Athanasius, &c. among the Greeks, and by Irenæus, Tertullian, Cyprian, Lactantius, &c. among the Latins, and is a fact that never was called in question till the sixteenth century.

Rome is the centre of the Popish, or Roman Catholic religion, and the pope, or bishop of the see of Rome, as successor of St. Peter, claims the supremacy over the Universal Christian Church. This claim is founded on the words of our Saviour to St. Peter: "Thou art Peter, and upon this rock will I build my Church." The best summary of the doctrines of that church, is the famous creed of Pope Pius IV., which may be considered as a true and unquestionable body of popery. It consists of twenty-four articles. The twelve first are the articles of the Nicene Creed, and need not be cited here. The twelve last are the additional doctrines, which the Church of Rome has superadded to the original Catholic faith,—they are as follows:—

XIII. I most firmly admit and embrace the apostolical and ecclesiastical traditions, and all other observations and constitutions of the same church.

XIV. I do admit the Holy Scriptures in the same sense that holy Mother Church doth, whose business it is to judge of the true sense and interpretation of them; and I will interpret them according to the unanimous sense of the Fathers.

XV. I do profess and believe, that there are seven Sacraments of the law, truly and properly so called, instituted by Jesus Christ our Lord, and necessary to the salvation of mankind, though not all of them to every one, viz.—Baptism, Confirmation, Eucharist, Penance, Extreme Unction, Orders, and Marriage; and that they do confer grace; and that, of these, Baptism, Confirmation, and Orders, may not be repeated without sacrilege. I do also receive and admit the received and approved rites of the Catholic Church in her solemn administration of the above-said sacraments.

XVI. I do embrace and receive all and every thing, that hath been defined and declared, by the holy Council of Trent, concerning Original Sin, and Justification.

XVII. I do also profess, that in the Mass, there is offered unto God a true, proper, and propitiatory sacrifice for the quick and the dead; and that in the most holy sacrament of the Eucharist, there is truly, really, and substantially, the body and blood, together with the soul and divinity, of our Lord Jesus Christ; and that there is a conversion made of the whole substance of the bread into the body, and of the whole substance of the wine into the blood, which conversion the Catholic Church calls Transubstantiation.

XVIII. I confess that, under one kind only, whole and entire, Christ, and a true sacrament, is taken and received.

XIX. I do firmly believe that there is a Purgatory, and that the souls kept prisoners there do receive help by the suffrages of the faithful.

XX. I do likewise believe that the Saints, reigning together with Christ, are to be worshipped and prayed to; and that they do offer prayers unto God for us, and that their relics are to be had in veneration.

XXI. I do most firmly assert that the images of Christ, of the blessed Virgin, (the mother of God,) and of other saints, ought to be had and retained, and due honour and veneration ought to be paid to them.

XXII. I do affirm that the power of indulgences was left by Christ in the Church, and that the use of them is very beneficial to Christian people.

XXIII. I do acknowledge the holy Catholic and Apostolic Roman Church to be the mother and mistress of all Churches; and I do promise and swear true obedience to the Bishop of Rome, the successor of St. Peter, the prince of the Apostles, and vicar of Jesus Christ.

XXIV. I do undoubtedly receive and profess all other things, which have been delivered, defined, and declared, by the sacred Canons, and oecumenical Councils, and especially by the holy Synod of Trent; and all other things contrary thereto, and all heresies, condemned, rejected, and anathematized by Church, I do likewise condemn, reject, and anathematize.

The worship of this church is liturgical, and, throughout the greatest part of its extent, the Latin language is used in all public and authorized religious worship, although that language has for many ages ceased to be a vulgar tongue. Her object in this practice is, we are told, "to preserve uniformity; to avoid the changes to which living languages are exposed, and thereby to prevent the novelties which might be thus introduced; to facilitate the commerce of different churches on religious matters; and to promote a spirit of study and learning among the ministers;" nor does she admit that by this practice her members sustain any injury or loss. She does not, however, require as a condition of communion, the adoption of the Latin language and rite.

The liturgy, or order of the mass, almost universally adopted, is that contained in the Roman missal.

Masses are divided into solemn or high mass, and plain or low mass; mass sung or said; public mass, or private mass.

A solemn mass is mass offered up with all the due solemnities, by a bishop or priest, attended by a deacon, subdeacon, and other ministers, each officiating in his part. Such a mass is always sung; and hence a choir of singers accompanies it, with an organ, if possible, and, at times, other instrumental music. Mass, when divested of all these solemnities, and in which only the priest officiates, is a plain or low mass. The priest, however, may either sing the mass, attended by the choir, or say it. Hence the difference between mass sung and said. Mass may be attended by a crowd of people, or it may be said with few or none present, except the clerk to attend the officiating priest. When the mass is numerously attended, all or many of those present may partake of the sacrifice by communion, or none may communicate but the priest. These differences make the mass public or private; and it has been remarked, that private masses have become more common in latter ages.

The liturgy of the mass will be found in the Roman Missal, which contains, besides the calendar, the general rubrics or rites of the mass, and such parts of it as are invariably the same.

After the prayers of the liturgy or missal, those held in the greatest veneration by Roman Catholics are the prayers contained in the Church Office, or Canonical Hours. This office is a form of prayer and instruction combined, consisting of the psalms, lessons, hymns, prayers, anthems, versicles, &c. in an established order, separated into different portions, and to be said at different hours of the day.

These canonical hours of prayer are still regularly observed by many religious orders, but less regularly by the secular clergy, even in the choir. When the office is recited in private, though the observance of regular hours may be commendable, it is thought sufficient if the whole be gone through any time in the twenty-four hours.

The church office is contained in what is called the Breviary; and those branches of this church who have different liturgies from the Roman, have also breviaries differing in language, rite, and arrangement. Even in the Latin church, several dioceses, and several religious bodies, have their particular Breviaries. The Roman Breviary is, however, the most general in use. It is divided much in the same manner as the missal, as to its parts. The Psalms are so distributed, that in the weekly office (if the festivals of saints did not interfere) the whole Psalter would be gone over, though several psalms, viz. the 118th (alias 119th), are said every day. On the festivals of saints, suitable psalms are adopted. The lessons are taken partly out of the Old and New Testament, and partly out of the acts of the Saints and writings of the holy fathers. The Lord's Prayer, the Hail Mary or Angelical Salutation, the Apostles' Creed, and the Confiteor, are frequently said. This last is a prayer by which they acknowledge themselves sinners; beg pardon of God; and the intercession, in their behalf, of the angels, of the saints, and of their brethren upon earth. No prayers are more frequently in the mouth of Roman Catholics than these four; to which we may add the Doxology, repeated in the office at the end of every psalm, and in other places. In every canonical hour a hymn is also said, composed by Prudentius or some other ancient father.

The Roman Breviary contains also a small office in honour of the Blessed Virgin, and likewise what is called the Office of the Dead. We there find besides, the penitential and the gradual Psalms, as they are called, together with the Litanies of the Saints and of the Virgin Mary of Loretto, so called because used in the church of our Lady in Loretto, which are the only two that have the sanction of the church.

In the public worship of this church every thing is fixed and uniform. And as the missal and breviary contain the prayers and rites adopted in ordinary religious assemblies for the purpose of sacrifice or prayer, so the Pontifical and Ritual contain the forms and prayers with which the sacraments are administered: the blessing of God invoked upon his creatures; the power of evil spirits over the souls and bodies of the faithful destroyed or restrained; the method also of deprecating the wrath of God in times of public calamity and of returning him thanks for signal public blessings; finally, directions how to afford the comforts of religion to the sick and dying, with the prayers to be made use of in the Christian interment of the dead. Such of the above functions as belong to the episcopal character or office are to be found in the Pontifical; those which belong to simple priests, or even the inferior clergy, are inserted in the Ritual.

On the subject of the administration of the sacraments, our limits will not permit us to descend to particulars.

Of the many benedictions used in this church, some, besides those accompanying the administration of their sacraments of confirmation and holy orders, are reserved to bishops exclusively, as the consecration of holy oil, chrism, &c. Some are performed by priests in their own right, and others by delegated authority from the bishop.

In addition to such benedictions this church blesses houses, ships, springs, fields, the nuptial bed, altars, chalices, sacerdotal vestments, salt, water, oil, palms, &c., &c. It would be ridiculous, even to recite the wonderful virtues which her members attribute to their holy water, and the many superstitious uses to which they apply it. They seldom go into or out of a church without sprinkling themselves with it. On solemn days the priest passes down the middle aisle, to perform that office, using a brush; at other times they serve themselves with it from a font placed near the church door for that purpose. Another of their ceremonies, connected with this and most others, and used on most occasions and in all places, is the sign of the cross.

Roman Catholics maintain that God has left with his church a power over unclean spirits, in consequence of which they are cast out from such persons or things as, by the permission of God, they have been able to abuse; or their power over them is at least restricted. The forms of prayer which this church makes use of for that purpose are called Exorcisms, and the persons who are authorised to use them are called Exorcists. This function, however, according to modern practice, is seldom discharged by any but priests.

The prescribed forms for all benedictions, exorcisms, and processions, &c., will be found in the "Roman Pontifical and Ritual."

Those now enumerated are, properly speaking, the only prayers which can be said to have the sanction of the church; yet her members are furnished with many forms for private devotion. And "when, to acquire a greater ease in the observance of the law of God, a man makes use of certain means which he is not obliged by any law to use, and which others, who are not thought to neglect their duty, do not in fact avail themselves of, he is said by Roman Catholics to perform works of supererogation."

Of their numerous forms of private devotion, the "Chapter (or Rosary) of the Blessed Virgin," and the "Angelus Domini," may be noticed. The former was instituted, we are told, by those who could not read, that they might repeat the Lord's Prayer, the Hail Mary, and the Doxology, a certain number of times, in lieu of every canonical hour; whilst at the same time they commemorate the mysteries of the life of Christ, and honour his Virgin mother.

For above three centuries a practice has prevailed in this church of commemorating at morning, noon and night, the incarnation of Christ, by a short form of prayer, which from the words with which it begins in Latin, is called the "Angelus Domini."

In conformity with the Roman Catholic practice of praying for the dead, "it is also very customary to offer up for their repose, at the first hour of the night, the Penitential Psalms, with a prayer suited to that end."

The government of the church of Rome is hierarchical.

Besides those having jurisdiction, there are bishops in partibus infidelium, as they are called, or, more briefly, in partibus—i. e. persons who, that they may enjoy the dignity and honours of episcopacy, and thereby be qualified to render some particular services to the church in general, are named to sees "in infidel countries," of which they cannot possibly take possession.

In Ireland, the succession of the hierarchy never having been interrupted, the Roman Catholic bishops there have their sees in the country, as before the Reformation, and enjoy an ordinary jurisdiction; whereas those in England and Scotland, where the succession has failed, enjoy merely a delegated jurisdiction, and are called vicars apostolic, from their being delegates or vicars of the pope, who occupies the apostolic see. He, of course, has the right of nominating them, although, in practice, the nomination takes place on the recommendation of the other vicars, or of the clergy who are interested. In England there are four apostolic-vicars, and in Scotland two.

A metropolitan, or an archbishop, besides the jurisdiction common to him with other bishops in his own diocese, has also a jurisdiction, defined by the canon law, and customs, over all the bishops of his province, who are his suffragans; summons them every third year to a provincial synod, and the constitutions framed in it affect all the churches in the province. In like manner, primates and patriarchs have a jurisdiction over all the metropolitans and other bishops of the kingdoms, or nations, where they hold their dignified rank. The constitutions of the national council convoked by the primate, bind all the churches in that nation; and the constitutions of the patriarchal council bind all the patriarchate. But these two titles are now, in fact, merely honorary in most of those who enjoy them.

Above all these is the pope, who has the power (in the opinion of all Roman Catholics, jure divino) of feeding, ruling, and governing the whole church; and exercises his jurisdiction over all clergy as well as laity. This power they say "is purely spiritual, entirely unconnected with any temporal authority."

His care and solicitude extends to all Roman Catholic bishops in the world. He enacts rules of discipline for the universal church, dispenses with some of them when he sees proper, punishes those who do not obey them, passes sentences upon ecclesiastical causes referred to him, (which ought to be the case with all those of great importance,) and receives appeals from all Roman Catholic bishops in the world.

It is he, we are told, who convokes general councils; invites to them all the Roman Catholic bishops dispersed throughout the globe; presides in them personally or by his legates; and confirms their decrees. He constitutes new bishopricks, and confirms the nomination of bishops: deprives bishops of their sees for their crimes, and those unjustly deprived of them he restores. The pope's dominion over his brother is, indeed, carried to such a height, and so confirmed by the Council of Trent, that they are become, in fact, little better than his vicars. They swear obedience to him in as strong terms as any subject can use towards his sovereign, and in terms but little consistent with their duty to their king and country.

As all Roman Catholic churches had always their senate, composed of priests and deacons, whose counsel and assistance the bishop used in the government of his diocese; so the pope had always his, composed of cardinals, who assisted him in the government of the universal church.

Thus all "Roman Catholics obey their bishops—the bishops the metropolitans—the metropolitans the primates and patriarchs—and all of them their head, the pope; and of all these is composed one church, having one faith, under one head."

The discipline of the Church of Rome is now regulated by what is called the Canon Law, which has taken place of the Canons of the Apostles, the Apostolical Constitutions, and all the ancient compilations on that subject. The Canon Law consists, 1. Of the Decrees of Gratian; a compilation made up of the decrees of different popes and councils, and of several passages of the holy fathers and other reputable writers. 2. Of the Decretals, in five books. 3. Of the compilation, known by the name of the Sixth Book of Decretals. 4. Of the Clementines. 5. Of the decretals, known under the name of Extravagantes. These, containing besides the decrees of popes, and the canons of several councils, constitute the body of the Canon Law.

It is, however, only in matters of faith that she professes to admit of no diversity; her discipline is not every where perfectly uniform; nor does she consider some variety, in matters of worship or discipline, as subversive of peace, or as breaking the bonds of communion.

The fast of Lent consists of forty days, in imitation of our Saviour's forty days' fast in the wilderness; and it is kept once a year "to do penance for sin," and as a preparation for celebrating the great feast of Easter.

The Wednesdays, Fridays, and Saturdays, in one week of each of the four seasons of the year, are annually fast days, called quatuor tempora, or ember days. Besides abstaining at least from flesh meats, it is essential to a fast day that only one full meal, and that not before noon, be taken in the four-and-twenty hours of the day. Every Friday in the year is kept universally as a day of abstinence from flesh; and in the Latin Church, Saturday, with a few exceptions; unless Christmas-day falls upon them.

Another point of discipline in this Church is clerical celibacy. Her members profess that a vow of perpetual celibacy was required in the ancient church as a condition of ordination, even from the apostolic age. But protestants insist that the contrary is evident, from numerous examples of bishops and archbishops, who lived in a state of matrimony without any prejudice to their ordination or their function.

"The use of sacred vestments, as well as of various ceremonies, has been universally adopted by the Roman Catholic Church, professedly for the greater decency of her public worship."

Besides the Lord's day, Roman Catholics universally keep a vast number of holidays.

There are several orders of monks in Catholic countries, in every quarter of the globe, at this day. They have Basilians, Benedictines, Augustinians, Dominicans, Franciscans, Canons Regular, and others. All these different orders take the solemn vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience; and all firmly hold the Roman Catholic faith, and only differ in their rules of discipline, in their dress, in the particular privileges granted by the pope to each order, in their names, which they generally take from that of their founder, and such like distinctions pertaining merely to discipline. In general, they are exempt from the jurisdiction of the bishop, and are immediately under that of the pope.

Of nuns, as of the monks, there are different orders, each following their own rules, and wearing a peculiar habit. The solemn vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience, are taken by them also; and they are commonly under the government of the bishops, but sometimes are under the jurisdiction of regular clergymen of their own order. After their profession, they are never allowed to go without the enclosure of the convent, during life, without the leave of the bishop, or some cogent reason, such as a nunnery taking fire, &c.; and no man is allowed to enter it without a similar permission, which may be granted for a necessary cause. Roman Catholics think that the origin of nuns is to be found even in the primitive church.

It is an article of the discipline of the Church of Rome, not to put the Old or New Testament, in the vulgar tongue, into the hands of the children or unlearned; and that, in consequence, "no part whatever of the Bible in the vulgar tongue is taught in the Roman Catholic charity schools."

The Roman Catholic religion is very extensively diffused, and is more generally professed than any other system of Christianity.

In Europe, it is the established and only religion in Italy, Spain, and Portugal; in the ci-devant Austrian and French Netherlands; in Sicily, Sardinia, and the other Mediterranean islands adjacent to Italy and Spain. In France, perhaps ten to one of the inhabitants are Roman Catholics. In Poland, and throughout the hereditary dominions of the house of Austria, the case is the same with the great majority of the inhabitants, and probably with almost one-half of the rest of the German population. In Hungary alone they exceed 4,000,000; and about the same number are found within the dominions of Prussia. A considerable number of her Britannic Majesty's European subjects profess the doctrine of the Church of Rome. In Ireland, the Roman Catholics are nearly three to one of all other denominations; in England, their number is nearly 250,000, and in Scotland about 50,000. The Roman Catholic religion is also established in seven of the Swiss cantons. In Holland, too, and in the Protestant cantons of Switzerland, and also in Russia, many of its members may be found. Sweden and Denmark contain a few; and in the provinces of European Turkey they are more numerous than is generally supposed. In that extended country there are Roman Catholic archbishops, bishops, chapters and monasteries, and a numerous body of laity dwelling together by thousands.

In Asia, many of the subjects of the Grand Seignior are Roman Catholics. The Maronites of Mount Libanus, with their patriarch and bishops, are all of this communion. There are besides many others throughout Syria, Mesopotamia, and Armenia. Some Roman Catholics are to be found in Persia. Throughout Hindostan and the other southern parts of Asia, Siam, Cochin China, Tonquin, and the vast empire of China itself, the number of Roman Catholics is very great. And in the Philippine Isles, and others of the Eastern Ocean, the Roman Catholic religion is very generally established.

The mission to China is supplied by the college of St. Joseph at Macao, which is now under the direction of the priests of the Missionary Congregation. From the report of the state of the missions in 1810, it appears that there were then in China, Tonquin, Cochin-China, and Siam, 14 bishops, 7 apostolical vicars, 43 European missionaries, 231 native priests, and 585,000 Roman Catholic Christians.

The great body of Roman Catholics, from the banks of the Chrishna to Cape Comorin, amounting to about 755,000, is intrusted to the care of two titular archbishops, two titular bishops, and three bishops in partibus, with the title of vicars-apostolic.

In Africa, the Roman Catholic religion prevails in many parts of its vast extent. Not to mention Madeira, the Canary and Cape de Verd Islands, the inhabitants of which are all Roman Catholics, a great proportion of the inhabitants of Loango, Congo, and Angola, adhere to the doctrines of the Church of Rome. The same holds true of several kingdoms on the eastern coast of that continent, viz. Mocaranga, Mozambique, Zanguebar, and Melinda. In Guinea, too, in the Mohammedan states of the North, and in Egypt, not a few Christians of the Church of Rome are to be found.

America.—The whole of the southern continent of America, including the native aborigines, and the descendants of the European colonists, profess to be members of the Church of Rome, with the exception of most of the Dutch at Surinam, and of a few wandering tribes in the interior, towards the southern promontory. The same religion is professed throughout the Spanish settlements in North America, and in the Spanish and ci-devant French West Indies, as well as by three-fourths of the inhabitants of Canada, where it is the established religion.

All the clergy and members of this church throughout the United States were under the superintendence of the Bishop of Baltimore, till the year 1809, when that town (the capital of Maryland) was created a metropolitan see, and four new dioceses were erected, viz. Boston, New York, Philadelphia, and Bard's Town, in the State of Kentucky. The bishops of all these dioceses are suffragans to the archbishop of Baltimore. And in addition to these, two other dioceses have more lately been erected, out of part of the archdiocese, viz. Virginia, and the Carolinas and Georgia. The bishop of Louisiana, now one of the United States, whose residence is St. Louis, in the new State of Missouri, is not a suffragan of the archbishop of Baltimore.

The cathedral of Baltimore, which was built in 1820, is said to be the finest church in the United States, and to have cost upwards of £50,000 sterling. In most of the dioceses now specified, there is one or more colleges or seminaries, under the direction of Roman Catholic clergymen. The Jesuits also have a thriving college at Georgetown in Maryland, and the English Dominicans have one in Kentucky. There are, besides, five or six seminaries for ladies in the United States; some of these, however, are merely for the education of females: but in others the members are required and expected to take the vows of poverty and continency. The Roman Catholics are rapidly increasing in North America, by emigration from Europe, and in other ways. Their number, some years ago, was estimated at 600,000. Large sums of money are annually expended in the erection of chapels, and the support of priests. The contributions in Austria, made for the support of Catholic missions in North America, amounted, in 1829 and 1830, to 49,382 florins.

According to the Roman Court Calendar of 1822, the number of living cardinals was then 44, and the number of patriarchs, archbishops, and bishops, scattered over the Christian world, amounted to 550, exclusive of those in partibus infidelium.—Broughton's Dictionary; Adams's Religious World Displayed.

CHURCH, or KIRK OF SCOTLAND.—The word Kirk, signifying church, was used in Scotland even before the Reformation, and is still retained there, where it is chiefly confined to the Establishment, and the Relief Synod.

The principles of the Reformation were first introduced into Scotland about the year 1527, when they excited the apprehensions of the priesthood, who attempted to arrest their progress by many acts of cruelty against their professors.

The sovereign and the priesthood combined to preserve the dominion of error; whilst the greater part of the nobility, to gain the objects which they fondly contemplated, espoused the interests of the people, and joined in enlarging the sphere of civil and religious liberty. Thus it happened that the hierarchy came to be regarded in Scotland, by all who were partial to the Protestant faith, as the ally of despotism and the engine of persecution.

It was not, therefore, to be expected, that when the Protestants gained a decided ascendancy, much inclination would be shown to uphold a system of ecclesiastical polity, associated with what they most abhorred; and the celebrated Andrew Melville, on his arrival in Scotland from Geneva, in 1574, taking advantage of these feelings, and of every political event that might facilitate his design, was enabled to effect, in 1592, the introduction of that Presbyterian polity which he found established in Geneva, and which has finally been fixed in Scotland.

James VI., to whom this form of church government was most obnoxious, was desirous that Episcopacy, as more consonant to monarchy, should be restored. To effect this, he made many efforts, even before his accession to the English throne; and after that event he was enabled to accomplish his object. His unfortunate son, Charles I., formed the scheme of assimilating, in all respects, the Churches of England and Scotland. With this view he determined to introduce a liturgy, which in Scotland had never been regularly used; and he insisted upon the reception of a set of canons, abolishing the control over ecclesiastical measures which the inferior church judicatories had been permitted to exercise. The violence with which all this was resisted is known to every reader of the history of Britain. The zeal of the multitude was inflamed to fury; the clergy were insulted, and Episcopacy was again contemplated as the engine of Popery and of despotism. The discontented in Scotland made a common cause with those who were disaffected to prelacy in the southern part of the island: they bound themselves by the deed entitled The Solemn League and Covenant, to exterminate prelacy as a corruption of the Gospel; and they took an active part in those measures which terminated in the death of Charles and the erection of the Commonwealth. Upon the restoration of Charles II., he re-established Episcopacy in Scotland, under circumstances little calculated to conciliate the affections, and to secure the reverence of the people to that form of church polity. The Presbyterians, undismayed, adhered to their principles; and, upon the abdication of James II., they looked forward with confidence to the triumph of their cause. And though the Prince of Orange was eager to preserve in both parts of the island the same form of ecclesiastical government, the bishops conceived that they could not conscientiously transfer their allegiance to him, whereby the way was opened for that establishment of Presbytery which some of his most zealous adherents had pressed upon him, and which was ratified by act of parliament in 1690. Thus Scotland and England having been separate kingdoms at the time of the Reformation, a difference of circumstances in the two countries led to different sentiments on the subject of religion, and at last to different religious establishments; and when they were incorporated into one kingdom by the Treaty of Union in 1707, both kingdoms gave their assent to a declaration, that Episcopacy shall continue in England, and that the Presbyterian church government shall be the only government of Christ's church in that part of Great Britain called Scotland.

The same establishment is also guaranteed by the fifth article of the Union with Ireland.

The only Confession which appears to have been legally established before the Revolution in 1688, is that which is published in the "History of the Reformation in Scotland," attributed to John Knox. It consists of twenty-five articles, and was the Confession as well of the Episcopal as of the Presbyterian church. The Covenanters, indeed, during the Commonwealth, adopted The Westminster Confession. And at the Revolution this Confession was received as the standard of the national faith; and the same acts of parliament which settled Presbyterian church government in Scotland ordain, "That no person be admitted or continued hereafter to be a minister or preacher within this church, unless that he subscribe the (i. e. this) Confession of Faith, declaring the same to be the confession of his faith." By the Act of Union in 1707, the same is required of all "professors, principals, regents, masters, and others bearing office" in any of the four universities in Scotland.

The Westminster Confession of Faith, then, and what are called the Larger and Shorter Catechisms, which are generally bound up with it, contain the public and avowed doctrines of this church; and it is well known that these formularies are strictly and properly Calvinistical.

In the Church of Scotland the public worship is extremely simple, and but few ceremonies are retained. There is no liturgy or public form in use; and the minister's only guide is, "The Directory for the Public Worship of God," which prescribes rather the matter than the words of our addresses to God: nor is it thought necessary to adhere strictly to it; for, as in several other respects, what it enjoins with regard to reading the holy Scriptures in public worship is, at this day, but seldom practised.

By the ecclesiastical laws, "the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper should be dispensed in every parish four times in the year;" but this law is now seldom adhered to, unless in most chapels of ease. In country parishes it is often administered not above once a year, and in towns generally only twice a year. The people are prepared for that holy ordinance by a fast and public worship on some day of the preceding week, generally on Thursday, and by a sermon on the Saturday; and they meet again in the kirk on the Monday morning for public thanksgiving, and sermon.

They have no altars or chancels in the kirks, and the communion tables are not fixed, but introduced for the occasion; and are sometimes two or more in number, and of considerable length. At the first table, the minister, immediately upon concluding what they call the Consecration Prayer, usually proceeds to read the words of the institution, and, without adding more, to distribute the elements, which he does only to the two communicants who sit nearest him on each hand. It is usual for the elders to administer them to the rest. But before, or during the services of the succeeding tables, addresses at some length are made to the communicants by the minister, or by one of the ministers, (for there are generally two, three, or more present,) standing at the head of the communion-table.

In conducting public worship, this church has little in common with the Church of England. She has no festivals. Days of public fasting and thanksgiving she does indeed sometimes observe, particularly those commanded by his Majesty, together with the fast previous to the celebration of the holy communion, and the day of thanksgiving after it; but she has no Lent Fast—no kneeling at public prayer—no public worship of God without a sermon, or public instruction—no instrumental music—no consecration of churches or of burying-grounds—no funeral service or ceremony—no sign of the cross in baptism—no regular use of the Lord's Prayer—and no administration of the holy communion in private houses, not even to the sick or dying.

In singing, an old metrical version of the Psalms is used; but besides the Psalms of David, a collection of translations and paraphrases in verse, of several passages of sacred Scripture, together with some hymns, has been introduced of late years, by permission of the General Assembly, and a new version of the Psalms in metre is now in progress.

For government and discipline, see PRESBYTERIANISM.

The General Assembly, in the present state of the church, consists of the following members, viz. :—

- 200 Ministers representing Presbyteries.
- 89 Elders, representing Presbyteries.
- 67 Elders, representing Royal Boroughs.
- 5 Ministers or Elders, representing Universities.

The connexion of what is called the Scots Kirk at Campvere, in Holland, with the establishment in Scotland, which had been dissolved by the Batavian Republic, has lately been restored; and congregations joined with this church, and represented in the General Assembly, have been established in the different presidencies of India.

In Scotland, and the islands of Scotland, she contains within her bounds 893 parishes, and about 1,500,000 members. The number of ministers belonging to her, who enjoy benefices, and possess ecclesiastical authority, is 940. Of this number, 77 are placed in collegiate charges, and the remaining 863 ministers are settled in single charges, each of them having the superintendence of a whole parish. In very populous parishes, chapels of ease are erected with consent of the kirk, and are supported by voluntary subscriptions; but the ministers who officiate in them are not included in this number, as they are not members of any ecclesiastical courts.

The duties of the Scotch clergy are numerous and laborious. They are required to officiate regularly in the public worship of God; and, in general, they must go through this duty twice every Sunday, (exclusive of other occasional appearances,) delivering every Sunday a lecture and a sermon, with prayers. It is also expected, throughout Scotland, that the prayers and discourses shall be of the minister's own composition; and the prayers in all cases, and the discourses in most instances, are delivered without the use of papers. They are expected to perform the alternate duties of examining their people from the Scriptures and catechisms of the church, and of visiting them from house to house, with prayers and exhortations. The charge of the poor devolves, in a very particular manner, on the clergy; and in them also is vested the superintendence of all schools within their bounds.

The provision which has been made, by the law of Scotland, for the support of the established clergy, consists in a stipend, payable in victual or money, or partly in each; a small glebe of land; and a manse (parsonage-house) and office-houses.

An act of parliament passed in 1810, granting 10,000*l.* per annum for augmenting the smaller parish stipends in Scotland. By this act, the lowest stipend assigned to a minister of the establishment is 150*l.* sterling, with a small sum, generally 8*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.*, for communion elements. Stipends, where the teinds are not exhausted, are, with the exclusion of communion elements, wholly paid in victual, generally oatmeal and barley, in equal proportions; and the court frequently allocates, as it is termed, to a minister from sixteen to eighteen chalders. If the stipend exhaust the teind, it is sometimes paid in money; and there are cases in which the teind was originally set apart in money, and not in victual.

The whole church establishment, as a burden on land, may be stated in one view as follows, viz., a glebe, of perhaps about six or seven acres, out of nearly 21,000, and the grass, where it is allowed; a stipend of about 9*d.* in the pound of the land rents; and buildings and communion charges, amounting to 4*d.* or 5*d.* more in the pound of these land rents. All these, put together, constitute the burdens of the Scottish Ecclesiastical Establishment, in so far as proprietors of land are affected by them; and are not supposed to exceed 300,000*l.* per annum.

Patronage was abolished in Scotland A.D. 1649; was revived at the Restoration; was partly abrogated at the Revolution; and again revived in 1712; and the ranks of dissenters there have been thronged, perhaps, from no other cause so much as the abuse of patronage; notwithstanding, this church, according to Dr. Chalmers, has still a veto, and can set aside any presentee, not merely on the ground of his moral or literary qualifications, but "generally, on the principle that it is not for the cause of edification that his presentation should be sustained."

The internal state of the church of Scotland, it has been supposed by some, has been of late years undergoing an improvement, by the decided increase of the party usually termed Evangelical. In the appointment of ministers to vacant churches, both in town and country, much greater attention is now paid than formerly to the wishes of the people; and popular candidates, as they are called, are those whom the patrons of the present day most frequently present to livings. If this party should go on increasing in the same proportion, the reign of the Moderates, or Low-doctrine, but High-churchmen, must ere long terminate. It is, however, greatly to be deplored, that along with this increase in the number of evangelical ministers, a spirit of intolerance and bigotry is rapidly gaining ground. Individuals, for instance, carry their jealousy so far as to dissuade their parishioners from hiring dissenting servants. Others, contrary to their former practice, refuse to intimate from their pulpits sermons to be preached on public occasions for common objects, by dissenting ministers; and there are others who stand aloof from societies in which they would be required to co-operate with brethren who do not belong to the established church. To the production of this spirit and state of feeling, the controversy relating to the British and Foreign Bible Society has greatly contributed.—Adams' Religious World Displayed; Edin. Theol. Mag. CHURCH, STATES OF THE, the pope's dominions in Italy. They originated with the grant of Pepin, king of the Franks, in 754, who bestowed on Stephen II., bishop of Rome, some districts which the Lombards, against whom Stephen solicited Pepin's assistance, had taken from the exarchate. Charlemagne confirmed this grant in 774, and in return received the title of Roman Emperor, from Leo III., in 800. During succeeding centuries the popes sometimes gained accessions to their temporal dominions; at other times encroachments were made upon them. At present the states of the church cover a surface of 17,185 square miles, with 2,460,000 inhabitants, 90 towns, 212 market places, and 3500 villages. They are situated in the centre of Italy, between Lombardy, Tuscany, and Naples, and the Tuscan and Adriatic Seas. The revenue is estimated at 12,000,000, and the national debt at 200,000,000 of florins. There is a standing army of 9000 men. The navy consists of two frigates and a few small vessels. In 1816 these states, with the exception of Rome, Tivoli, and Subjago, which are under the immediate administration of the pope, were divided into seventeen delegations, which, when under the government of cardinals, are called legations.

CHURCHWARDENS, officers chosen yearly, either by the consent of the minister, or of the parishioners, or of both. Their business is to look to the church, churchyard, and to observe the behaviour of the parishioners; to levy a shilling forfeiture on all such as do not go to church on Sundays, and to keep persons orderly in church-time, &c.

CHURCHYARD, a piece of ground adjoining to the church, set apart for the interment of the dead. In the Church of Rome, churchyards are consecrated with great solemnity. If a churchyard which has been thus consecrated shall afterwards be polluted by any indecent action, or profaned by the burial of an heretic, an excommunicated or unbaptized person, it must be reconciled; and the ceremony of the reconciliation is performed with as much ceremony as that of the consecration! See CONSECRATION.

CIRCUMCELLIANS, in Latin Circumcelliones, a branch of the sect of the Donatists; they abounded chiefly in Africa. They had no fixed abode, but rambled up and down, begging, or rather exacting, a maintenance from the country people. It was from this wandering course of life they had their name. They exercised all sorts of cruelty, and treated every one they met in the most brutal manner. They ran about like madmen, and carried several kinds of arms. This rendered them famous all over the world, and the disgrace of their sect; whence Theodoret speaking of the Donatists, says scarce anything but what is true only of the Circumcellians.

CIRCUMCISION, a custom prevailing among several eastern nations, of cutting off the prepuce of the virile member. It was enjoined as a religious rite on Abraham and his posterity. The Mohammedan circumcision is probably an ancient Ishmaelite custom, which was received from Abraham, the common father of the Israelites and Ishmaelites. It was not introduced into Arabia by the Koran of Mohammed, but was already in use among his nation, and was adopted, and has been introduced by his followers, as a sacred rite, and one of the essential parts of Islamism, into all countries where this religion has been received, there is also a kind of circumcision or excision performed on the female sex. In Egypt Mohammedan maidens are frequently circumcised; and the Abyssinians circumcise both sexes.

CIRCUMCISION, FEAST OF THE, a festival celebrated on the 1st of January, in commemoration of the circumcision of Christ. The day was anciently kept as a fast, in opposition to the custom of the pagans, who feasted on it in honour of the god Janus.

CISTERCIAN MONKS, a religious order, founded in the eleventh century, by St. Robert, a Benedictine, and abbot of Molème. Robert, being ordered by the pope to resume the government of the abbey of Molème, was succeeded in that of Cîteaux, by Alberic; and Pope Paschal, by a bull of the year 1100, took that monastery under his protection. Alberic drew up the first statutes for the monks of Cîteaux, or Cistercians, in which he enjoined the strict observance of the rule of St. Benedict.

The habit of these religious of the monastery of Cîteaux was at first black, but they pretend that the Holy Virgin, appearing to St. Alberic, gave him a white habit, from which time they changed their black habit for a white one, only retaining the black scapulary. In memory of this change they keep a festival on the 5th of August, which they call, "The descent of the blessed Virgin at Cîteaux, and the miraculous changing from black to white."

The number of those who embraced the Cistercian order increasing, it was necessary to build more monasteries. Accordingly, in 1113, Stephen, abbot of Cîteaux, built that of La Ferte, in the diocese of Chalons. The next year, he founded Pontigni, in the diocese of Auxerre. Clairvaux, in the diocese of Langres, was built in 1115. The order increased further in 1118, by the founding of four other monasteries, which were Prully, La Cour-Dieu, Trois Fontaines, and Bonnevaux; and, in the following year, 1119, Bouras, Fontenay, Cadovin, and Maran, were founded. Then Stephen formed all these monasteries into one body, and drew up the constitutions of the order, which he called "The Charter of Charity," containing, in five chapters, all the necessary rules for the establishment and government of the order.

This order made a surprising progress. Fifty years after its institution, it had 500 abbeyes, and 1000 years afterwards, it boasted of 1800 abbeyes, most of which had been founded before the year 1200. This great progress must be ascribed to the sanctity of the Cistercians, of whom Cardinal De Vitry, in his Western History, says, "The whole Church of Christ was full of the high reputation and opinion of their sanctity, as it were with the odour of some divine balsam; and that there was no country or province wherein this vine, loaded with blessings, had not spread forth its branches." And, describing their observances, he says, "They neither wore skins nor shirts, nor ever ate flesh, except in sickness, and abstained from fish, eggs, milk and cheese; they lay only upon straw beds, in their tunics and cowls; they rose at midnight, and sang praises to God till break of day; they spent the day in labour, reading, and prayer; and, in all their exercises, they observed a strict and continual silence; they fasted from the Feast of the Exaltation of the Holy Cross till Easter; and they exercised hospitality towards the poor, with extraordinary charity."

The order of Cistercians became in time so powerful, that it governed almost all Europe, both in spirituals and temporal. It did also great service to the church by means of the eminent men it produced. These religious were employed by the pope to convert the Albigenses. Some authors say, there have been six popes of this order: but it will be difficult to find any more than Eugenius III. and Benedict XII. It boasts of about forty cardinals, a great number of archbishops, bishops, &c. &c.

CLARENDON, CONSTITUTIONS OF, sixteen articles formed at the council held at that place, in the reign of Henry II., bearing that all differences relative to the right of patronage should be tried in the civil courts; that no churches, which are fees of the crown, can be disposed of in perpetual donation without the king's consent; that all clergymen, charged with crimes against the laws, shall appear before the Lord Chief Justice, as well as before the ecclesiastical courts, and none of them, after conviction, be protected by the church; that no clergyman shall go out of the kingdom, without his Majesty's consent, and their giving proper security of their doing nothing to the prejudice of him or his subjects; that accusations of laymen, in ecclesiastical courts, shall be proved by respectable witnesses; that excommunicated persons shall not be compelled to reside in any particular locality; that no person holding immediately of the king, or any of his barons, should be excommunicated, &c., without first acquainting the king or his chief justice; that none shall appeal from the archbishop's court without his Majesty's consent; that bishops and abbots must perform the services annexed to their tenures when required, be present at all trials, except when sentences of blood, or of losing life or limb, are to be pronounced; that the revenues of all vacant bishoprics, abbeys, or priories of a royal foundation, shall be paid into the king's exchequer; that the king shall have the power of convening the electors of bishops, abbots, and priors, and the electors must do homage to him before the consecration; that he shall punish every wrong done to the superior clergy, and they shall prosecute such as injure him; that no goods of forfeited persons shall be protected from his seizure, in churches or churchyards; that all pleas of debt shall be tried in civil courts, &c. These articles were designed to abridge and curb the power of the clergy, which, under the presidency, and owing to the ambition and influence of Thomas à Becket, had grown to an intolerable height.

CLARISSES, an order of nuns, so called from their founder, St. Clara. She was of the town of Assisa, in Italy, and, having renounced the world to dedicate herself to religion, gave birth to this order in the year 1212; which comprehends, not only those nuns who follow the rule of St. Francis, according to the strict letter, and without any mitigation, but those likewise who follow the same rule, softened and mitigated by several popes.

The reputation of St. Clara, being very great, soon gained her a great number of followers; for whom several monasteries began to be erected in several parts of Italy. In the year 1219, the order passed into Spain, and presently after into France. In the year 1224, St. Francis, at the request of St. Clara, prescribed rules for the government of the Clarisses, in which he forbade them to have any possessions, and enjoined them silence from the compline to the tierce of the following day. He gave them for their habit three tunics and a mantle. The rules of the Clarisses were approved by Gregory IX. and Innocent IV.

The order of St. Clara, which had made a great progress during the life of the founder, made a still greater after her death, and is at present one of the most flourishing orders of nuns in Europe.

In Italy there are monasteries of Clarisses, some of which take the name of "Nuns of the Strict Observance;" others that of "Solitaries of the Institution of St. Peter of Alcantara." The former had for their foundress Frances de Jesus-Maria, of the house of Farnese, who built their first monastery at Albana, in the year 1631. These nuns observe the rule of St. Clara in its utmost rigour. The other had for their founder Cardinal Barberini, who built their first monastery in the town of Farsa. They were denominated from St. Peter of Alcantara, because, in all things, they imitated the rigorous and penitent life of that saint.

After Ferdinand Cortez had conquered Mexico for the king of Spain, Isabella of Portugal, wife of the emperor Charles V., sent thither some nuns of the order of St. Clara, who made several settlements there, particularly at Zuchimilci, Tetzenci, Quans-thitlani, Telmanaci, Tapeaca, Thevacana, and in several other places. Near their monasteries were founded communities of Indian young women, to be instructed by the Clarisses in religion, and such works as were suitable to persons of their sex. These communities of Indian girls are so considerable, that they usually consist of no less than four or five hundred.

CLARKE, DR. SAMUEL, a celebrated divine of the sixteenth century, was born at Norwich, on the 11th of October, 1673, his father being an alderman of that city. He received his first education in the free school in that place, under the superintendence of the Rev. Mr. Burton, but was, in a short time, removed to Caius College, Cambridge. Whilst at that university, he devoted much of his time to the study of theology; and diligently cultivated a knowledge of the Old Testament in the original Hebrew; the New, in the original Greek; and the primitive Christian writers. Before he arrived at the age of twenty-one, he largely contributed to the Newtonian system; a study, the knowledge of which, by application and industry, he made himself master of. He translated Rohault's Physics, for the use of young students, which has been considered the most concise and best that has been written. In 1699, he published "Three practical Essays upon Baptism, Confirmation, and Repentance," containing full instructions for a holy life, with earnest exhortations to young persons, drawn from the consideration of the severity of the discipline of the primitive church; and in 1701, his "Paraphrase on the Four Gospels" was put to press. In the year 1704, he delivered a lecture on "The Being and Attributes of God;" and in the following year, on the "Evidence of Natural and Revealed Religion," in which he displayed a force of reasoning, a vein of piety, and an extent of knowledge, that proved that his mind was at once vast and comprehensive, and that he was indeed no ordinary man. These sermons he afterwards enlarged on, improved, and published: and the work is a standard book in the English language. Dr. Hoadley, bishop of Winchester, when speaking of this work, and of his writings, said, "He has in them laid the foundation of true religion too deep and strong to be shaken, either by the superstition of some, or the infidelity of others." In 1706, Dr. Clarke obtained the rectory of St. Bennet's, Paul's Wharf, in London, where he executed the duties of his ministerial office with zeal and devotion. During this year he translated Sir Isaac Newton's Treatise on Optics into Latin. He enjoyed the peculiar patronage and friendship of this great man, and it was at his request that that admirable translation was accomplished. His patron was so well pleased with the performance, that he presented him with the sum of 500*l.* as a mark of his approbation and esteem. He also introduced him to court, and procured him the favour of Queen Anne, who appointed him one of her chaplains. She also made him the presentation of the rectory of St. James's, Westminster, where he read lectures on the Church Catechism for many months in the year, on a Thursday evening; and which have been since published, and received, as they merited, very general approbation. In 1709, he took his degree of Doctor in Divinity, at Cambridge; and soon afterwards became engaged in a warm controversy on the "Scripture Doctrine of the Trinity," which tended greatly to spread Arianism over the country. He seems to have been led into the erroneous views which he adopted, and attempted to defend, by his metaphysical turn of mind, and by pursuing improperly the language of human creeds respecting the generation of the Son of God. About this time he was presented by Mr. Lechmere, Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, to the Mastership of Wigston's Hospital, in Leicester; and in 1727, the offer was made him of the place of Master of the Mint, but this he refused.

His death was very sudden and painful. On the morning of the day he preached before the judges at Serjeants' Inn, he was seized with a pain in his side, which, in the evening, ascended to his head, and proved fatal on the following morning, May the 17th, 1729.

CLERGY, (from the Greek word, κληρος, heritage,) in the general sense of the word, as used by us, signifies the body of ecclesiastics of the Christian church, in contradistinction to the laity; but, strictly speaking, and according to Scripture, it means the church. The New Testament writers apply this term to the whole Christian church, 1 Pet. v. 3. Thus it is the church distinguished from the world, and not one part of the church as distinguished from another part. The word clergy, however, among us, always refers to ecclesiastics. In North America it is applied to ministers of all denominations. When a Catholic priest receives the tonsure, he repeats a part of the sixteenth Psalm:—"The Lord is the portion of mine inheritance," &c. According to the doctrine of the Romish church, a clergyman is endowed, in his spiritual character, with supernatural powers, which distinguish him from the layman, such as the power to forgive sins, and to consecrate the bread, so as to convert it into the real body of Christ, &c.

The clergy, after the apostolic age, consisted of bishops, priests and deacons; but in the third century, many inferior orders were appointed, such as sub-deacons, acolythists, readers, &c. The clergy of the church of Rome are divided into regular and secular.—The regular consists of those monks or religious who have taken upon them holy orders of the priesthood in their respective monasteries. The secular clergy are those who are not of any religious order, and have the care and direction of parishes. The Protestant clergy are all secular. (For ARCHBISHOPS, BISHOPS, DEANS, &c., &c., see those articles.)

The clergy have large privileges allowed them by our municipal laws, and had formerly much greater, which were abridged at the Reformation on account of the ill use which the popish clergy had endeavoured to make of them; for the laws having exempted them from almost every personal duty, they attempted a total exemption from every secular tie. The personal exemptions, indeed, for the most part continue. A clergyman cannot be compelled to serve on a jury, nor to appear at a court leet, which almost every other person is obliged to do; but if a layman be summoned on a jury, and before the trial takes orders, he shall, notwithstanding, appear, and be sworn. Neither can he be chosen to any temporal office, as bailiff, reeve, constable, or the like, in regard of his own continual attendance on the sacred function, though the clergy are now often found filling the office of justice of the peace. During his attendance on divine service, he is privileged from arrests in civil suits. In cases of felony, also, a clerk in orders shall have the benefit of clergy, without being branded in the hand, and may likewise have it more than once; in both which cases he is distinguished from a layman.

Benefit of Clergy, was a privilege whereby a clergyman claimed to be delivered to his ordinary to purge himself of felony, and which anciently was allowed only to those who were in orders; but, by the statute of 18 Eliz., every man to whom the benefit of clergy is granted, though not in orders, is put to read at the bar, after he is found guilty, and convicted of felony, and so burnt in the hand, and set free for the first time, if the ordinary or deputy standing by do say, Legis ut clericus: otherwise he shall suffer death. As the clergy have their privileges, so they have also their disabilities, on account of their spiritual avocations. Clergymen are incapable of sitting in the House of Commons; and by statute 21 Henry VIII. c. 13, are not in general allowed to take any lands or tenements to farm, upon pain of 10*l.* per month, and total avoidance of the lease; nor upon like pain to keep any taphouse or brewhouse; nor engage in any trade, nor sell any merchandise, under forfeiture of the treble value; which prohibition is consonant to the canon law.

The number of clergy in England and Wales amount, according to the best calculation, to 18,000. The revenues of the clergy were formerly considerable, but since the Reformation they are comparatively small, at least those of the inferior clergy. See the Bishop of Llandaff's Valuation of the Church and University Revenues; or, Cove on the Revenues of the Church, 1797, second edition; Burnet's History of his own Times, conclusion. See MINISTER.

CLERK. 1. A word originally used to denote a learned man, or man of letters, but now is the common appellation by which clergymen distinguish themselves in signing any deed or instrument. 2. Also the person who reads the responses of the congregation in the church, or gives out the hymns at a meeting.

CLUNIAC MONKS, religious of the order of Clugni. It is the first branch of the order of St. Benedict.

St. Bernon, of the family of the Earls of Burgundy, was the founder of this order. In the year 910, he built a monastery for the reception of Benedictine monks, in the town of Clugni, situated in the Mazonnois, a little province of France, on the river Garonne.

The monks of Clugni (or Cluni) were remarkable for their sanctity. They every day sang two solemn masses. They so strictly observed silence, that they would rather have died than break it before the hour of prime. When they were at work, they recited psalms. They fed eighteen poor persons every day, and were so profuse of their charity in Lent, that one year, at the beginning of Lent, they distributed salt meat, and other alms, among 7000 poor.

The preparation they used for making the bread, which was to serve for the Eucharist, is worthy to be observed. They first chose the wheat grain by grain, and washed it very carefully. Then a servant carried it in a bag to the mill, and washed the grindstones, and covered them with curtains. The meal was afterwards washed in clean water, and baked in iron moulds.

The extraordinary discipline observed in the monastery of Clugni soon spread its fame in all parts. France, Germany, England, Spain, and Italy, desired to have some of these religious, for whom they built new monasteries. They also passed into the East; and there was scarcely a place in Europe where the order was not known.

The principal monasteries in which the discipline and rules of Clugni were observed, were those of Tullés in the Limousin, Aurillac in Auvergne, Bourgdien and Massay in Berri, St. Bennet on the Loire in the Orleanois, St. Peter le Vif at Sens, St. Allire of Clermont, St. Julian of Tours, Sarlat in Perigord, and Roman-Mourier in the country of Vaux.

This order was divided into ten provinces, being those of Dauphiné, Auvergne, Poitiers, Saintonge, and Gascony, in France; Spain, Italy, Lombardy, Germany, and England.

At the general chapters, formerly held yearly, and now every three years, two visitors are chosen for every province, and two others for the monasteries of nuns of this order, fifteen definitors, three auditors of causes, and two auditors of excuses. There were formerly five principal priories, called the five first daughters of Clugni; but, since the dissolution of the monasteries in England, which involved that of St. Pancrace, at Lewes in Sussex, there remain but four principal priories, being those of La Charité sur Loire, St. Martin des Champs at Paris, Souvigni, and Souxillanges.

The Cluniac monks were first brought into England by William, Earl of Warren, about the year of our Lord 1077. These religious, though they lived under the rule of St. Benedict, and wore a black habit, yet, because their discipline and observances differed in many things from those of the Benedictines, therefore they were not called Benedictines, but Monks of the order of Clugni. In the reign of Henry V., the Cluniac monasteries, by reason of the war between England and France, were cut off from the obedience of the Abbot of Clugni, nor were they permitted to have any intercourse with the monasteries of their order out of England. The monasteries of Cluniac monks in England amounted in number to thirty-eight. See BENEDICTINES.

COCCEIANS, a school which arose in the seventeenth century, so called from John Cocceius, professor of divinity in the university of Leyden. He represented the whole history of the Old Testament as a mirror, which held forth an accurate view of the transactions and events that were to happen in the church under the dispensation of the New Testament, and unto the end of the world. He maintained that by far the greatest part of the ancient prophecies foretold Christ's ministry and mediation, and the rise, progress, and revolutions of the church, not only under the figure of persons and transactions, but in a literal manner, and by the very sense of the words used in these predictions; and laid it down as a fundamental rule of interpretation, that the words and phrases of Scripture are to be understood in every sense of which they are susceptible, or, in other words, that they signify in effect every thing that they can possibly signify.

Cocceius also taught, that the covenant made between God and the Jewish nation, by the ministry of Moses, was of the same nature as the new covenant, obtained by the mediation of Jesus Christ. In consequence of this general principle, he maintained that the ten commandments were promulgated by Moses, not as a rule of obedience, but as a representation of the covenant of grace—that when the Jews had provoked the Deity by their various transgressions, particularly by the worship of the golden calf, the severe and servile yoke of the ceremonial law was added to the decalogue, as a punishment inflicted on them by the Supreme Being in his righteous displeasure—that this yoke, which was painful in itself, became doubly so on account of its typical signification, since it admonished the Israelites, from day to day, of the imperfection and uncertainty of their state, filled them with anxiety, and was a perpetual proof that they had merited the righteous displeasure of God, and could not expect, before the coming of the Messiah, the entire remission of their iniquities—that indeed good men, even under the Mosaic dispensation, were, immediately after death, made partakers of everlasting glory; but that they were, nevertheless, during the whole course of their lives, far removed from that firm hope and assurance of salvation which rejoices the faithful under the dispensation of the Gospel—and that their anxiety flowed naturally from this consideration, that their sins, though they remained unpunished, were not pardoned, because Christ had not as yet offered himself up a sacrifice to the Father, to make an entire atonement for them.

CELICOLÆ, (worshippers of the heavens,) an obscure sect of African heretics, who seem to have mixed up some parts of Judaism and Paganism with Christianity.

CENOBITE, one who lives in a convent, or in a community, under a certain rule; in opposition to a hermit, who lives in solitude. Cassian makes this difference between a convent and a monastery, that the latter may be applied to the residence of a single religious or recluse; whereas the convent implies cœnobites, or numbers of religious living in common. Fleury speaks of three kinds of monks in Egypt; anchorites, who live in solitude; cœnobites, who continue to live in community; and sarabaites, who are a kind of monks-errant, that stroll from place to place. He refers the institution of cœnobites to the time of the Apostles, and makes it a kind of imitation of the ordinary lives of the faithful at Jerusalem; though St. Pachomius is ordinarily owned to be the institutor of the cœnobia life, as being the first who gave a rule to any community.

COLLECT, a short prayer. In the liturgy of the Church of England, and the mass of the Romanists, it denotes a prayer accommodated to any particular day, occasion, or the like. In general, all the prayers in each office are called collects, either because the priest speaks in the name of the whole assembly, whose sentiments and desires he sums up by the word "Oremus," "Let us pray," or because those prayers are offered when the people are assembled together. The Popes Gelasius and Gregory are said to have been the first who established collects. Dr. Despençe, of Paris, wrote a treatise on collects, their origin, antiquity, &c.

COLLEGIANS, or COLLEGIANTS, a sect formed among the Arminians and Baptists in Holland, about the beginning of the seventeenth century: so called because of their colleges or meetings twice every week, where every one, females excepted, has the same liberty of expounding the Scripture, praying, &c. They are said to be all either Arians or Socinians: they never communicate in the college, but meet twice a year, from all parts of Holland, at Rhinsbergh (whence they are also called Rhinsbergers), a village two miles from Leyden, where they communicate together; admitting every one that presents himself, professing his faith in the divinity of the Holy Scriptures, and resolution to live suitably to their precepts and doctrines, without regard to his sect or opinion. They have no particular ministers, but each officiates as he is disposed. They baptize by immersion.

COMMENDAM, the trust or administration of the revenues of a vacant benefice, till it is provided with a regular incumbent. The practice, resorted to chiefly for the purpose of making up the smaller incomes of some of the bishops, has given occasion to great abuses; the bishops procuring several benefices, all of which they have held under this pretext, without directly violating the canon law. When a parson is made bishop, his parsonage becomes vacant; but, if the king give him power, he may still hold it in commendam.

COMMENTARY, an exposition; book of annotations or remarks. There are some people so wise in their own conceit, and think human helps of so little worth, that they despise commentaries on the Scriptures altogether; but every student or preacher, whose business is to explain the sacred oracles, to make known the mind of God to others, to settle cases of conscience, to oppose the sophistry of sceptics, and to confound the arguments of infidels, would do well to avail himself of the most judicious, clear, copious, critical, and sound commentaries on the Bible. Nor can I suppose that commentaries can be useless to the common people; for though a spirit of serious inquiry, with a little good sense, will go a great way in understanding the Bible, yet as the language is often figurative, as allusions are made to ancient customs, and some parts require more investigation than many common Christians have time for, a plain exposition certainly must be useful. Expositions of the Bible, however, may be made a bad use of. He who takes the ipse dixit of a commentator, without ever examining whether the meaning given comport with the text; he who gives himself no trouble to investigate the Scripture for himself, but takes occasion to be indolent because others have laboured for him, surely does wrong. Nor can it be said that those preachers use them properly, who, in making their sermons, form their plans from the commentator before they have thought upon the text. The best way is to employ our own talents; first, by prayer, study, and attention to form our scheme, and then to examine the opinions of others concerning it. We shall here present the reader with a view of some of those commentaries which are the most generally approved. And, 1. Henry takes the lead for common utility. The sprightly notes, the just inferences, the original thoughts, and the warm applications to the conscience, make this work justly admired. Though making no pretensions to criticism, he gives the results of deep critical research. It is true that there are some expressions which do not agree with the evangelical system; but, as the late Mr. Ryland observes, "Tis impossible for a person of piety and taste to read him without wishing to be shut out from all the world to read him through without one moment's interruption." Mr. Henry did not live to complete this work. He went as far as the end of Acts. Romans was done by Dr. Evans; the 1 Corinthians, Sam. Brown; 2 Corinthians, Dr. Mayo; Galatians, Mr. Bayes; Ephesians, Mr. Boswell; Philippians, Mr. Harris; Colossians, Mr. Harris; 1 and 2 Thessalonians, Mr. Mayo; 1 and 2 Timothy, Mr. Atkinson; Titus, Jer. Smith; Philemon, Mr. Mottershead; Hebrews, Mr. Tong; James, Mr. Wright; 1 Peter, Mr. Hill; 2 Peter, Mr. Morril; 1, 2, and 3 John, Mr. Reynolds; Jude, Mr. Billingsley; and Revelations, by Mr. Tong.

2. "Poli Synopsis Criticorum," five folio volumes. This is a valuable work, and ought to be in the possession of every student: it is much esteemed abroad, three editions of it having been published on the continent.

3. Rosenmüller's Scholia on the Old and New Testament contain a vast fund of biblical illustration, and should be in the library of every theological student. It is only to be regretted that the "Scholia" of the younger Rosenmüller, on the Old Testament, should be strongly tinged with neology.

4. Poole's Annotations, a rich and useful work. These were printed at London in 1685, in two volumes, folio. Poole did not complete this work himself. Mr. Jackson, of Moulsey, is the author of the annotations on the 59th and 60th chaps. of Isaiah. Dr. Colliſing drew up the notes on the rest of Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Lamentations, as also those on the four Evangelists, the two Epistles to the Corinthians, and that to the Galatians. Those to Timothy, Titus, Philemon, and the Revelation, Ezekiel, and the minor Prophets, were done by Mr. Hurst. Daniel, by Mr. Cooper; the Acts, by Mr. Vincke; the Epistle to the Romans, by Mr. Mayo; the Ephesians, Mr. Veale; the Philippians and Colossians, Mr. Adams; the Hebrews, Mr. Obadiah Hughes; the epistle of St. James, the two of St. Peter, and that of Jude, by Mr. Veale; the three epistles of St. John, by Mr. Howe.

5. Dr. Gill's in nine vols. quarto, is an immense work: and though it contains a great deal of repetition and extraneous matter, there is certainly a vast fund of information in it, especially on Hebraical and Rabbinical subjects.

6. Brown's Self-interpreting Bible, in two vols. quarto. Its chief excellences are the marginal references, which are exceedingly useful to preachers; and the close, plain, and practical improvement to each chapter.

7. Scott's Exposition is excellent, as it abounds with practical remarks, and the last edition contains choice marginal references. The improvements are also very useful for families.

8. Dr. Adam Clarke's Commentary, with critical notes and marginal references, possesses considerable merit, and will be found a valuable treasure for the biblical student.

9. Clericus in Vet. et Nov. Test.

On the New Testament.

1. Burkitt contains many ingenious observations, fine turns, natural plans, and pungent addresses to the conscience. There are some expressions, however, that grate upon the ear of the evangelical Christian.

2. Guise's Paraphrase is deservedly held in high estimation for sound doctrine, fair explanation, and just sentiment.

3. Doddridge's Family Expositor. The criticisms in this work render it valuable. It must be owned that the Doctor laboured to come as near as possible to the true sense of the text.

4. Beza's Annotations, in quibus ratio interpretationis redditur; accessit etiam J. Camerarii in Novum Fœdus commentarius, fol. Cantab. 1642, contains, besides the old Latin version, Beza's own version; and in the side margin is given a summary of the passage, and in the argumentative parts the connexion.

5. Wolfi Curæ Philologicæ et Criticæ in Omnibus Libros Nov. Test. 5 vols. 4to. 1739. Hamb. Basil, 1741. This is in a great measure a compilation after the manner of Poole's Synopsis, but interspersed with his own critical animadversions.

6. Bengelii Gnomon Nov. Test. 4to. Tübingæ, 1759, and Ulmæ, 1763, contains an instructive preface, a perspicuous analysis of each book, with short notes. It is a perfect contrast to that of Wolfius.

7. Hammond's Paraphrase and Annotations upon all the books of the New Testament, folio.

8. Whitby's Paraphrase and Commentary on New Test., two vols. folio.

9. Wesley's Explanatory Notes, 4to. or three vols. 12mo. For different translations, see article BIBLE.

As this article may be consulted for the purpose of obtaining information as to the best helps for understanding the Scriptures, we may add to the above—Jacobi Elsner, Observat. Sacrae, Alberti Observ. Philolog.; Lamberti Bos, Exercit. Philolog.; Lamberti Bos, Observat. Miscell. Fortuita Sacra; and the Edinburgh Biblical Cabinet.

These, together with Wolfius and Raphaelius, before mentioned, says Dr. Doddridge, are books which I cannot but recommend to my young friends, as proper not only to ascertain the sense of a variety of words and phrases which occur in the apostolic writings, but also to form them to the most useful method of studying the Greek classics—those great masters of solid sense, elegant expression, just and lively painting, and masculine eloquence, to the neglect of which I cannot but ascribe that enervate, dissolute, and puerile manner of writing, which is growing so much on the present age, and will probably consign so many of its productions to speedy oblivion. See also books recommended under the articles BIBLE, SCRIPTURES.

COMMISSARY, an officer of the bishop, who exercises spiritual jurisdiction in places of a diocese so far from the episcopal see, that the chancellor cannot call the people to the bishop's principal consistory court without great inconvenience.

COMMUNICATING, a term made use of to denote the act of receiving the Lord's Supper. Those of the reformed and of the Greek Church communicate under both kinds; those of the Romish, only under one. The oriental communicants receive the species of wine by a spoon; and anciently they sucked it through a pipe, as has been observed by Beat. Rheanus on Tertullian.

COMMUNION, in its strict and proper sense, signifies doing something in common with another, Acts ii. 42, where κοινωνία properly signifies the ordinance of common contribution to the necessities of the saints, which was observed in the primitive church in connexion with the breaking of bread. 2. In a more general sense, it denotes conformity or agreement, 2 Cor. vi. 14; Eph. v. 11. 3. Communion is also used for the Lord's Supper, because we herein make a public profession of our conformity to Christ and his laws; and of our agreement with other Christians in the spirit and faith of the gospel. See LORD'S SUPPER.

The fourth Council of Lateran decrees, that every believer shall receive the communion, at least, at Easter; which seems to import a tacit desire that they should do it oftener, as in effect they did it much oftener in the primitive days. Gratian, and the Master of the Sentences, prescribe it as a rule for the laity to communicate three times a year—at Easter, Whitsuntide, and Christmas; but in the thirteenth century, the practice prevailed of never approaching the eucharist at Easter; and the council thought fit to enjoin it then by a law, lest their coldness and remissness should go farther still; and the Council of Trent renewed the same injunction, and recommended frequent communion, without enforcing it by an express decree. In the ninth century, the communion was still received by the laity in both kinds, or rather the species of bread was dipped in the wine, as is owned by the Romanists themselves. M. de Marca observes, that they received it at first in their hands; and believes the communion, under one kind alone, to have had its rise in the West, under Pope Urban II., in 1096, at the time of the conquest of the Holy Land. It was more solemnly enjoined by the Council of Constance, in 1414. The twenty-eighth canon of the Council of Clermont enjoins the communion to be received under both kinds distinctly; adding, however, two exceptions—the one of necessity, the other of caution—the first in favour of the sick, and the second of the abstemious, or those who had an aversion for wine. It was formerly a kind of canonical punishment for clerks guilty of any crime, to be reduced to lay communion—i. e. only to receive it as the laity did—viz. under one kind. They had another punishment of the same nature, though under a different name, called foreign communion, to which the canons frequently condemned their bishops and other clerks. This punishment was not any excommunication or deposition, but a kind of suspension from the function of the order, and a degradation from the rank they held in the church. It had its name because the communion was only granted to the criminal on the foot of a foreign clerk—i. e. being reduced to the lowest of his order, he took his place after all those of his rank, as all clerks, &c. did in the churches to which they did not belong. The second Council of Agda orders every clerk that absents himself from the church to be reduced to foreign communion.

Church communion is fellowship with any particular church. See CHURCH FELLOWSHIP. It is sometimes applied to different churches united in doctrine and discipline. The three grand communions into which the Christian Church is divided are those of the Church of Rome, the Greek Church, and the Protestant Church; but originally, all Christians were in communion with each other, having one faith and discipline.

Free Catholic communion, a term made use of in relation to the Lord's Supper, by which it is understood that all those who have been baptized, whether in infancy or adult age, may, on a credible profession of their faith, sit down at the Lord's table with others of different denominations. Some of the Antipedobaptists object to free or mixed communion, and do not allow of persons who have been baptized in their infancy to join in the celebration of the Lord's Supper with them; because they look upon such as not having been baptized at all, and, consequently, not to be admitted to the table. Others, however, suppose that this ought to be no objection; and that those who believe themselves to be really baptized, (though in infancy,) are partakers of grace, belong to the true Church of Christ, and are truly devoted to God, ought not to be rejected on account of a different opinion about a mere ordinance.

When the kingdom of heaven was first set up among men, there was only one name by which its subjects were designated, but one authority to which they all bowed, and one fellowship to which they all belonged. A primitive Christian could have formed no idea of the character of a person, or the kind of treatment to which he was entitled, whom he was called to recognise as a believer, but with whom he must not have communion in the most sacred ordinance of the Gospel. There were differences of opinion and practice then as well as now, but such a thing as that just adverted to could neither have been understood nor practised. Had Christianity been left to maintain and extend itself in the world by its own unaided power, and its own scriptural means, it is probable that this state of things would have continued. But when it was thought necessary to define it more accurately than God himself had done; to require men to submit to human expositions of the faith, rather than the faith itself; and to employ coercive measures to preserve and enforce uniformity of opinion and practice, the glorious unity of the Church of Christ was invaded and destroyed by the very means devised to preserve it.

The wretched state of division which still subsists in the Christian Church, is chiefly owing to the continuance of these causes. Terms of communion, entirely of human framing, continue to enclose and hedge up the several parties into which the Christian world is divided, and to keep them separate from one another. God is not sufficiently trusted to take care of his own cause, and to preserve his kingdom from ruin. Man must devise his schemes of preservation and enlargement, must interpose the use of his power, and the dictum of his authority to maintain unity and peace.

It cannot be doubted, that if Christians acted more according to their own feelings, and less under the influence of authority, custom, or interest, a different state of things would soon appear. Did they consult the Scriptures more, and human opinion less—were it their sole object to ascertain facts and principles as the groundwork of their own obedience, instead of looking for the confirmation of hypotheses, or for arguments to justify received systems; and did they, in connexion with this conduct, determine to hold fellowship with all whom they could regard as holding the same head, substantial unity in the Church of Christ would soon be again restored. But if men will give up nothing that they have been taught by tradition or authority to receive—if a difference of opinion on some of the five points is deemed incompatible with the acknowledgment of the Christian character—if the ministry of a servant of Christ is considered invalid, unless he has received it from episcopal or presbyterian hands—if Christian communion is made dependent on submission to a particular form of baptism, or a particular mode of administering the Lord's Supper—if all churches must be regarded as sectarian and schismatical which are not established by human laws—then, while these things are thus viewed and maintained, it would be absurd to look for love and union among the followers of Christ. Killingworth, Booth, and Kinghorn, have written against free communion; Robinson, Hall, Mason, and others in defence of it.—Orme's Life of Baxter.

COMMUNION, spiritual or divine, is that delightful fellowship and intercourse which a believer enjoys with God. It is founded upon union with him, and consists in a communication of divine graces from him, and a return of devout affections to him. The believer holds communion with God in his works, in his word, and in his ordinances. There can be no communion without likeness, nor without Christ as the mediator. Some distinguish communion with God from the sense and feeling of it—that is, that we may hold communion with him without raptures of joy; and that a saint, even under desertion, may have communion with God as really, though not so feelingly, as at any other time. This communion cannot be interrupted by any local mutations: it is far superior to all outward services and ordinances whatsoever; it concerns the whole soul, all the affections, faculties, and motions of it being under its influence: it is only imperfect in this life, and will be unspeakably enlarged in a better world. In order to keep up communion with God, we should inform ourselves of his will, John v. 39; be often in prayer, Luke xviii. 1; embrace opportunities of retirement, Ps. iv. 4; contemplate the divine perfections, providences, and promises, Ps. civ. 34; watch against a vain, trifling, and volatile spirit, Eph. iv. 30; and be found in the use of all the means of grace, Ps. xxvii. 4. The advantages of communion with God are, deadness to the world, Phil. iii. 8; patience under trouble, Job i. 22; fortitude in danger, Ps. xxvii. 1; gratitude for mercies received, Ps. ciii. 1; direction under difficulties, Prov. iii. 5, 6; happiness in death, Ps. xxiii. 4; and an earnest desire for heaven and glory, 2 Tim. iv. 7, 8. See Shaw's Immanuel; Owen and Henry on Communion; and article FELLOWSHIP.

COMMUNION-SERVICE, the office in the liturgy of the Church of England for the administration of the eucharist, or sacrament of the Lord's Supper.

The compilers of the Common Prayer Book extracted this office out of several ancient liturgies—as those of St. Basil, St. Ambrose, and St. Gregory; but Bucer having found great fault with it, it underwent several alterations. The office was originally designed to be distinct, and, consequently, to be used at a different time from morning prayer. A custom which, Bishop Overall says, was observed in his time, in York and Chichester; and he imputes it to the negligence of the ministers, and carelessness of the people, that they are ever huddled together into one office.

By the last rubric after this office, part of it is appointed to be read on every Sunday and holiday, though there be no communicants; and the reason seems to have been, that the Church may show her readiness to administer the sacrament upon those days, and that it is not hers, but the people's fault, that it is not administered; or it might be so ordered, for the sake of reading the Decalogue, or Ten Commandments, the collects, epistles, and gospels, and the Nicene Creed; together with the Offertory, or sentences of Scripture, and the prayer for Christ's Church.

This service, even when there is no communion, is generally read at the communion table, or altar; though in some places it is performed in the reading desk.

COMPREHENSION, in English church history, denotes a scheme proposed by Sir Orlando Bridgman, in 1667-8, for relaxing the terms of conformity on behalf of the Protestant Dissenters, and admitting them into the communion of the church. A bill for this purpose was drawn up by Judge Hale, but disallowed. The attempt was renewed by Tillotson and Stillingfleet, in 1674, and the terms were settled to the satisfaction of the non-conformists; but the bishops refused their assent. The scheme was likewise revived again immediately after the Revolution. The king and queen expressed their desire of an union: however, the design failed, after two attempts, and the Act of Toleration was obtained.

CONCEPTION, IMMACULATE, the opinion entertained in the Roman and Greek Churches, that the Virgin Mary was conceived without the stain of original sin. St. Bernard in the twelfth century, rejected this doctrine in opposition to the canons of Lyons, and it afterwards became a subject of vehement controversy between the Scotists and the Thomists. The Dominicans espoused the opinion of Thomas, who impugned the dogma; the Franciscans that of Scotus, who defended it. Sixtus IV., himself a Franciscan, allowed of toleration on the point. In the fifth session of the Council of Trent, it was resolved that the doctrine of the conception of all men in original sin was not intended to include the Virgin. The controversy was revived in the university of Paris, towards the close of the sixteenth century. During the pontificates of Paul V. and Gregory XV., such was the dissension it occasioned in Spain, that both Philip and his successor sent special embassies to Rome in the vain hope that this contest might be terminated by a bull. The dispute ran so high in that kingdom, that, in the military orders of St. James, of the Sword, of Calatrava, and of Alcantara, the knights, on their admission, vowed to maintain the doctrine. In 1708, Clement XI. appointed a festival to be celebrated throughout the church, in honour of the immaculate conception. Since that time it has been received in the Church of Rome as an opinion, but not as an article of faith. It is firmly believed in the Greek church, in which the feast is celebrated under the name of the Conception of St. Anne. Peter of Alva et Astorga published more than forty huge volumes on this subject.

CONCEPTION OF OUR LADY, NUNS OF THE ORDER OF, a religious order, founded by Beatrix de Sylva, sister of James, first Count of Porailegro in Portugal. This lady being carried to the court of Castile, by Elizabeth, daughter of Edward, King of Portugal, whom the King of Castile had married, and the king having fallen in love with her on account of her great beauty, the jealous queen locked her up in a chamber, where she left her without meat or drink for three days. In this condition she implored the assistance of the Holy Virgin, who appeared to her, and comforted her, promising her a speedy release, which soon happened. But Beatrix, fearing the further resentment of the queen, privately withdrew from court, and fled to Toledo; where arriving, she retired to a monastery of Dominican nuns, in which she continued forty years, in the practice of all sorts of austerities. Here the Virgin Mary again appeared to her, and inspired her with the design of founding an order in honour of her own immaculate conception. To this end, she obtained of the queen a grant of the palace of Galiana, where was a chapel dedicated to the honour of St. Faith. Beatrix, accompanied by twelve young maids of the Dominican monastery, took possession of it in the year 1484. These religious were habited in a white gown and scapulary, and a blue mantle, and wore on their scapulary the image of the blessed Virgin. Pope Innocent VIII. confirmed the order in 1489, and granted them permission to follow the rule of the Cisterrians. The foundress died in the year 1490, at sixty-six years of age.

After the death of Beatrix, Cardinal Ximenes put the nuns of the Conception under the direction of the Franciscans, as being the most zealous defenders of the Immaculate Conception: at the same time, he gave them the rule of St. Clara to follow. The second convent of the order was founded, in the year 1507, at Torrigio, in the diocese of Toledo, which produced seven others; the first of which was at Madrid. This order passed into Italy, and got footing in Rome and Milan. In the reign of Lewis XIV., King of France, the Clarisses of the suburb of St. Germain, at Paris, embraced the order of the Conception. These religious, besides the grand office of the Franciscans, recite on Sundays and holidays a lesser office, called "the office of the Conception of the Holy Virgin."

CONCLAVE, the assembly or meeting of the cardinals, shut up for the election of a pope. Conclave also signifies the place in which the cardinals of the Romish Church meet for the above-mentioned purpose. The conclave is a range of small cells, ten feet square, made of wainscot: these are numbered, and drawn by lot. They stand in a line along the galleries and hall of the Vatican, with a small space between each. Every cell has the arms of the cardinal over it. The conclave is not fixed to any one determinate place, for the constitutions of the church allow the cardinals to make choice of such a place for the conclave as they think most convenient; yet it is generally held in the Vatican.

The following account of the formalities which precede the opening of the Electoral College, and of the organization of the assembly, is given in a French paper:—As soon as the pope dies, rooms or apartments are prepared in the Vatican, equal in number to the members of the sacred college. These apartments, or cells, formed of wood-work in the vast halls of the palace, are very modestly furnished. They have no separate fire-place, and the fathers must warm themselves at fires common to all. The chambers for the cardinals and the officers of their suite are very gloomy; the windows, with the exception of the higher panes, being walled in.

The clock of the capitol announces the death of the pope, and the vacancy of the see. It tolls for nine days and nine nights without interruption. In the mean time, the funeral ceremonies of the deceased are preparing. On the ninth day, the body of the last pope disposes, in the church of St. Peter, that of his predecessor. During the interregnum, or the time that intervenes between the death of one, and the election of another pontiff, the executive power of the state is exercised by the cardinal great chamberlain. The legal term for the opening of the conclave is the tenth day after the death of the pope, but it rarely happens that the necessary preparations can be completed by that time; thirteen or fourteen days are generally allowed for the previous arrangements, and for the arrival of the foreign cardinals in Rome. If the assembly opens before, it is only for the sake of form. They do nothing till the arrival of such fathers from France, Spain, Austria, Poland, or other Catholic countries, as wish to attend. The preliminary operations are, therefore, trifling and unimportant. When the members are assembled, and the conclave proceeds seriously to its task, three cardinals are elected every day to be the delegates to the sacred college, and to transact the affairs of the papacy with foreign ambassadors. These representatives of the Catholic powers deliver their credential letters to the ephemeral commissioners of the sacred college at the grating of their temporary prison. The time of deliberation is prolonged according to the number and power of the candidates, the difficulty of adjusting adverse pretensions, or the success of diplomatic intrigues. Though apparently cut off from all communication of the external world, these ghostly fathers often receive directions as to their choice, offers of bribes, or information of the designs of their rivals, through the grating of their cells, or the only part of the window which the law leaves open. A letter sometimes is transmitted in the stuffing of a fowl, or under the crust of a pie.

CONCORD, form of.—Form of concord, in ecclesiastical history, a standard book among the Lutherans, composed at Torgau, in 1576, and thence called the Book of Torgau, and reviewed at Berg, by six Lutheran doctors of Germany, the principal of whom was James Andree. This book contains, in two parts, a system of doctrine, the subscription of which was a condition of communion, and a formal and very severe condemnation of all who differed from the compilers of it; particularly with respect to the majesty and omnipresence of Christ's body, and the real manducation of his flesh and blood in the eucharist. It was first imposed upon the Saxons by Augustine, and occasioned great opposition and disturbance. The dispute about it was revived in Switzerland in 1718, when the magistrates of Bern published an order for adopting it as a rule of faith; the consequence of which was a contest that reduced its credit and authority.

CONCORDANCE, a book containing the principal words in the Holy Scriptures, in alphabetical order, with part of the connexion, and a designation by chapter and verse of the places in which they are to be found. This class of books is of great importance to the interpreter of the word of God. While the Scriptures remained in manuscript, or were not divided into sections and paragraphs, indices of their words and phrases could neither be formed nor used. As soon as any regular divisions began to be made, the importance of concordances, or alphabetical indices, was felt, and learned men devoted their labours to form them. The following are the most important works of this description in Hebrew, Greek, Latin, and English:—

I. HEBREW CONCORDANCES.

The first Hebrew concordance was the work of Rabbi Mordecai Nathan, which he began in 1438, and finished in 1448, after ten years' hard labour by himself and some assistants. It was printed at Venice in 1523. fol., by Dan. Bomberg. It is entirely Hebrew, and entitled "The Light of the Way." It was reprinted somewhat more correctly at Basil, by Frobenius, in 1581, and translated into Latin by Reuchlin, in 1556; but both the Hebrew and Latin editions are full of errors. These were mostly corrected, and other deficiencies supplied, by Marius de Calasio, a Franciscan friar, who published "Concordantiæ Sacrorum Bibliorum Hebraicorum, et Latinorum. Romæ, 1621, 4 vol. fol."—This large and splendid work retains the Hebrew text, and also the order and method of Nathan's Concordance. It contains also Reuchlin's Latin Translation of Rabbi Nathan's Explanation of the Hebrew Roots, with enlargements by Calasio; the Rabbinical, Chaldee, Syriac, and Arabic words derived from, or agreeing with, the Hebrew roots in signification; a literal Version of the Hebrew Text; the differences between the Vulgate and Septuagint are marked in the margin; proper names of persons, places, &c. It is a very complete, but exceedingly heavy work. Calasio died in 1620.

"Concordantiæ Bibliorum Hebraicæ, nova et artificiosa methodo dispositæ, &c. Basil, 1632, fol."—This concordance is the work of John Buxtorf, the father, but was published by his son. The ground-work of it is the concordance of Rabbi Nathan. It is much better arranged, more correctly printed, the roots more distinctly ascertained, and the meaning more accurately given. Buxtorf bestowed much labour and attention on it. The references are made by Hebrew letters to the chapters and verses of the different books in the Hebrew Bible; and as so much of the text is exhibited as is necessary to show the connexion in which any word is used, it is decidedly by far the best work of the kind extant. It only wants the particles as given by Noldius, to render it complete. It was abridged by Christian Ravinus, under the title of "Fons Zionis, sive Concordantiarum Hebraicarum et Chaldaicarum Jo. Buxtorffii Epitome. Berolini, 1677, 8vo."—The concordance of Calasio was re-published in London, under the direction of William Romaine, in 1747-1749, 4 vols. fol. It is more accurate than its prototype; but it is a very prolix work; and as only a small edition was published, it is become scarce. All the crowned heads in Europe, his Holiness not excepted, were subscribers to this work.

"The Hebrew concordance, adapted to the English Bible, disposed after the manner of Buxtorf. By John Taylor, D.D. Lond. 1754, 2 vols. fol."—This is a very useful work of the kind, especially to the English scholar. It was the fruit of many years' labour of the industrious author, and was published under the patronage of all the English and Irish bishops.

"Concordantiæ Librorum Vet. Test. Sacrorum Hebraicæ atque Chaldaicæ, &c., &c., auctore Julio Furstio. Lipsiæ 1837—1840, fol." This work is beautifully printed, and apparently with great accuracy; and will take the place of Buxtorf's, in which the author remarks he has found more than nine thousand mistakes in the references to the chapters and verses of the Hebrew. It is a Lexicon as well as a concordance, and contains the results of very extensive and careful philological research.

"Concordantiæ Particularium Ebræo-Chaldaicarum, in quibus partium indeclinabilium, quæ occurrunt in fontibus, et hactenus non expositæ sunt in Lexicis aut Concordantiis, natura et sensuum varietas ostenditur, &c. Hafniæ, 1675, fol. 1679, 4to."—This concordance, the work of Christian Noldius, professor of theology at Copenhagen, where he died in 1683, supplied an important desideratum. It contains the particles, or indeclinable words omitted in former concordances. It investigates their various significations; points out the Greek particles which correspond with the Hebrew and Chaldaic ones; and explains the meaning of many passages of Scripture, which depend on the force and connective power of the indeclinable words. The best edition of Noldius is that published at Jena, in 1734, 4to, under the care of Tympius. It contains as an appendix a Lexicon to the Hebrew particles, by John Henry Michaelis, and Christ. Roerber. It is an exceedingly valuable work, and has been of great service to all who have since been employed on the critical examination of the Bible.

II. GREEK CONCORDANCES TO THE SEPTUAGINT.

"Conradi Kircheri Concordantiæ Veteris Testamenti Græcæ Ebreis vocibus respondentes, &c. Francof. 1607, 2 vols. 4to."—The author of this work was a Lutheran minister at Augsburg. It possesses considerable merit; but rather inconsistently for a Greek concordance, follows the order of the Hebrew words, placing the corresponding Greek word after it; in consequence of which it is more useful in consulting the Hebrew than the Greek Scriptures.

"Abrahami Trommii Concordantiæ Græcæ Versionis vulgo dictæ LXX. Interpret., cujus voces secundum ordinem elementorum sermonis Græci digestæ recensentur contra atque in Opere Kircheriano factum fuerat. Amst. 1718, 2 vols. fol."—The author of this learned and most laborious work was minister of Groningen, and published the concordance in the 84th year of his age. He was born in 1633, and died in 1719. It is the most accurate and complete index to the Septuagint that has been, or is ever likely to be published. It follows, as is stated in the title, the order of the Greek words; of which it first gives a Latin translation, and then the Hebrew word or words for which the Greek term is used in the Seventy. Then the different places in which they occur in the Scriptures follow in the order of the several books and chapters; the whole branch of the sentence to which they belong being inserted in the same manner as in Cruden's English Concordance. When the word occurs in any of the ancient Greek translators, Aquila, Symmachus, Theodotian, the places where it is found are referred to at the end of the quotations from the LXX. The words of the Apocrypha are placed at the close of each enumeration. There are two indices at the end of the work, the one Hebrew and Chaldaic; by examining which, the Greek term used in the Seventy for any Hebrew or Chaldaic word is at once seen, with the Latin version, and the place where it is found in the concordance; so that Tromm) serves tolerably well for a Hebrew concordance. The other index contains a Lexicon to the Hexapla of Origen, and comprehends the Greek words in the Fragments of the old Greek translators published by Montfaucon.

"I wish as earnestly," says Michaelis, "that this concordance were in the hands of every theologian, as that Pasor, and other works of that nature, were banished from the schools. By the help of it, we may discover at one view not only the sense and construction of a word in dispute, but likewise the Hebrew expression of which it is a translation, and thus easily determine whether a phrase be a Hebraism or not. It is true the work is incomplete, the Septuagint version of Daniel is totally wanting, being at that time unknown, and several words in the remaining books are omitted; but these omissions are not so numerous as might be expected in so many thousand words."

III. GREEK CONCORDANCES TO THE NEW TESTAMENT.

"Xysti Betuleii Concordantiæ Græcæ Novi Testamenti. Basil, 1546, fol."—This is the first Greek concordance to the New Testament, and is exceedingly rare. The author was a German Lutheran divine, who was born in 1500, and died at Augsburg in 1554. His proper name was Birk.

"Concordantiæ Græco-Latinæ Novi Testamenti ab Henrico Stephano concinnata. Genev. 1594, fol. Ac cum supplemento, 1600, 2da editio, auctior, 1624."—This work was projected, and partly executed by Robert Stephens, and completed and published by his son Henry. It is, however, so inaccurate, that Schmidt, the compiler of the next concordance, could scarcely admit that it was the work of the Stephenses.

"Erasmii Schmidii Novi Testamenti Jesu Christi Græci, hoc est, originalis Linguae, rariotus, &c. Vitemb. 1638, fol."—This is a much more correct and valuable work than that of the Stephenses. The author was a Lutheran divine, and professor of the Greek language in the university of Wittemberg, where he died in 1637. Another edition of this concordance, revised and corrected, was published at Gotha, in 1717, with a preface by E. S. Cyprian. Of this edition, a very beautiful reprint, in 2 vols. 8vo. issued from the Glasgow university press in 1819; and an Abridgment of it was published by Bagster, 1830, 32mo. edited by Mr. Greenfield.

"Lexicon Anglo-Græco-Latinum Novi Testamenti, &c.; or an alphabetical Concordance of all the Greek Words contained in the New Testament, both English, Greek, and Latin, &c. By Andrew Symson. Lond. 1658, fol."—This work partakes more of the nature of a lexicon than of a concordance. According to the author's account, "By it any word may be rendered into Greek and Latin, English and Latin, and Greek and English." Parkhurst says, "it is a performance, which whilst it exhibits the prodigious labour of its author, can give one no very high opinion of his genius or skill in the art of instruction. If, indeed, the method and ingenuity of this writer had been proportionable to his industry, one might, I think, almost affirm, that he would have rendered all future Greek and English lexicons to the New Testament in a great measure superfluous; but by injudiciously making the English translation the basis of his work, and by separating the etymological part of the Greek from the explanatory, he has rendered his book in a manner useless to the young scholar, and in truth hardly manageable by any but a person of uncommon application."

"A Concordance to the Greek Testament, with the English Version to each Word, the principal Hebrew roots corresponding to the Greek Words of the Septuagint, with short critical Notes and an Index. By John Williams, LL.D. Lond. 1767, 4to."—This is a very useful and convenient work; it is much more portable than the larger concordances, and is sufficient for all common purposes, as it is in general very accurate.

IV. CONCORDANCES TO THE LATIN VULGATE.

The compiler of the first concordance to the Bible in any language was Hugo de St. Caro, or Cardinal Hugo, a Dominican, who died about 1362. He had engaged in writing a commentary on the Scriptures, and in order to facilitate this work, projected a concordance, in which he is said to have employed nearly five hundred of his brethren. From this work have been derived all the concordances to the Scriptures in the original languages. It was improved by Conrad of Halberstadt, who flourished about 1290, and by John of Segovia in the following century. The first printed concordance to the Vulgate appeared under the following title :

"Concordantiæ Bibliorum et Canonum. Bononiæ, Hugonis de Colonia, 1479, folio."

After the revision of the Latin Vulgate by Sixtus V. a concordance to it appeared, entitled :—

"Concordantiæ Sacr. Bibliorum Vulgatæ editionis, Hugone Cardinali auctore, &c. Opera et studio Francisci Lucæ Brugensis. Antverpiæ, 1617. Genève, 1625. Parisiis, 1683."—The greater number of the concordances to the Latin Vulgate are reprints of this edition. The best is that printed at Avignon, in 1786, in 2 vols. fol.

V. CONCORDANCES TO THE ENGLISH BIBLE.

"The Concordance of the New Testament most necessary to be had in the hands of all soche as desire the communication of any place contained in the New Testament. Imprinted by Mr. Thomas Gybson. Cum privilegio regali."—This is the first concordance to any part of the English Scriptures. It has no date, but must have been published before 1540. It is probable from the epistle to the reader, that it was the work of John Day, assisted by Gybson the printer.

"A Concordance, that is to saie, a worke, wherein by the order of the letters of the A, B, C, ye maie redely finde any worde conteigned in the whole Bible, so often as it is there expressed or mentioned. By Jhon Marbeck. Lond. 1550, fol."—This is the first English concordance to the entire Bible. The account which the author gives of his undertaking, when summoned before the Bishops and condemned by them, is very interesting. "When Thomas Mathews' Bible came first out in print, I was much desirous to have one of them; and being a poor man, not able to buy one of them, determined with myself to borrow one amongst my friends, and to write it forth. And when I had written out the five books of Moses in fair great paper, and entering into the book of Joshua, my friend, Master Turner, chanced to steal upon me unawares, and seeing me writing out the Bible, asked me what I meant thereby? And when I had told him the cause: Tush! quoth he, thou goest about a vain and tedious labour. But this were a profitable work for thee, to set out a concordance in English. A concordance, said I, what is that? Then he told me it was a book to find out any word in the whole Bible by the letter, and that there was such a one in Latin already. Then I told him I had no learning to go about such a thing, Enough, quoth he, for that matter. for it requireth not so much learning as diligence. And seeing thou art so painful a man, and one that cannot be unoccupied, it were a good exercise for thee." He accordingly borrowed a Latin concordance, and had gone through the letter L, when his papers were seized. When he was set at liberty, as his papers were not restored to him, he had his concordance to begin again, which, when completed, he showed to a friend, who promised to assist him in having it presented to the king, in order to have it published by his authority; but Henry VIII. died before that could be brought about. His friend, however, to whom he could not say nay, requested a copy of it, which he accordingly transcribed for him. When Edward VI. was settled on the throne, he renewed his thoughts of publishing his work, and consulted Grafton, the printer, concerning it; "who," says he, in his introduction, "seeing the volume so houghe and great, saied the charges of imprinting thereof would not only be importunate, but the bokes when finished would bear so excessive a price, as few should be able to attain unto them. Wherefore, by his advice, I yet once again anewe writte out the same in such sort, as the work now appereth." (Townley's Bib. Lit. vol. iii. p. 118.) The diligence and labours of such a man deserve to be recorded. The work is necessarily imperfect, and refers to the chapters only, not to verses. Subsequently to this, a number of concordances, or indices to the Bible, were published under various titles, and possessing different degrees of merit. The chief of these are the following :

"Knight's Concordance Axiomaticall. Lond. 1610, fol.—Clement Cotton's Concordance. Ibid. 1618, fol.—Newman's Large and Complete Concordance. Ibid. 1643, fol.—Bernard's Thesaurus Biblicus. Ibid. 1644, fol.—Robert Wickens's Concordance, complete and perfect, with a dedication to Dr. Owen. Ibid. 1655, 8vo.—Powell's New and Useful Concordance. Ibid. 1671, 8vo.—The Cambridge Concordance. Camb. 1689, fol.—And Butterworth's Concordance, which followed in 1767, 8vo.—All these are superseded by the correct and invaluable work of Alexander Cruden, entitled, "A complete Concordance to the Holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testament." 1737, 4to. The author published three editions during his own life, and several have been published since his death. The London edition of 1810 is the most correct. The work is uncommonly complete, the definitions of leading words remarkably accurate, and the references exceedingly correct. The work is in the hands of every student, and requires no recommendation from us. An edition in royal 8vo, very beautifully printed, has lately been issued by the Religious Tract Society.—A new Concordance, on an improved plan, has been published by the Rev. D. King of Glasgow.

"A Concordance of Parallels collected from Bibles and Commentaries, which have been published in Hebrew, Latin, French, Spanish, and other Languages, with the Authorities of each. By the Rev. C. Crutwell. Lond. 1790, 4to."—This is a work of immense labour, and for occasional consultation may be useful; but the references are often so numerous under a single verse, that it is scarcely possible to examine them all, or to perceive the design of each. The margin of Scott's Bible is in general far preferable.

CONCORDATE, a convention between the Pope of Rome, as the head of the Catholic church, and any secular government, for the settling of ecclesiastical relations. Treaties which the pope, as a secular sovereign, concludes with other princes respecting political concerns, are not called concordates. One of the most important of the earlier concordates is that of Worms, called also the Calixtine concordate, made in 1122, between Calixtus II. and Henry V., in order to put an end to the long contest on the subject of investiture; and which has since been considered a fundamental ordinance in respect to the relations between the Catholic church and the government in Germany. Most of the concordates have been extorted from the popes by the different civil powers. This was done as early as the fifteenth century; for when the council of Constance urged a reformation of the papal court, Martin V. saw himself obliged, in 1418, to conclude concordates with the Germans, and soon afterwards, also, with other nations. The popes, however, succeeded, even in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, in concluding concordates for their own advantage. This was the case with those of Ashaffenburg. That also which was made by Leo X. and Francis I. of France (1516), was chiefly to the advantage of the pope. In later times, particularly towards the end of the eighteenth century, the papal court could no longer maintain a successful struggle with the spirit of the times, and with the secular powers, and was obliged to resign many privileges by concordates. Buonaparte, when first consul of the French Republic, concluded a concordate with Pope Pius VII. July 15, 1801, which went into operation in April, 1802. It re-established the Catholic church in France, and has become the basis of the present ecclesiastical constitution of that country. The government obtained by it the right of appointing the clergy; the public treasury gained by the diminution of the large number of metropolitan and episcopal sees to sixty; the pope was obliged to give up the plan of restoring the spiritual orders, and the influence which he exercised by means of delegates, but retained the right of the canonical investiture of bishops, and the revenues connected with this right. The interests of the papal religion suffered by this compact, inasmuch as most of the dioceses became now too large to be properly administered; and the lower clergy, the very soul of the church, who were in a poor condition before, were made entirely dependent on the government. Louis XVIII. concluded at Rome, with Pius VII. (July 11, 1817,) a new concordate, by which that of 1516, so injurious to the liberties of the Gallican church, was again revived; the concordate of 1801, and the articles organiques of 1802, were abolished; the nation subjected to an enormous tax by the demand of endowments for forty-two new metropolitan and episcopal sees, with their chapters and seminaries; and free scope afforded to the intolerance of the Roman court by the indefinite language of article 10, which speaks of measures against the prevailing obstacles to religion and the laws of the church. This revival of old abuses, this provision for the luxury of numerous clerical dignitaries at the expense of the nation, could please only the ultra-royal nobility, who saw in it the means of providing their sons with benefices. The nation received the concordate with almost universal disapprobation; voices of the greatest weight were raised against it, and the new ministers saw themselves obliged to withdraw their proposition. The pope was more fortunate in the concordate made with Naples (Feb. 16, 1818) at Terracina, in which stipulations were made for the exclusive establishment of Catholicism in that kingdom; for the independence of the theological seminaries on the secular power; the free disposal of benefices to the value of 12,000 ducats, in Naples, in favour of Roman subjects; the reversion of ancient places to the church; unlimited liberty of appeal to the papal chair; the abolition of the royal permission, formerly necessary for the pastoral letters of the bishops; the right of censorship over books; besides many other highly important privileges. The king obtained the right to appoint bishops, to tax the clergy, to reduce the number of episcopal sees and monasteries which existed before the time of Murat. The quiet possession of the estates of the church, which had been alienated, was also secured to the proprietors. In the concordate concluded with Bavaria, July 5, 1817, two archbishoprics were established for the 2,400,000 Catholics in Bavaria. Seminaries, moreover, were instituted and provided with lands; the nominations were left to the king, with the reservation of the papal right of confirmation; the limits of the civil and ecclesiastical jurisdiction were precisely settled, and the erection of new monasteries was promised. This concordate was published in May, 1818, together with the new political constitution, by which all apprehensions for the Protestant church in Bavaria were allayed. The other German princes have also formed a plan for a common concordate with the pope.

CONCUBINAGE, the act of living with a woman to whom the man is not legally married. It is also used for a marriage with a woman of inferior condition, (performed with less solemnity than the formal marriage,) and to whom the husband does not convey his rank. As polygamy was sometimes practised by the patriarchs, it was a common thing to see one, two, or many wives in a family; and besides these, several concubines. 2 Sam. iii. 3, &c. 1 Kings xi. 3. 2 Chron. xi. 21. But ever since the abrogation of polygamy by Jesus Christ, and the reduction of marriage to its primitive institution, concubinage has been forbidden and condemned among Christians.

CONDESCENSION is that species of benevolence which designedly waves the supposed advantages of birth, title, or station, in order to accommodate ourselves to the state of an inferior, and diminish that restraint which the apparent distance is calculated to produce in him. It is enjoined on the Christian, and is peculiarly ornamental to the Christian character. Rom. xii. 16. The condescension of God appears every way great, when we consider his infinite perfection, his absolute independence of his creatures, his purposes of mercy toward them, and his continual care over them.

CONDITION, the term of a bargain to be performed. It has been debated whether faith should be called the condition of our salvation. If by it we mean a valuable equivalent for the benefit received, or something to be performed in our own strength, or that will be meritorious, it is certainly inapplicable; but if by it be meant, that it is only a means without which we cannot be saved, in that sense it is not improper. Yet as the term is often made use of improperly by those who are mere legalists, perhaps it would be as well to decline the use of it.

CONFERENCE, the act of discoursing with another, in order to treat upon some subject or to settle some point of dispute. Conference meetings, in a religious sense, are meetings assembled for the purpose of relating experience, discoursing on some religious subject, or for transacting religious business. "Religious conference," says a divine, "is one way of teaching religion. We all have leisure time, and it is well spent when it is employed in set conferences on religion. There the doubting man may open all his suspicions, and confirmed Christians will strengthen his belief; there the fearful may learn to be valiant for the truth; there the liberal may learn to devise liberal things; there the tongue of the stammerer may learn to speak plainly; there Paul may withstand Peter to the face, because he deserves to be blamed; there the Gospel may be communicated severally to them of reputation; there, in one word, ye may all prophesy one by one, that all may learn, and all may be comforted. One hour in a week spent thus, will contribute much to our edification, provided we abstain from the disorders that have often disgraced, and sometimes destroyed, this excellent Christian practice. Time should be kept, order should be preserved, no idle questions should be asked, freedom of inquiry should be nourished; immodest forwardness should be restrained; practical, experimental, and substantial subjects should be examined; charity, with all its gentle train, should be there, for she openeth her mouth with wisdom, and in her tongue is the law of kindness." See EXPERIENCE MEETINGS.

CONFERENCE, HAMPTON COURT, a meeting of the Puritans and their opponents, appointed by James I. to be held at that place in January, 1604. Archbishop Whitgift, eight bishops, and eight or ten other learned dignitaries, were appointed to defend the cause of Conformity, while only Reynolds, Chatterton, and Knewstubbs, were allowed to maintain that of the Puritans. James himself was moderator, and his courtiers were the witnesses. Reynolds, who was the principal speaker on the side of the nonconformists, insisted that certain alterations should be made in the Thirty-nine Articles; that confirmation should be considered, plurality of benefices disallowed, and preaching ministers everywhere settled; that the reading of the Apocrypha in public worship, the baptismal interrogation of infants, the sign of the cross in baptism, the sacerdotal vestments, the symbolical ring in marriage, and the churching of women, should be abolished, because they were relics of popery. Bancroft stood forth as the champion of the other party; and the king himself, having no relish for puritanical notions, and proud of his theological abilities, poured forth his royal dicta, and threatened the Puritans with excommunication, if they did not conform.

CONFERENCE, METHODIST. See METHODIST.

CONFESSION, the verbal acknowledgment which a Christian makes of his sins. Among the Jews, it was the custom, on the annual feast of expiation, for the high priest to make confession of sins to God, in the name of the whole people; besides this general confession, the Jews were enjoined, if their sins were a breach of the first table of the law, to make confession of them to God; but violations of the second table were to be acknowledged to their brethren. Among the modern Jews, some of them scourge themselves at the confession in the following manner: two of them perform the ceremony by turns on each other, the patient lying along upon the ground, with his face towards the north; he must not lie east and west, because that is the position of the residence of God. The penitent receives thirty-nine strokes with a bull's penis, during which he smites his breast; while the operator repeats the 38th verse of the 78th Psalm, giving a stroke at every word he pronounces. The words of the verse, which are exactly thirteen in number in the Hebrew text, repeated three times, make the number of strokes thirty-nine. The penitent then rises, and pays him who has disciplined him in the same coin.

Confession, according to Dr. Watts, is the third part of prayer, and includes, 1. A confession of the meanness of our original, our distance from God, our subjection to him, and constant dependence on him. 2. A confession of our sins, both original and actual, in thought, life, omission, and commission. 3. A confession of our desert of punishment, and our unworthiness of mercy. 4. A confession or humble representation of our wants and sorrows of every kind.

Confession also may be considered as a relative duty, or the acknowledgment of any offence we have been guilty of against a fellow-creature.

CONFESSION, AURICULAR, in the Romish and Greek Churches, is the disclosure of sins to the priest at the confessional, with a view to obtain absolution from them. The father confessor inquires of the person confessing concerning the circumstances of the sins confessed, and proportions his admonition, and the severity of the penitence which he enjoins, to the degree of the transgression. The person confessing is allowed to conceal no sin of consequence which he remembers to have committed; and the father confessor is bound to perpetual secrecy. The absolution granted has, according to the doctrines of the Catholic and Greek Churches, sacramental efficacy. It was Pope Leo the Great, in 450, who altered the public confession, or profession of repentance, by such as had been guilty of scandalous sins, into a secret one before the priest. The fourth Lateran council (can. 21) ordains, "That every one of the faithful, of both sexes, on coming to years of discretion, shall, in private, faithfully confess all their sins, at least once a year, to their own pastor; and fulfil, to the best of their power, the penance enjoined them; receiving reverently, at least at Easter, the sacrament of the Eucharist, unless, by the advice of their pastor, for some reasonable cause it be judged proper to abstain for a time; otherwise, they are to be excluded from the church while living, and when they die, to be deprived of Christian burial."

Confession obtains, also, in the Lutheran Church, only with this difference, that while the Catholic Church requires from the penitent the avowal of his particular and single crimes, the Lutheran requires only a general acknowledgment, leaving it, however, at the option of its members to reveal their particular sins to the confessor, and to relieve the conscience by such an avowal; for which reason, Protestant clergymen, as well as the Catholic priests, are bound to keep, under the seal of secrecy, whatever may be intrusted to them in the confessional. The history both of nations and individuals, exhibits fearful examples of the abuse of confidence thus reposed in priests. In political affairs, especially, it has been made the means of effecting the basest intrigues, to the ruin of states, and the disgrace of religion.

CONFESSION OF FAITH, a list of the several articles of the belief of any church. There is some difference between creeds and confessions. Creeds, in their commencement, were simply expressions of faith in a few of the leading and undisputed doctrines of the gospel. Confessions were, on the contrary, the result of many a hazardous and laborious effort, at the dawn of reviving literature, to recover these doctrines, and to separate them from the enormous mass of erroneous and corrupted tenets, which the negligence or ignorance of some, and the artifices of avarice and ambition in others, had conduced to accumulate for a space of a thousand years, under an implicit obedience to the arrogant pretensions of an absolute and infallible authority in the Church of Rome. Objections have been formed against all creeds or confessions of faith, on the ground that they infringe Christian liberty, supersede the Scriptures, exclude such as ought not to be excluded, and admit such as ought not to be admitted; are often too particular and long; are liable to be abused; tempt men to hypocrisy; preclude improvement; and have been employed as means of persecution. On the other hand, the advocates for them observe, that all the arts and sciences have been reduced to a system; and why should not the truths of religion, which are of greater importance? That a compendious view of the chief and most necessary points of the Christian religion, which lie scattered up and down in the Scripture, must be useful to inform the mind, as well as to hold forth to the world what are in general the sentiments of such a particular church or churches; they tend to discover the common friends of the same faith to one another, and to unite them; that the Scriptures seem to authorize and countenance them; such as the moral law, the Lord's Prayer, the form of doctrine mentioned by Paul, Rom. vi. 17; and again "the form of sound words," in 2 Tim. i. 13, &c; that their becoming the occasion of hypocrisy, is no fault of the articles, but of those who subscribe them; that persecution has been raised more by the turbulent tempers of men, than from the nature of confessions. Some think that all articles and confessions of faith should be expressed in the bare words of Scripture; but it is replied, that this would destroy all exposition and interpretation of Scripture; that it would have a tendency to make the ministry of the word useless; in a great measure cramp all religious conversation; and that the sentiments of one man could not be distinguished from another in some points of importance. The following are the confessions of the different churches.

1. That of the Greek Church, entitled "The Confessions of the True and Genuine Faith," which was presented to Mohammed II., in 1453, but which gave place to the "Orthodox Confession of the Catholic and Apostolic Greek Church, composed by Mogila, metropolitan of Kiev, in Russia, and approved in 1643, with great solemnity, by the Patriarchs of Constantinople, Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem. It contains the standard of the principles of the Russian Greek Church.

2. The Church of Rome, though she has always received the Apostles', Nicene, and Athanasian Creeds, had no fixed public and authoritative symbol, till the Council of Trent. A summary of the doctrines contained in the canons of that council is given in the creed published by Pius IV. (1564), in the form of a bull. It is introduced by the Nicene Creed, to which it adds twelve articles, comprising those doctrines which the Church of Rome finally adopted after her controversies with the Reformers.

3. The Lutherans call their standard books of faith and discipline, "Libri Symbolici Ecclesiæ Evangelicæ." They contain the three creeds above mentioned, the Augsburg confession, the Apology for that confession by Melancthon, the Articles of Smalcald, drawn up by Luther, the Catechisms of Luther, and, in many churches, the form of Concord, or Book of Torgau. The best edition is that by Titmann, Leipzig, 1817. The Saxon (composed by Melancthon,) Wurtemberg, Suabian. Pomeranian, Mansfeldtian, and Copenhagen confessions, agree in general with the symbolical books of the Lutherans, but are of authority only in the countries from which they are respectively called.

4. The Confessions of the Calvinistic churches are numerous. The following are the principal. (1.) The Helvetic confessions are three—that of Basle, 1530; the Summary and Confession of the Helvetic Churches, 1536; and the Expositio Simplex, &c., 1566, ascribed to Bullinger. (2.) The Tetrapolitan Confession, 1531, which derives its name from the four cities of Strasburg, Constance, Memmingen, and Lindau, by the deputies of which it was signed, is attributed to Bucer. (3.) The Palatine or Heidelberg Confession, framed by order of the Elector Palatine, John Casimir, 1575. (4.) The confession of the Gallic Churches, accepted at the first synod of the reformed, held at Paris, 1559. (5.) The Confession of the Reformed Churches in Belgium, drawn up in 1559, and approved in 1561. (6.) The Confession of Faith of the Kirk of Scotland, which was that composed by the Assembly at Westminster, was received as the standard of the national faith, in 1688.

(7.) The Savoy Confession, a declaration of the faith and order of the independents, agreed upon at a meeting of their elders and messengers at their meeting in the Savoy, 1658.

(8.) The Anglican Confession, or Thirty-nine Articles of the Church of England, agreed on in the convocation held in London, 1552. They were drawn up in Latin; but in 1571, they were revised and subscribed both in Latin and English. They were adopted by the Episcopal Church, in North America, in 1801, with some alterations, and the rejection of the Athanasian Creed.

CONFESSORIAL, a cell in which the confessor sits to hear confessions. It is erected in a church or chapel, and built of joinery, with a boarded back against the wall, or against a pillar or pier, divided into three niches, or small cells. The centre, which is for the reception of the priest, is closed half way up by a dwarf door, and has a seat within it. There is a small grated aperture in each of the partitions between the priest and the side cells, which are for those who come to confess, and have no doors. The numerous confessionals in St. Peter's at Rome, each with an inscription, setting forth in what language penitents may confess within, show to what an awful extent this traffic in the souls of men is carried on.

CONFESSOR, a Christian who has made a solemn and resolute profession of the faith, and has endured torments in its defence. A mere saint is called a confessor, to distinguish him from the roll of dignified saints, such as apostles, martyrs, &c. In ecclesiastical history, the word confessor is sometimes used for martyr; in after times it was confined to those who, after having been tormented by the tyrants, were permitted to live and die in peace; and at last it was also used for those who, after having lived a good life, died under an opinion of sanctity. According to St. Cyprian, he who presented himself to torture, or even to martyrdom, without being called to it, was not called a confessor, but a professor; and if any out of want of courage abandoned his country, and became a voluntary exile for the sake of the faith, he was called ex terra.

Confessor is also a priest in the Romish Church, who has a power to hear sinners in the sacrament of penance, and to give them absolution. The confessors of the kings of France, from the time of Henry IV., have been constantly Jesuits; before him, the Dominicans and Cordeliers shared the office between them. The confessors of the house of Austria have also ordinarily been Dominicans and Cordeliers, but the later emperors have all taken Jesuits.

CONFIRMATION, the act of establishing any thing or person.—1. Divine confirmation is a work of the Spirit of God, strengthening, comforting, and establishing believers in faith and obedience. 1 Pet. v. 10. 1 Cor. i. 8.—2. Ecclesiastical confirmation is a rite whereby a person, arrived to years of discretion, undertakes the performance of every part of the baptismal vow made for him by his godfathers and godmothers. It is administered only by bishops, and consists in the imposition of hands on the head of the person confirmed.

In the ancient church it was done immediately after baptism, if the bishop happened to be present at the solemnity. Throughout the East it still accompanies baptism; but the Romanists make it a distinct independent sacrament. Seven years is the stated time for confirmation; however, it frequently takes place after that age. The person to be confirmed has a godfather and godmother appointed him as in baptism. In the Church of England, the age of the persons to be confirmed is not fixed. Clarke's Essay on Confirmation; Wood on ditto; Howe's Episcopacy, p. 167, 174.

CONFLAGRATION, GENERAL, a term used to denote that grand period or catastrophe of our world, when the face of nature is to be changed by fire, as formerly it was by water.

1. Scripture assures us in general, that this earth in its present form will not be perpetual, but shall come to an end.—2. It further tells us, that this dissolution of the world shall be by a general conflagration, in which all things upon the face of the earth shall be destroyed, by which the atmosphere shall also be sensibly affected, as in such a case it necessarily must be, (2 Pet. iii. 5, 7, 10, 12,) where, from the connexion of the words, the opposition between the conflagration and the deluge, as well as the most literal and apparent import of the phrases themselves, it is plain they cannot, as Dr. Hammond strangely supposes, refer to the desolation brought on Judea when destroyed by the Romans, but must refer to the dissolution of the whole earth.—3. The Scripture represents this great burning as a circumstance nearly connected with the day of judgment. 2 Pet. iii. 7, compared with 2 Thess. i. 7, 8. Heb. x. 27. 1 Cor. iii. 12, 13; and it is probable there may be an allusion to this in several passages of the Old Testament, such as Psal. xl. 6; 1. 3; xcvi. 3. Isa. xxxiv. 4, 8, 10; lxvi. 15. Dan. vii. 9, 10. Mal. iv. 1. Zeph. iii. 8. Deut. xxxii. 22, to which many parallel expressions might be added, from the canonical and apocryphal books.—4. It is not expressly declared how this burning shall be kindled, nor how it shall end; which has given occasion to various conjectures about it, which see below.

The ancient Pythagoreans, Platonists, Epicureans, and Stoics, appear to have had a notion of the conflagration; though whence they should derive it, unless from the sacred books, is difficult to conceive; except, perhaps, from the Phenicians, who themselves had it from the Jews. Mention of the conflagration is made in the books of the Sibyls, Sophocles, Hystaspes, Ovid, Lucan, &c. Dr. Burnet, after J. Tachard and others, relates that the Siamese believe that the earth will at last be parched up with heat, the mountains melted down, the earth's whole surface reduced to a level, and then consumed with fire. And the Bramins of Siam do not only hold that the world shall be destroyed by fire, but also that a new earth shall be made out of the cinders of the old.

Divines ordinarily account for the conflagration metaphysically, and will have it take its rise from a miracle, as a fire from heaven. Philosophers contend for its being produced from natural causes, and will have it effected according to the laws of mechanics. Some think an eruption of the central fire sufficient for the purpose; and add, that this may be occasioned several ways, viz., either by having its intensity increased, which again may be effected either by being driven into less space by the encroachments of the superficial cold, or by an increase of the inflammability of the fuel whereon it is fed; or by having the resistance of the imprisoning earth weakened, which may happen either from the diminution of its matter, by the consumption of its central parts, or by weakening the cohesion of the constituent parts of the mass by the excess of the defect of moisture. Others look for the cause of the conflagration in the atmosphere, and suppose that some of the meteors there engendered in unusual quantities, and exploded with unusual vehemence, from the concurrence of various circumstances, may effect it without seeking any farther. Lastly, others have recourse to a still more effectual and flaming machine, and conclude the world is to undergo its conflagration from the near approach of a comet in its return from the sun.

Various opinions also are entertained as to the renovation of the earth after the conflagration.—1. Some suppose that the earth will not be entirely consumed, but that the matter of which it consists will be fixed, purified, and refined, which they say will be the natural consequence of the action of fire upon it; though it is hard to say what such a purification can do towards fitting it for its intended purpose, for it is certain a mass of crystal or glass would very ill answer the following parts of this hypothesis.—2. They suppose that from these materials thus refined, as from a second chaos, there will, by the power of God, arise a new creation; and then the face of the earth, and likewise the atmosphere, will be so restored as to resemble what it originally was in the paradisaical state; and consequently to render it a more desirable abode for human creatures than it at present is; and they urge for this purpose the following texts, viz., 2 Pet. iii. 13. (Compare Isa. lxxv. 17; lxxvi. 22.) Matt. xix. 28, 29. (Compare Mark x. 29, 30. Luke xviii. 29, 30.) Psal. cii. 25, 26. Acts iii. 21. 1 Cor. vii. 31. Rom. viii. 21; most of which, however, are totally irrelevant to the subject.—3. They agree in supposing that in this new state of things there will be no sea, Rev. xxi. 1.—4. They suppose that the earth, thus beautified and improved, will be inhabited by those who shall inherit the first resurrection, and shall here enjoy a very considerable degree of happiness, though not equal to that which is to succeed the general judgment; which judgment shall, according to them, open when those thousand years are expired, mentioned in Rev. xx. 4, &c.; 1 Thess. iv. 7, &c.; compare ver. 15, which passage is thought by some to contain an insinuation that Paul expected to be alive at the appearance of Christ, which must imply an expectation of being thus raised from the dead before it; but it is answered that the expression, we that are alive, may only signify, “those of us that are so,” speaking of all Christians as one body. 1 Cor. xv. 49—52. Dr. Hartley declared it as his opinion, that the millennium will consist of 1000 prophetic years, where each day is a year, i. e. 360,000; pleading that this is the language used in other parts of the Revelation. But it seems an invincible objection against this hypothesis, which places the millennium after the conflagration, that the saints inhabiting the earth after the first resurrection are represented as distressed by the invasion of some wicked enemies. Rev. xx. 7—9. Ezekiel xxxviii., xxxix. See MILLENNIUM.

After all, little can be said with certainty as to this subject. It is probable that the earth will survive its fiery trial, and become the everlasting abode of righteousness, as part of the holy empire of God; but, seeing the language used in Scripture, and especially in the book of Revelation, is often to be considered as figurative rather than literal, it becomes us to be cautious in our conclusions. Burnet's Theory of the Earth; Whitby on the Millennium; Hartley on Man, vol. ii. p. 400; Fleming on the First Resurrection; Ray's Three Discourses; Whiston's Theory of the Earth; and article DISSOLUTION in this work.

CONFUSION OF TONGUES, a memorable event which happened in the one hundred and first year, according to the Hebrew chronology, and the four hundred and first year by the Samaritan, after the flood, at the overthrow of Babel. Gen. xi. Until this period there had been but one common language, which formed a bond of union that prevented the separation of mankind into distinct nations. Writers have differed much as to the nature of this confusion, and the manner in which it was effected. Some think that no new languages were formed; but that this event was accomplished by creating a misunderstanding and variance among the builders, without any immediate influence on their language; and that a distinction is to be made between confounding a language and forming new ones. Others account for this event by the privation of all language, and by supposing that mankind were under a necessity of associating together, and of imposing new names on things by common consent. Some, again, ascribe the confusion to such an indistinct remembrance of the original language which they spoke before, as made them speak it very differently; but the most common opinion is, that God caused the builders actually to forget their former language, and each family to speak a new language, whence originated the various languages at present in the world. It is, however, but of little consequence to know precisely how this was effected, as the Scriptures are silent as to the manner of it; and after all that can be said, it is but conjecture still. There are some truths, however, we may learn from this part of sacred writ.—1. It teaches us God's sovereignty and power, by which he can easily blast the greatest attempts of men to aggrandise themselves. Gen. xi. 7, 8.—2. God's justice in punishing those who, in idolizing their own fame, forget him to whom praise is due, ver. 4.—3. God's wisdom in overruling evil for good: for by this confusion he facilitated the dispersion of mankind, in order to execute his own purposes, ver. 8, 9. Sac.*, l. iii. c. v. § 2—4; Shuckford's Con., vol. i. p. 124—140; Vitrinaga's Obs., vol. i. diss. l. c. ix.; Le Clerc's Diss., No. vi.; Hutchinson on the Confusion of Tongues; Bishop Law's Theory of Religion, p. 66.

CONGREGATION, an assembly of people met together for religious worship. The term has been also used for assemblies of cardinals appointed by the pope for the discharge of certain functions, after the manner of our offices and courts; such as the congregation of the inquisition, the congregation of rites, of alma, &c. It also signifies a company or society of religious persons cantoned out of this or that order, and making an inferior order, &c. Such are the congregations of the Oratory; those of Cluny, &c. among the Benedictines.

CONGREGATIONALISTS, those who maintain the independence of each congregation or society of Christians, as to the right of electing pastors and other church officers, and determining the different affairs of discipline, &c. in which it may be concerned. See CHURCH.

Though the principles on which they act may be more or less faintly recognized in those bodies which, during the successive ages of church history, have separated from the corrupt church, and endeavoured to approximate to the apostolic model of ecclesiastical discipline, it was not till the end of the sixteenth century that they began to constitute a more tangible and established section of the Christian world. In the year 1580, Robert Brown, who was descended from an ancient and honourable family in Rutlandshire, began zealously to propagate the principles of apostolic independency, in the city of Norwich; but being persecuted, and an opening presenting itself of removing to Holland, he went to that country, where, in the town of Middleburgh, in Zealand, he formed the first congregational church. In the mean time his principles were rapidly diffused at home, and many persons of rank were not ashamed to avow them. Other churches were formed in Holland, over one of which presided the celebrated Hebraist, Henry Ainsworth, who, in conjunction with a Mr. Johnson, published a confession of faith of the people called Brownists. In 1592, the Independents in London and its vicinity, formed themselves into a church; but being hunted by the spies of the high commission, they were obliged frequently to change their place of meeting, and were at last discovered worshipping at the village of Islington, whence they were carried to prison, where many of them died in consequence of the cruelties they endured, and two of them, Barrow and Greenwood, were hanged at Tyburn.

Shortly after the cause of congregationalism was revived in Holland, by Mr. John Robinson, who appears to have entertained stricter views of the principles of Independency than most of his brethren, on which account the name of Independents has been more particularly given to him and his followers. Having numerous difficulties to contend with, the members of the church which he had formed at Leyden, resolved, after fasting, prayer, and much consultation, that the junior part should remove to America, a resolution which was carried into effect; and the young colony, settling at Plymouth in New England, formed the nucleus of Congregationalism in that part of the world. In England the Independents were still persecuted, while in Holland they were allowed to assemble in the Dutch churches, after the hours of the national worship, and even to use the bells to summon the congregation together. At length, however, their numbers so increased, that it was found necessary to relax in the severity with which they had been treated, and they might have enjoyed the repose which they desired, had it not been for the Presbyterians, who laboured hard to establish their own mode of discipline, and were determined to crush the Independents, whose principles of church government, as well as their views of religious liberty, they held in utter abhorrence. During the Commonwealth, however, they obtained a firmer footing. Some of their principal divines were nominated by the Protector to be his chaplains, as well as to fill the most important places at the universities. Dr. John Owen, Dr. Thomas Goodwin, Gale, Home, Charnock, Bridge, Nye, Caryl, and Greenhill, were among their chief men. The Act of Uniformity, which compelled so many pious ministers to resign their livings, occasioned a more extensive inquiry into the principles of church order, warranted by the New Testament; and vast numbers of them, though primarily ejected, formed such views of the Established Church that they could not have gone back into her communion, even if she had been willing to receive them on terms of very extensive comprehension.

At the time of the revolution the Presbyterians were still considerably more numerous in England than the Congregationalists; but the latter body continued gradually to increase in numbers and efficiency, till, at last, the scale was completely turned in their favour, by the blighting and desolating influence of Arianism on the Presbyterian congregations. Not a few of these congregations, on the demise or removal of Arian ministers, chose Independent pastors, and adopted the Congregational discipline. About the middle of last century, this body appears to have felt the influence of that universal indifference for religion which prevailed in the nation; but it was only partial in its operation, and limited as to its continuance. In consequence of the revival occasioned by the zealous labours of Mr. Whitefield, numbers were gathered into the Congregational churches, where they enjoyed that regularity and consecutiveness in the ministration of the word which a constant change of preachers could not possibly supply. Since then the body has been further greatly increased by the establishment of Sunday-schools, village preaching, and various other means which have been employed for the instruction and salvation of the unconverted. At present the number of Congregational churches in England amounts to nearly thirteen hundred. Many of their chapels, especially in the metropolis and other large towns, are elegant specimens of modern architecture, containing from 1500 to 2500 hearers; and to some of them spacious school-rooms are attached, in which from 300 to 600 children receive Sunday instruction. From this body, though it cannot boast of the "noble" and "mighty" in the land, a very considerable proportion of those sums are raised which flow into the treasuries of the Bible, Tract, and other benevolent societies. Indeed, the London Missionary Society is almost exclusively supported by its members, and by contributions from Scotland and Ireland.

2. Though the visit of Cromwell's army to Scotland produced effects in that country favourable to Independency, it does not appear that its principles were acted upon till the time of John Glass, (1725,) who has been honoured with the appellation of the father of the Scotch Independents. In conjunction with Robert Sandeman, who joined him some time after he was expelled from the church of Scotland, he founded churches in various parts of the country, and a number of respectable persons from various places joined them. The system, however, as adopted by these men and their followers, was of too exclusive and repulsive a character to become popular; and, in consequence, their churches have never made great progress, and in the present day are on the decline. Another connexion of Independent churches was formed during the same century, originated by the Rev. Henry Davidson, of Galashiels; Mr. Smith, of Newburn; and Mr. David Dale, and differing but little from the Glasgites, except in seriousness and liberality of spirit.

The modern Scotch congregationalists sprang up about the beginning of the present century, in consequence of the efforts made to diffuse the Gospel throughout the country, by Robert Haldane, Esq., who, on being foiled in his attempt to proceed to India, where he had proposed to devote the whole of his property for the establishment and maintenance of a Christian mission, had his attention turned to the ignorance which prevailed in many parts of Scotland, and the deadness which awfully characterised the state of religion at the time. Having been joined by Messrs. Ewing and Innes, both ministers of the established church, and by his brother, James Alexander Haldane, and Mr. Aikman, who had studied for the ministry, but could not conscientiously join the Presbyterian Church, that gentleman opened the Circus in Edinburgh, and afterwards erected the Tabernacle near the same spot, capable of containing 3000 persons. Here, as well as in other places, where he also erected places of worship, the ministers above mentioned laboured with great success; and some of the most popular of the English congregational ministers, with Rowland Hill and others, were brought down at Mr. Haldane's expense; who, after preaching a stated time at the Tabernacle, visited the principal towns in Scotland, and preached the truth to immense congregations. By these means vast numbers of the careless were led to consider their ways, and were converted to God; a revival of genuine religion took place among the pious, and a spirit of greater attention was excited to the authority and meaning of scripture, both as to points of doctrine and discipline. Congregational churches were formed in the different places, where the gospel had been preached; and an academy was instituted for the education of young men of piety and talent, who might take the oversight of them and itinerate in the adjacent districts. Thus matters continued to proceed till a change took place in the views of the Messrs. Haldane on the subject of baptism, which led to their separation from the connexion, a circumstance which was attended with several serious inconveniences at the time, but which was afterwards more than compensated by that spirit of union and co-operation which distinguished the body: and notwithstanding the constant opposition with which it has had to contend, from Presbyterian influence, both on the part of the established sect, and on that of the different branches of seceders, it still continues to maintain its principles, and exert its influence over a considerable portion of the community. According to the latest census, the number of congregational churches, in this connexion in Scotland, amounts to eighty-three.

3. In Ireland, the principles of congregational independency do not appear to have obtained an early footing; and even at the present time the number of churches, in eleven of the counties only, amounts to about twenty.

4. With respect to America, it has already been noticed that a school from this denomination was planted there at a very early period its history. Vast numbers soon followed, driven by the cruel hand of persecution, or voluntarily influenced by the prospects of rational liberty and independence. In twenty-seven years from the first plantation of the North American colonies, forty-three churches were formed; and in an equal number of succeeding years, eighty churches more rose into existence; from that time to the present the number has continued rapidly to increase, and according to the latest statistical tables, it amounts to one thousand and fifty-nine. The number of communicants is about one hundred and twenty thousand.

5. Congregational churches have also been formed in various parts of the heathen world, and continue to increase in proportion to the success accompanying the labours of the missionaries sent out by the London and American Missionary Societies.

CONGREGATIONALISTS, FAITH AND ORDER OF, as presented at a meeting of the Congregational Union, holden in London, May, 1832. This declaration is not designed to be a scholastic, critical, or authoritative confession of faith, but is simply a statement of what is believed and practised throughout the denomination.

Principles of Religion.

1. The Scriptures of the Old Testament, as received by the Jews, and the books of the New Testament, as received by the primitive Christians from the Evangelists and the Apostles, they believe to be divinely inspired, and of supreme authority. These writings, in the languages in which they were originally composed, are to be consulted, by the aids of sound criticism, as a final appeal in all controversies; but the ordinary version of them into the English language, published under civil authority, they consider to be adequate for the ordinary purposes of Christian instruction and edification.

2. They believe in one God, essentially holy, just, and good; infinite, eternal, and immutable, in all natural and moral perfections; the Creator, Supporter, and Governor of all beings, and of all things.

3. They believe that God has revealed himself to man in the Scriptures, under the threefold distinction of Father, Son, and Holy Ghost; to each of which Divine Persons are attributed the same infinite and immutable properties, perfections, and prerogatives. The mode of the divine existence, as a trinity in unity, they profess not to understand: the fact they cordially believe; but the mystery of the Godhead they are content, in this life, to reverence and adore.

4. They believe that Jehovah created man in his own image, pure from evil bias, sinless, and in his kind perfect.

5. They believe that the first man disobeyed the divine command, fell from his state of innocence, and involved himself and his posterity in a state of guilt and depravity.

6. They believe that all mankind are born in sin, and that a fatal inclination to moral evil, utterly incurable by finite means, is inherent in every human being.

7. They believe that God designed, before the foundation of the world, to redeem fallen man, and that he made very early disclosures of his mercy toward this sinful race, which were the grounds of faith and hope to many among the antediluvian world.

8. They believe that God revealed more fully to Abraham the covenant of his grace; and having promised that out of his descendants should arise the Deliverer and Redeemer of mankind, he set him and his posterity apart, as a race specially favoured of God, and devoted to his service; and that hence a church was formed and carefully preserved in the world, under the divine sanction and government, until the birth of the promised Messiah.

9. They believe that, in the fulness of the time, the Son of God was manifested in the flesh, being born of the Virgin Mary, but conceived by the power of the Holy Ghost; and that our Lord Jesus Christ was both the Son of man, as partaking fully and truly of sinless human nature, and the Son of God, as being, in every sense, equal with the Father, and "the express image of his person."

10. They believe that Jesus Christ, the Son of God, revealed, either personally in his own ministry, or by the Holy Spirit in the ministry of his apostles, the whole mind of God for our salvation; and that by his disobedience to the divine law while he lived, and by his sufferings unto death, he meritoriously "obtained eternal redemption for us;" having thereby satisfied divine justice, "magnified the law," and "brought in everlasting righteousness."

11. They believe that, after his death and resurrection, he ascended up into heaven as a Mediator for us, and that he "ever liveth to make intercession for all that come unto God by him."

12. They believe that the Holy Spirit is given in consequence of Christ's mediation, to quicken and renew the hearts of men; and that his influence upon the human soul is indispensably necessary to bring a sinner to true repentance, to produce a saving faith, to regenerate the heart, and to perfect our sanctification.

13. They maintain that we are justified through faith in Christ; and that not of ourselves; "it is the gift of God."

14. They believe that all who will be finally saved were the objects of God's eternal and electing love, and were given by an act of divine sovereignty to the Son of God; but that this act of sovereignty in no way interferes with the system of means, nor with the grounds of human responsibility, being wholly unrevealed as to its objects, and therefore incapable of becoming a rule of human duty.

15. They believe that the Scriptures teach the final perseverance of all true believers to a state of eternal blessedness; though not irrespective of a constant faith in Christ, and uniform obedience to his commands.

16. They believe that a virtuous life will be the necessary effect of a true faith, and that good works are the indispensable fruits of a vital union to Christ.

17. They believe that the sanctification of true Christians, or their growth in the graces of the Spirit, and meetness for heaven, is gradually carried on through the whole period, during which it pleases God to keep them in the present life; and that, at death, their souls are perfectly freed from all remains of evil, and are immediately received into the presence of Christ.

18. They believe in the perpetual obligation of Baptism and the Lord's Supper; the former to be administered to all converts to Christianity, and their children, by the application of water to the subject; and the latter to be publicly celebrated, by Christians, as a token of faith in the Saviour, and of love to each other.

19. They believe that Christ will finally come to judge the whole human race; that the bodies of all men will be raised again; and that, as the Supreme Judge, he will divide the righteous from the wicked, will receive the righteous into life eternal, but send away the wicked into everlasting punishment.

20. They believe that Jesus Christ designed and directed his followers to live together in Christian fellowship, and to maintain the communion of saints; and that, for this purpose, they are jointly to observe all divine ordinances, and maintain that church order and discipline which is either expressly enjoined by inspired institution, or sanctioned by the undoubted example of the apostles and of apostolic churches.

Principles of Church Order and Discipline.

1. They hold it to be the will of Christ that true believers should voluntarily assemble together to observe religious ordinances, to promote mutual edification and holiness, to perpetuate and propagate the gospel in the world, and to advance the glory and worship of God, through Jesus Christ; and that each society, having these objects in view in its formation, is properly a Christian church.

2. They believe that the New Testament alone contains, either in the form of express statute, or in the example and practice of apostolic men and churches, all the articles of faith necessary to be believed by a Christian, and all the order and discipline requisite for constituting and governing Christian societies; and that human traditions, fathers, and councils, possess no authority over the faith and practice of Christians.

3. They acknowledge Christ as the only Head of the Church, and the officers of each church, under him, as ordained to administer his laws impartially to all; and their only appeal, in all questions touching their religious faith and practice, is to the sacred Scriptures.

4. They believe that the New Testament authorizes every Christian church to elect its own officers, to manage all its own affairs, and to stand independent of, and irresponsible to all authority, saving that only of the supreme and divine Head of the Church, the Lord Jesus Christ.

5. They believe that the only officers placed by the apostles over individual churches, are the bishops or pastors, and the deacons; the number of these being dependent upon the numbers of the church; and that to these, as the officers of the church, are committed respectively the administration of its social worship, its discipline, and its temporal concerns; subject, however, to the approbation of the church.

6. They believe that no persons should be received as members of Christian churches, but such as make a credible profession of Christianity, are living according to its precepts, and attest a willingness to be subject to its discipline; and that none should be excluded from the fellowship of the church, but such as deny the faith of Christ, violate his laws, or refuse to submit themselves to the discipline which the word of God enforces.

7. The power of admission into, and rejection from, any Christian church, they believe to be vested in the church itself, and to be exercised only through the medium of its own officers.

8. They believe that Christian churches should steadily meet for the celebration of public worship, for the observance of the Lord's Supper, and for the sanctification of the first day of the week.

9. They believe that the power of a Christian church is purely spiritual, and should in no way be corrupted by union with temporal or civil power.

10. They believe that it is the duty of Christian churches to hold communion with each other, to entertain an enlarged affection for each other, as members of the same body, and to co-operate for the promotion of the Christian cause; but that no church, nor union of churches, has any right or power to interfere with the faith or discipline of any other church, further than to disown and separate from such as, in faith or practice, depart from the gospel of Christ.

11. They believe it is the privilege and duty of the church to call forth such of its members as may appear to be qualified, and indicated by the Holy Spirit, as suitable persons to sustain the office of the ministry; and that Christian churches unitedly ought to consider the maintenance of the Christian ministry, in an adequate degree of learning, as one of its especial cares, that the cause of the gospel may be both honourably sustained and constantly promoted.

12. They believe that church officers, whether bishops or deacons, should be chosen by the free voice of the church, but that their dedication to the duties of their office should take place with especial prayer, and by solemn designation, in the act of imposition of hands by those already in office.

13. They believe that the fellowship of every Christian church should be so liberal as to admit to communion, in the Lord's Supper, all whose faith and godliness are, on the whole, undoubted, though conscientiously differing in points of minor importance; and that this outward sign of fraternity in Christ should be co-extensive with the fraternity itself, though without involving any compliances which conscience would deem to be sinful.

CONNEXION, Countess of Huntingdon's. See METHODISTS, CALVINISTIC.

CONNEXION, NEW. See METHODISTS.

CONNEXIONS, WORLDLY, relations or associations in which Christians are united with men of the world; with respect to which it is proper to distinguish between such as are necessary, and such as are arbitrary, depending solely on the will of the Christian. Of the first sort are all natural connexions with parents, brothers, sisters, children, &c.; and all civil connexions in government, trade, literature, &c. These connexions are not in themselves sinful, but they may become so through our own imprudence. Arbitrary connexions with the world are, in their own nature, criminal; they lie out of the path of duty; they argue an identity and congeniality of heart; and they generally produce great misery and scandal.—Robinson in Claude.

CONONITES, a denomination which appeared in the sixth century. They derived their name from Conon, bishop of Tarsus. He taught that the body never lost its form; that its matter alone was subject to corruption and decay, and was to be restored when this mortal shall put on immortality.

CONSCIENCE signifies knowledge in conjunction; that is, in conjunction with the fact to which it is a witness, as the eye is to the action done before it; or, as South observes, it is a double or joint knowledge, namely, one of a divine law or rule, and the other of a man's own action. It may be defined to be the judgment which a man passes on the morality of his actions as to their purity or turpitude; or the secret testimony of the soul, whereby it approves things that are good, and condemns those that are evil. Some object to its being called an act, habit, or faculty. An act, say they, would be represented as an agent, whereas conscience is a testimony. To say it is a habit, is to speak of it as a disposition acting, which is scarcely more accurate than ascribing one act to another; and, besides, it would be strange language to say that conscience itself is a habit. Against defining it by the name of a power or faculty, it is objected, that it occasions a false notion of it, as a distinct power from reason.

The rules of conscience. We must distinguish between a rule that of itself and immediately binds the conscience, and a rule that is occasionally of use to direct and satisfy the conscience. Now, in the first sense, the will of God is the only rule immediately binding the conscience. No one has authority over the conscience but God. All penal laws, therefore, in matters of mere conscience, or things that do not evidently affect the civil state, are certainly unlawful; yet, secondly, the commands of superiors, not only natural parents, but civil, as magistrates or masters, and every man's private engagements, are rules of conscience in things indifferent. 3. The examples of wise and good men may become rules of conscience; but here it must be observed, that no example or judgment is of any authority against law: where the law is doubtful, and even where there is no doubt, the side of example cannot be taken till inquiry has been first made concerning what the law directs.

Conscience has been considered as, 1. natural, or that common principle which instructs men of all countries and religions in the duties to which they are all alike obliged. There seems to be something of this in the minds of all men. Even in the darkest regions of the earth, and among the rudest tribes of men, a distinction has ever been made between just and unjust, a duty and a crime.

2. A right conscience is that which decides aright, or according to the only rule of rectitude, the law of God. This is also called a well-informed conscience, which in all its decisions proceeds upon the most evident principles of truth.

3. A probable conscience is that which, in cases which admit of the brightest and fullest light, contents itself with bare probabilities. The consciences of many are of no higher character; and though we must not say a man cannot be saved with such a conscience, yet such a conscience is not so perfect as it might be.

4. An ignorant conscience is that which may declare right, but, as it were, by chance, and without any just ground to build on.

5. An erroneous conscience is a conscience mistaken in its decisions about the nature of actions.

6. A doubting conscience is a conscience unresolved about the nature of actions; on account of the equal or nearly equal probabilities which appear for and against each side of the question.

7. Of an evil conscience there are several kinds. Conscience, in regard to actions in general, is evil when it has lost more or less the sense it ought to have of the natural distinctions of moral good and evil: this is a polluted or defiled conscience. Conscience is evil in itself, when it gives either none or a false testimony as to past actions; when reflecting upon wickedness, it feels no pain, it is evil, and said to be scared or hardened, 1 Tim. iv. 2. It is also evil when, during the commission of sin, it lies quiet. In regard to future actions, conscience is evil if it does not startle at the proposal of sin, or connives at the commission of it.

For the right management of conscience, we should, 1. Endeavour to obtain acquaintance with the law of God, and with our own tempers and lives, and frequently compare them together.

2. Furnish conscience with general principles of the most extensive nature and strongest influence; such as the supreme love of God; love to our neighbours as ourselves; and that the care of our souls is of the greatest importance.

3. Preserve the purity of conscience.

4. Maintain the freedom of conscience, particularly against interest, passion, temper, example, and the authority of great names.

5. We should accustom ourselves to cool reflection on our past actions. See Grove's and Paley's Moral Philosophy; South's Sermons, vol. ii. sermon 12; and books under CASUISTRY.

CONSCIOUSNESS, the perception of what passes in a man's own mind. We must not confound the terms consciousness and conscience; for though the Latin be ignorant of any such distinction, including both in the word conscientia, yet there is a great deal of difference between them in our language. Consciousness is confined to the actions of the mind, being nothing else but that knowledge of itself, which is inseparable from every thought and voluntary motion of the soul. Conscience extends to all human actions, bodily as well as mental. Consciousness is the knowledge of the existence, conscience, of the moral nature, of actions. Consciousness is a province of metaphysics; conscience, of morality.

CONSECRATION, a rite or ceremony of dedicating things or persons to the service of God. It is used for the benediction of the elements at the eucharist: the ordination of bishops is also called consecration.

The Romanists have a great deal of foppery in the ceremonies of consecration, which they bestow on almost every thing; as bells, candles, books, water, oil, ashes, palms, swords, banners, pictures, crosses, agnus deis, roses, &c. In England, churches have been always consecrated with particular ceremonies, the form of which was left to the discretion of the bishop. That observed by Archbishop Laud, in consecrating St. Catherine Cree church, in London, gave great offence, and well it might. It was enough, as one observes, to have made even a popish cardinal blush, and which no Protestant can read but with indignant concern. "The bishop came, attended with several of the high commission, and some civilians. At his approach to the west door of the church, which was shut, and guarded by halberdiers, some that were appointed for that purpose, cried with a loud voice, 'Open, open, ye everlasting doors, that the King of Glory may come in!' Presently the doors were opened, and the bishop, with some doctors and principal men, entered. As soon as they were within the place, his lordship fell down upon his knees, and, with eyes lifted up and his arms spread abroad, said, 'This place is holy; the ground is holy: in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, I pronounce it holy.' Then, walking up the middle aisle towards the chancel, he took up some of the dust, and threw it into the air several times.

When he approached near the rail of the communion table, he bowed towards it five or six times; and, returning, went round the church, with his attendants in procession, saying first the hundredth, and then the nineteenth Psalm, as prescribed in the Roman Pontifical. He then read several collects, in one of which he prays God to accept of that beautiful building, and concludes thus:—"We consecrate this church, and separate it unto thee as holy ground, not to be profaned any more to common use." In another, he prays, 'That ALL who should hereafter be buried within the circuit of this holy and sacred place, may rest in their sepulchres in peace, till Christ's coming to judgment, and may then rise to eternal life and happiness.' Then the bishop, sitting under a cloth of state in the aisle of the chancel, near the communion table, took a written book in his hand, and pronounced curses upon those who should hereafter profane that holy place by musters of soldiers, or keeping profane law courts, or carrying burdens through it; and at the end of every curse he bowed to the east, and said, 'Let all the people say, Amen.' When the curses were ended, which were about twenty, he pronounced a like number of blessings upon all that had any hand in framing and building that sacred and beautiful church; and on those that had given, or should hereafter give, any chalices, plate, ornaments, or other utensils; and at the end of every blessing, he bowed to the east, and said, 'Let all the people say, Amen.' After this came the sermon, then the sacrament, which the bishop consecrated, and administered in the following manner:—As he approached the altar, he made five or six low bows; and coming up to the side of it, where the bread and wine were covered, he bowed seven times. Then, after reading many prayers, he came near the bread, and gently lifting up the corner of the napkin, beheld it; and immediately letting fall the napkin, he retreated hastily a step or two, and made three low obeisances: his lordship then advanced, and, having uncovered the bread, bowed three times as before. Then he laid his hand on the cup, which was full of wine, with a cover upon it; which having let go, he stepped back, and bowed three times towards it; then he came near again, and lifting up the cover of the cup, looked in it, and seeing the wine, let fall the cover again, retired back, and bowed as before. Then the elements were consecrated; and the bishop, having first received, gave it to some principal men in their surplices, hoods, and tippets; after which, many prayers being said, the solemnity of the consecration ended."

CONSISTENTES, a kind of penitents, who were allowed to assist at prayers, but who could not be admitted to receive the sacrament.

CONSISTORY, a word commonly used for a council-house of ecclesiastical persons, or, place of justice in the spiritual court; a session or assembly of prelates. Every archbishop and bishop of every diocese has a consistory court, held before his chancellor or commissary, in his cathedral church, or other convenient place of his diocese, for ecclesiastical causes. The bishop's chancellor is the judge of this court, supposed to be skilled in the civil and canon law; and in places of the diocese far remote from the bishop's consistory, the bishop appoints a commissary to judge in all causes within a certain district, and a register to enter his decrees, &c. Consistory at Rome, denotes the college of cardinals, or the pope's senate and council, before whom judiciary causes are pleaded, and all political affairs of importance, the election of bishops, archbishops, &c. are transacted. There is the ordinary consistory, which the pope assembles every week in the papal palace, and the extraordinary or secret consistories, called together on special and important occasions. Consistory is also used among the Lutherans for a council or assembly of ministers and lawyers to regulate their affairs, discipline, &c. They are the highest Protestant ecclesiastical bodies on the continent.

CONSTANCE, COUNCIL OF, 1414—1418. The German emperor, the pope, 20 princes, 140 counts, more than 20 cardinals, 7 patriarchs, 20 archbishops, 91 bishops, 600 other clerical dignitaries, and about 4000 priests, were present at this celebrated ecclesiastical assembly, which was occasioned by the divisions and contests that had arisen about the affairs of the church. From 1305—77, the popes had resided at Avignon; but in 1378, Gregory XI. removed the papal seat back to Rome; after his death, the French and Italian cardinals could not agree upon a successor, and so each party chose its own candidate. This led to a schism which lasted forty years. Indeed, when the Emperor Sigismund ascended the throne, in 1411, there were three popes, each of whom had anathematized the two others. To put an end to these disorders, and to stop the diffusion of the doctrines of Huss, Sigismund went in person to Italy, France, Spain, and England, and (as the Emperor Maximilian I. used to say, in jest, performing the part of the beadle of the Roman empire,) summoned a general council. The pretended heresies of Wickliffe and Huss were here condemned, and the latter, notwithstanding the assurances of safety given him by the emperor, was burnt, July 6, 1415; and his friend and companion, Jerome, of Prague, met with the same fate, May 30, 1416. The three popes were formally deposed, and Martin V. was legally chosen to the chair of St. Peter; but instead of furthering the emperor's wishes for a reformation in the affairs of the church, he thwarted his plans, and nothing was done till the council of Basle, which see.

CONSTANTINE, SURNAMED THE GREAT, son of the Emperor Constantine Chlorus, and of his wife Helena, was born A. D. 274. On the death of his father, he was chosen emperor by the soldiery, in 306. Galerius, however, would not allow him the title of Augustus, and gave him that of Cæsar only; but having taken possession of the countries which had been subject to his father, viz. Gaul, Spain, and Britain, and overcome the Franks, he turned his arms against Maxentius, vanquished his army under the walls of Rome, and was declared by the senate Augustus and Pontifex Maximus. It was in this campaign in Italy that he is said to have seen a flaming cross in the heavens, beneath the sun, bearing this inscription, In hoc signo vinces,—i. e. "By this sign thou shalt conquer;" and on the same authority it is stated that Christ himself appeared to him the following night, and ordered him to take for his standard an imitation of the fiery cross which he had seen. He accordingly caused a standard to be made in this form, which was called the labarum. In 313, he published the memorable edict of toleration in favour of the Christians. By this, every one was allowed to embrace the religion most agreeable to his own mode of thinking; and all the property that had been taken from the Christians during the persecutions was restored to them. They were also made eligible to public offices. This edict has accordingly been regarded as marking the triumph of the cross, and the downfall of paganism.

Having defeated Licinius, who showed a mortal hatred to the Christians, Constantine became sole head of the eastern and western empires in 325, the year noted for the oecumenical council which he convened at Nice in Bithynia, and which he attended in person, for the purpose of settling the Arian controversy. Towards the close of his life he favoured the Arians, to which he was induced by Eusebius, of Nicomedia; in consequence of which he banished many orthodox bishops. Though he professed Christianity, he was not baptized till he fell sick in 337, in which year he died in the vicinity of Nicomedia, after a reign of 31 years.

Whatever may have been the true character of Constantine's conversion to the Christian faith, its consequences were of vast importance both to the empire and to the church of Christ. It opened the way for the unobstructed propagation of the Gospel to a wider extent than at any former period of its history. All impediments to an open profession of Christianity were removed, and it became the established religion of the empire. Numerous, however, in various points of view, as were the advantages accruing to it from this change, it soon began to suffer from being brought into close contact with the fostering influence of secular power. The simplicity of the gospel was corrupted: pompous rites and ceremonies were introduced; worldly honours and emoluments were conferred on the teachers of Christianity; and the kingdom of Christ in a great measure converted into a kingdom of this world.

CONSTITUTION, in the Roman Church, a decree of the pope in matters of doctrine. In France, however, this name has been applied, by way of eminence, to the famous bull Unigenitus, which see.

CONSTITUTIONS, APOSTOLICAL. See APOSTOLIC.

CONSUBSTANTIAL, a term of like import with co-essential, denoting something of the same substance with another. Thus we say that Christ is consubstantial with the Father. The term ὁμοουσιος, consubstantial, was first adopted by the fathers of the councils of Antioch and Nice, to express the orthodox doctrine the more precisely, and to serve as a barrier and precaution against the errors and subtleties of the Arians, who owned every thing except the consubstantiality.

The Arians allowed that the Word was God, as having been made God; but they denied that he was the same God, and of the same substance with the Father: accordingly they exerted themselves to the utmost to abolish the use of the word. The Emperor Constantine used all his authority with the bishops to have it expunged out of the symbols; but it was retained, and is at this day, as it was then, the distinguishing criterion between an Athanasian and an Arian. See ARTICLES ARIANS and JESUS CHRIST.

CONSUBSTANTIATION, a tenet of the Lutheran church, with regard to the manner of the change made in the bread and wine in the eucharist. The divines of that profession maintain that, after consecration, the body and blood of our Saviour are substantially present together with the substance of the bread and wine, which is called consubstantiation, or impanation. See TRANSUBSTANTIATION.

CONTENTMENT is a disposition of mind in which our desires are confined to what we enjoy, without murmuring at our lot, or wishing ardently for more. It stands opposed to envy, James iii. 16; to avarice, Heb. xiii. 5; to pride and ambition, Prov. xiii. 10; to anxiety of mind, Matt. vi. 25, 34; to murmurings and repinings, 1 Cor. x. 10. Contentment does not imply unconcern about our welfare, or that we should not have a sense of any thing uneasy or distressing; nor does it give any countenance to idleness, or prevent diligent endeavours to improve our circumstances. It implies, however, that our desires of worldly good be moderate; that we do not indulge unnecessary care, or use unlawful efforts to better ourselves; but that we acquiesce with, and make the best of our condition, whatever it be. Contentment arises not from a man's outward condition, but from his inward disposition, and is the genuine offspring of humility, attended with a fixed habitual sense of God's particular providence, the recollection of past mercies, and a just estimate of the true nature of all earthly things. Motives to contentment arise from the consideration of the rectitude of the Divine government, Ps. xcvi. 1, 2; the benignity of the Divine providence, Ps. cxlv.; the greatness of the Divine promises, 2 Pet. i. 4; our own unworthiness, Gen. xxxii. 10; the punishments we deserve, Lam. iii. 39, 40; the reward which contentment itself brings with it, 1 Tim. vi. 6; the speedy termination of all our troubles here, and the prospect of eternal felicity in a future state, Rom. v. 2.—Barrow's Works, vol. iii. ser. 5—9; Burroughs on Contentment; Watson's Art of ditto; Hale's Com., p. 59; Mason's Christian Morals, vol. i. ser. 2.

CONTINENCY is that moral virtue by which we restrain concupiscence. There is this distinction between chastity and continence: chastity requires no effort, because it may result from constitution; whereas continency appears to be the consequence of a victory gained over ourselves. The term is most usually applied to men, as chastity is to women. See CHASTITY.

CONTINGENT, any thing that happens without a foreknown cause, commonly called accidental. An event not come to pass is said to be contingent, which either may or may not be; what is already done, is said to have been contingent, if it might or might not have been. What is contingent or casual to us is not so with God. As effects stand related to a second cause, they are many times contingent: but as they stand related to the first cause, they are acts of God's counsel, and directed by his wisdom.

CONTRITE: this word signifies beaten or bruised, as with hard blows, or a heavy burden; and so in Scripture language imports one whose heart is broken and wounded for sin, in opposition to the heart of stone. Isa. lvi. 2; Ps. li. 17; lvii. 15.

The evidences of a broken and contrite spirit are, 1. Deep conviction of the evil of sin. 2. Humiliation under a sense of it, Job xliii. 5, 6. 3. Pungent sorrow for it, Zec. xii. 10. 4. Ingenuous confession of it, 1 John i. 9. 5. Prayer for deliverance from it, Ps. li. 10; Luke xviii. 13. 6. Susceptibility of good impressions, Ezek. xi. 19.

CONTROVERSY, RELIGIOUS, is good or evil according to the principles which it upholds, the purpose in which it originates, the object to which it is applied, and the temper with which it is conducted. If it spring from a mere spirit of contention; from desire of victory, not love of truth; or from stubbornness that will not be brought into captivity to the obedience of Christ, Christianity will not acknowledge it for her own. If it be employed on questions unbefitting human disputation; questions inaccessible to our finite understandings, unnecessary or unimportant in their issue, and only tending to perpetuate strife, or to unsettle the minds of men, then it is also unworthy of the Christian character. Nor is it void of offence when, however sound its principles, however important its subject, however irrefragable its argument, it is made the vehicle of personal malignity; when it is carried on with a spirit that rends asunder the social ties, and exasperates, instead of endeavouring to soften, the irritable feelings, which, even in its mildest aspect, it is but too apt to excite.

But those evil consequences, which flow from the abuse of controversy, and from causes by no means necessarily connected with religious discussion, ought not to deter us from its proper use, when truth requires its aid. Controversy is worse than useless if it have no better end in view than a display of mental superiority, or the self-gratification which, to minds of a certain cast, it appears to afford. For, as in secular disputes, it is the legitimate end of warfare to produce peace, so, in religious polemics, the attainment of unanimity ought to be the main object. War is waged because peace cannot be obtained without it. Religious controversy is maintained because agreement in the truth is not otherwise to be effected. When this necessity is laid upon us, we do but acquit ourselves of an indispensable duty in defending the charge committed to our care by the use of those weapons with which the armoury of the divine word supplies us.—Van Mildert's Bampton Lect.

CONVENT. See ABBEY, MONASTERY, MONK.

CONVENTICLE, a diminutive of convent, denoting properly a cabal, or secret assembly of a part of the monks of a convent, to make a party in the election of an abbot. The term conventicle is said by some to have been first applied in England to the schools of Wickliffe, and has been since used in a way of reproach for those assemblies which dissent from the established church.

In 1664 what was called the conventicle act was passed, decreeing that if any person above sixteen years of age was present at any meeting for worship, different from the Church of England, where there should be five persons more than the household, they should, for the first offence, suffer three months' imprisonment, or pay 5*l.*; for the second, the punishment is doubled; and for the third, they were to be banished to America, or pay 100*l.*, and if they returned, to suffer death. This act having expired, it was revived in 1669, for by 22 Car. II. cap. 1, it is enacted, that if any persons of the age of sixteen years, subjects of this kingdom, shall be present at any conventicle where there are five or more assembled, they shall be fined 5*s.* for the first offence, and 10*s.* for the second; and persons preaching incur a penalty of 20*l.* Also suffering a meeting to be held in a house is 20*l.* penalty: justices of peace have power to enter such houses, and seize persons assembled; and if they neglect their duty, they forfeit 100*l.*; and if any constable, &c., know of such proceedings, and do not inform a justice of the peace or chief magistrate, he shall forfeit 5*l.* But the 1st of William and Mary, cap. 18, ordains that Protestant dissenters shall be exempted from these penalties; though if they meet in a house with the doors locked, barred, or bolted, such dissenters shall have no benefit from the 1st of William and Mary. Officers of the government, &c., present at any conventicle at which there shall be ten persons, if the royal family be not prayed for in express words, shall forfeit 40*l.*, and be disabled. Stat. 10 Anne, cap. 2.

CONVERSION, a change which consists in the renovation of the heart and life, or a turning from the power of sin and Satan unto God, Acts xxvi. 18, and is produced by the influence of Divine grace on the soul. Sometimes it is put for restoration, as in the case of Peter, Luke xxii. 32. The instrumental cause of conversion is usually the ministry of the word; though sometimes it is produced by reading, by serious and appropriate conversation, sanctified afflictions, &c. "Conversion," says the great Charnock, "is to be distinguished from regeneration thus:—Regeneration is a spiritual change; conversion is a spiritual motion; in regeneration there is a power conferred; conversion is the exercise of this power; in regeneration there is given us a principle to turn; conversion is our actual turning. In the covenant, God's putting his Spirit into us is distinguished from our walking in his statutes from the first step we take in the way of God, and is set down as the cause of our motion. Ezek. xxxvi. 27. In renewing us, God gives us a power; in converting us, he excites that power. Men are naturally dead, and have a stone upon them: regeneration is a rolling away the stone from the heart, and a raising to newness of life; and then conversion is as natural to a regenerate man as motion is to a lively body. A principle of activity will produce action. In regeneration man is wholly passive; in conversion he is active. The first reviving us is wholly the act of God, without any concurrence of the creature: but after we are revived we do actively and voluntarily live in his sight. Regeneration is the motion of God in the creature; conversion is the motion of the creature to God, by virtue of that first principle: from this principle all the acts of believing, repenting, mortifying, quickening, do spring. In all these a man is active; in the other he is merely passive." Conversion evidences itself by ardent love to God, Ps. lxxiii. 25; delight in his people, John xiii. 35; attendance on his ordinances, Ps. xxvii. 4; confidence in his promises, Ps. ix. 10; abhorrence of self, and renunciation of the world, Job xliii. 5; James iv. 4; submission to his authority, and uniform obedience to his word, Matt. vii. 20. See CALLING, REGENERATION.

CONVERT, a person who is converted. In a monastic sense, converts are lay friars, or brothers admitted for the service of the house, without orders, and not allowed to sing in the choir.

CONVICTION, in general, is the assurance of the truth of any proposition. In a religious sense, it is the first degree of repentance, and implies an affecting sense that we are guilty before God; that we can do nothing of ourselves to gain his forfeited favour; that we deserve and are exposed to the wrath of God; that sin is very odious and hateful, yea, the greatest of evils. There is a natural conviction which arises from natural conscience, fear of punishment, moral suasion, or alarming providences, but which is not of a permanent nature. Saving conviction is a work of the Spirit, as the cause; though the law, the conscience, the Gospel, or affliction, may be the means. John xvi. 8, 9. Convictions of sin differ very much in their degree in different persons. It has been observed that those who suffer the most agonizing sensations are such as never before enjoyed the external call of the Gospel, or were not favoured with the tuition of religious parents, but have neglected or notoriously abused the means of grace. To these conviction is often sudden, and produces that horror and shame which are not soon overcome; whereas those who have sat under the Gospel from their infancy have not had such alarming convictions, because they have already some notion of these things, and have so much acquaintance with the Gospel as administers immediate comfort. As it is not, therefore, the constant method of the Spirit to convince in one way, it is improper for any to distress themselves because they are not, or have not been tormented almost to despair: they should be rather thankful that the Spirit of God has dealt tenderly with them, and opened to them the source of consolation. It is necessary however to observe, that, in order to repentance and conversion to God, there must be real and lasting conviction, which, though it may not be the same in degree, is the same in nature. Evangelical conviction differs from legal conviction thus: legal arises from a consideration of God's justice, power, or omniscience; evangelical from God's goodness and holiness, and from a disaffection to sin: legal conviction still conceits there is some remaining good; but evangelical is sensible there is no good at all: legal wishes freedom from pain; evangelical from sin: legal hardens the heart; evangelical softens it: legal is only temporary; evangelical lasting.

CONVOCATION, an assembly of persons for the worship of God. Lev. xxiii. Numb. xxviii. Exod. xii. 16. An assembly of the clergy for consultation upon matters ecclesiastical.

As the parliament consists of two distinct houses, so does this convocation. The one called the upper house, where the archbishops and bishops sit severally by themselves; the other, the lower house, where all the rest of the clergy are represented by their deputies. The inferior clergy are represented by their proctors, consisting of all the deans and archdeacons; of one proctor for every chapter, and two for the clergy, of every diocese—in all, one hundred and forty-three divines, viz. twenty-two deans, fifty-three archdeacons, twenty-four prebendaries, and forty-four proctors of the diocesan clergy. The lower house chooses its prolocutor, who is to take care that the members attend, to collect their debates and votes, and to carry their resolutions to the upper house. The convocation is summoned by the king's writ, directed to the archbishop of each province, requiring him to summon all bishops, deans, archdeacons, &c. The power of the convocation is limited by a statute of Henry VIII. They are not to make any canons, or ecclesiastical laws, without the king's licence; nor, when permitted, can they put them in execution but under several restrictions.—They have the examining and censuring all heretical and schismatical books and persons, &c.; but there lies an appeal to the king in chancery, or to his delegates. The clergy in convocation, and their servants, have the same privileges as members of parliament. In 1665, the convocation of the clergy gave up the privilege of taxing themselves to the House of Commons, in consideration of their being allowed to vote at the election of members for that house. Since that period they have been seldom allowed to do any business: and are generally prorogued from time to time till dissolved, a new convocation being generally called along with a new parliament.

CONVULSIONISTS, a term originally applied to such persons as were the subjects of convulsive fits, of which they were said to be cured by visiting the tomb of the Abbé Paris, a celebrated zealot among the Jansenists; and afterwards given to those in France whose fanaticism or imposture caused them to work themselves up into the strangest agitations and convulsions, during which they received wonderful visions and revelations, and abandoned themselves to the most extravagant antics that ever were exhibited by idiot or madman. They threw themselves into the most violent contortions of body, rolled about on the ground, imitated birds, beasts, and fishes, and at last when they had completely spent themselves, went off in a swoon. The greater number were of the female sex, who, like the dervishes, spun themselves round on one heel, and frequently presented themselves to the spectators in very indecent attitudes. Pinault, an advocate, who belonged to the convulsionists, maintained that God had sent him a peculiar kind of fits by which to humble his pride. During these fits, he always barked like a dog. Though it is now more than a century since these disgusting scenes first came into notice in France, they have more or less continued till the present time. It is seldom, indeed, that they have been exhibited in Paris since the middle of last century; but in country places, such as Forez, Pontoise, &c., they occasionally occur, when the cunning priests know how to make them tell on the credulity of the vulgar, and thus render them subservient to the interests of Roman superstition.

COPTI, a name given to the natives of Egypt belonging to the Jacobite or Monophysite sect, and is a term of Arabic formation, manifestly a corruption of the Greek Αἰγύπτιος. The Jacobites, who were of pure Egyptian blood, and far more numerous than their adversaries, the Melkites (Greeks in faith as well as in origin), having been persecuted as heretics by the Greek emperor, were willing to submit to the arms of Amru-Ibn-el-ás, the Arabian commander, who granted to them immunities which they had not previously possessed, and protected their church from the encroachments of the Constantinopolitan see. But the Copts soon found that their privileges would be of little avail under oppressive or fanatical princes. Their wealth, numbers, and respectability rapidly declined; and, though rarely intermarrying with their conquerors, and preserving their features, manners, and religion unaltered, they soon lost their language, which had resisted the influence of a Grecian court for so many ages. Though studied and used as a learned language till the present time, it appears to have been little or at all spoken as early as the tenth century.

In person and features, the Copts differ much from the other natives of Egypt, and are evidently a distinct race—an intermediate link in the chain which connects the negro with the fairer tribes to the north and south of the tropics, strongly resembling the Abyssinians, who, though extremely dark, are much paler than the genuine negroes. Dark eyes, aquiline noses, and curled hair, are the usual characteristics of both nations; and the mummies which have been examined show the resemblance of the modern Copts to their ancestors. At the highest calculation, they do not at present amount to more than between 400,000 and 500,000 souls. They have good capacities, and generally have the Turkish taxes, finances, &c., in their hands.

The Copts have a patriarch, who resides at Cairo; but he takes his title from Alexandria. He has no archbishop under him, but eleven or twelve bishops. The rest of the clergy, whether secular or regular, are composed of the orders of St. Anthony, St. Paul, St. Macarius, who have each their monasteries. Besides the orders of priests, deacons, and subdeacons, the Copts have likewise archimandrites, or abbots, the dignity whereof they confer with all the prayers and ceremonies of a strict ordination. By a custom of six hundred years' standing, if a priest elected bishop be not already archimandrite, that dignity must be conferred on him before episcopal ordination. The second person among the clergy, after the patriarch, is the titular patriarch of Jerusalem, who also resides at Cairo. To him belongs the government of the Coptic Church during the vacancy of the patriarchal see. To be elected patriarch, it is necessary the person have lived all his life in continence. To be elected bishop, the person must be in the celibate; or, if he have been married, it must not be above once. The priests and inferior ministers are allowed to be married before ordination; but not forced to it, as some have observed. They have a great number of deacons, and even confer the dignity frequently on their children. None but the lowest rank among the people commence ecclesiastics, whence arises that excessive ignorance found among them; yet the respect of the laity towards the clergy is very extraordinary. The monastic life is in great esteem among them: to be admitted into it, there is always required the consent of the bishop. The religious Copts, it is said, make a vow of perpetual chastity; renounce the world, and live with great austerity in deserts; they are obliged to sleep in their clothes and their girdle, on a mat stretched on the ground; and to prostrate themselves every evening one hundred and fifty times with their face and breast on the ground. They are all, both men and women, of the lowest class of the people, and live on alms. The nunneries are properly hospitals, and few enter but widows reduced to beggary.

CORBAN, in Jewish antiquity, were those offerings which had life; in opposition to the minchah, or those which had not. It is derived from the word karab, which signifies "to approach;" because the victims were brought to the door of the tabernacle. The corban were always looked upon as the most sacred offerings. The Jews are reproached with defeating, by means of the corban, the precept of the fifth commandment, which enjoins the respect due to parents; for when a child had no mind to relieve the wants of his father or mother, he would say to them—"It is a gift (corban) by whatsoever thou mightest be profited by me;" i. e. "I have devoted that to God which you ask of me, and it is no longer mine to give." Mark vii. 11.

CORDELIERS, a Franciscan, or religious of the order of St. Francis. The denomination cordelier is said to have been given in the war of St. Lewis against the infidels, wherein the friars minor having repulsed the barbarians, and that king having inquired their name, it was answered they were people cordeliez, "tied with ropes;" alluding to the girdle of rope or cord, tied with three knots, which they wore as part of their habit.

CORDICOLES, a society of Roman Catholic devotees that profess to worship "the sacred heart of Jesus, and that of Mary, his Virgin Mother." They abound in Naples, Italy, Spain, and Sardinia.

CORNARISTS, the disciples of Theodore Cornhart, an enthusiastic secretary of the States of Holland. He wrote, at the same time, against the Catholics, Lutherans, and Calvinists. He maintained that every religious communion needed reformation; but he added, that no person had a right to engage in accomplishing it without a mission supported by miracles. He was also of opinion, that a person might be a good Christian without being a member of any visible church.

CORPUS CHRISTI, FEAST OF; a particular festival instituted in the Roman Church, in honour of the consecrated host, and with a view to its adoration. It owes its origin to the vision of a nun of Liege, named Juliana, in 1230, who, while looking at the full moon, saw a gap in its orb; and, by a peculiar revelation from heaven, learned that the moon represented the Christian Church, and the gap the want of a certain festival,—that of the adoration of the body of Christ in the consecrated host,—which she was to begin to celebrate, and announce to the world. In 1264, while a priest at Bolsena, who did not believe in the change of the bread into the body of Christ, was going through the ceremony of benediction, drops of blood fell on his surplice; and, when he endeavoured to conceal them in the folds of his garment, formed bloody images of the host. The bloody surplice is still shown as a relic at Civita Vecchia. Urban IV. published, in the same year, a bull, in which he appointed the Thursday of the week after Pentecost for the celebration of the Corpus Christi feast throughout Christendom, and promised absolution for a period of from forty to one hundred days to the penitent who took part in it. Since then, the festival has been kept as one of the greatest in the Roman Catholic Church. Splendid processions form an essential part of it. The children belonging to the choir, with flags, and the priests, with lighted tapers, move through the streets in front of the priest, who carries the host in a precious box, where it can be seen, under a canopy held by four laymen of rank. A crowd of the common people closes the procession. In Spain, it is customary for persons of distinction to send their children, dressed as angels, to join the procession; the different fraternities carry their patron saints before the host; astonishment and awe are produced, as well as feelings of superstitious devotion, by the splendour and magnificence of the procession, by the brilliant appearance of the streamers, by the clouds of smoke from the incense, and the solemn sound of the music. The festival is also a general holiday, in which bull fights, games, dances, and other amusements are not wanting. In Sicily, all the liberties of a masquerade are allowed, and passages from Scripture history are theatrically exhibited in the streets. The whole people are in a state of the utmost excitement, and riot in the gratification of their carnal passions under the sanction of religious license.

COSMOGONY (from the Greek κοσμος, the world, and γονος, generation), according to its etymology, should be defined—the origin of the world; but the term has become, to a great degree, associated with the numerous theories of different nations and individuals respecting this event. These hypotheses may be divided into three classes:—

1. That which represents the world as eternal in form as well as substance. Ocellus Lucanus is one of the most ancient philosophers who supposed the world to have existed from eternity. Aristotle appears to have embraced the same doctrine. His theory is, that not only the heaven and earth, but also animate and inanimate beings in general, were without beginning. His opinion rested on the belief, that the universe was necessarily the eternal effect of a cause equally eternal, such as the Divine Spirit, which, being at once power and action, could not remain idle. Yet he admitted that a spiritual substance was the cause of the universe, of its motion, and its form. He says positively in his Metaphysics, that God is an intelligent spirit (νεψυς), incorporeal, immovable, indivisible, the mover of all things. According to him, the universe is less a creation than an emanation of the Deity. Plato says the universe is an eternal image of the immutable Idea or Type, united, from eternity, with changeable matter. The followers of this philosopher both developed and distorted this idea. Ammonius, a disciple of Proclus, taught, in the sixth century, at Alexandria, the co-eternity of God and the universe. Several ancient philosophers (as also moderns) have gone farther, and taught that the universe is one with Deity. Of this opinion were Xenophanes, Parmenides, Melissus, Zeno of Elea, and the Megaric sect.

2. The theory which considers the matter of the universe eternal, but not its form, was the prevailing one among the ancients, who, starting from the principle that out of nothing nothing could be made, could not admit the creation of matter, yet did not believe that the world had always been in its present state. The prior state of the world, subject to a constant succession of uncertain movements, which chance afterwards made regular, they called chaos. The Phœnicians, Babylonians, and also the Egyptians, seem to have adhered to this theory. The ancient poets, who have handed down to us the old mythological traditions, represent the universe as springing from chaos without the assistance of the Deity. Hesiod feigns that Chaos was the parent of Erebus and Night, from whose union sprang the Air (Æther) and the Day. He farther relates how the sky and the stars were separated from the earth, &c. The system of atoms is much more famous. Leucippus and Democritus of Abdera were its inventors. The atoms, or indivisible particles, said they, existed from eternity, moving at hazard, and producing, by their constant meeting, a variety of substances. After having given rise to an immense variety of combinations, they produced the present organization of bodies. This system of cosmogony was that of Epicurus, as described by Lucretius. Democritus attributed to atoms form and size; Epicurus added weight. Many other systems have existed which must be classed under this division. We only mention that of the Stoics, who admitted two principles, God and matter,—in the abstract both corporeal, for they did not admit spiritual beings. The first was active, the second passive.

3. The third theory of cosmogony makes God the creator of the world out of nothing. This is the doctrine of the sacred Scriptures, in which it is taught with the greatest simplicity and beauty. From its being more or less held by the Etruscans, Magi, Druids, and Bramins, it would seem to have found its way as a tradition from the regions in which it was possessed as a divine revelation. Anaxagoras was the first who taught it among the Greeks; and it was generally adopted by the Romans, notwithstanding the efforts of Lucretius to establish the doctrine of Epicurus.

"The free-thinkers of our own and of former ages have denied the possibility of creation, as being a contradiction to reason; and of consequence have taken the opportunity from thence to discredit revelation. On the other hand, many defenders of the sacred writings have asserted that creation out of nothing, so far from being a contradiction to reason, is not only probable, but demonstrably certain. Nay, some have gone so far as to say, that from the very inspection of the visible system of Nature, we are able to infer that it was once in a state of non-existence." We cannot, however, here enter into the multiplicity of the arguments on both sides; it is enough for us to know what God has been pleased to reveal, both concerning himself and the works of his hands. Men, and other animals that inhabit the earth and the seas; all the immense varieties of herbs and plants of which the vegetable kingdom consists; the globe of the earth; and the expanse of the ocean, these we know to have been produced by his power. Besides the terrestrial world, which we inhabit, we see many other material bodies disposed around it in the wide extent of space. The moon, which is in a particular manner connected with our earth, and even dependent upon it; the sun and the other planets, with their satellites, which, like the earth, circulate round the sun, and appear to derive from him light and heat; those bodies which we call fixed stars, and consider as illuminating and cherishing with heat each its peculiar system of planets; and the comets which, at certain periods, surprise us with their appearance, and the nature of whose connexion with the general system of Nature, or with any particular system of planets, we cannot pretend to have fully discovered; these are so many more of the Deity's works, from the contemplation of which we cannot but conceive the most awful ideas of his creative power.

"Matter, however, whatever the varieties of form under which it is made to appear, the relative disposition of its parts, or the motions communicated to it, is but an inferior part of the works of creation. We believe ourselves to be animated with a much higher principle than brute matter; in viewing the manners and economy of the lower animals, we can scarce avoid acknowledging even them to consist of something more than various modifications of matter and motion. The other planetary bodies, which seem to be in circumstances nearly analogous to those of our earth, are surely, as well as it, destined for the habitations of rational, intelligent beings. The existence of intelligences of an higher order than man, though infinitely below the Deity, appears extremely probable. Of these spiritual beings, called angels, we have express intimation in Scripture (see the article ANGEL.) But the limits of the creation we must not pretend to define. How far the regions of space extend, or how they are filled, we know not. How the planetary worlds, the sun, and the fixed stars are occupied, we do not pretend to have ascertained. We are even ignorant how wide a diversity of forms, what an infinity of living animated beings may inhabit our own globe. So confined is our knowledge of creation, yet so grand, so

"Concerning the periods of time at which the Deity executed his several works, it cannot be pretended that mankind have had opportunities of receiving very particular information. Many have been the conjectures, and curious the fancies of learned men, respecting it; but, after all, we must be indebted to the sacred writings for the best information." Different copies, indeed, give different dates. The Hebrew copy of the Bible, which we Christians, for good reasons, consider as the most authentic, dates the creation of the world 3944 years before the Christian era. The Samaritan Bible, again, fixes the era of the creation 4305 years before the birth of Christ. And the Greek translation, known by the name of the Septuagint version of the Bible, gives 5270 as the number of the years which intervened between these two periods. By comparing the various dates in the sacred writings, examining how these have come to disagree, and to be diversified in different copies; endeavouring to reconcile the most authentic profane with sacred chronology, some ingenious men have formed schemes of chronology, plausible, indeed, but not supported by sufficient authorities, which they would gladly persuade us to receive in preference to any of those above mentioned. Usher makes out from the Hebrew Bible 4004 years as the term between the creation and the birth of Christ. Josephus, according to Dr. Wills and Mr. Whiston, makes it 4658 years; and M. Pezron, with the help of the Septuagint, extends it to 5572 years. Usher's system is the most generally received. But though these different systems of chronology are so inconsistent, and so slenderly supported, yet the differences among them are so inconsiderable in comparison with those which arise before us when we contemplate the chronology of the Chinese, the Chaldeans, and the Egyptians, and they agree so well with the general information of authentic history, and with the appearances of nature and of society, that they may be considered as nearly fixing the true period of the creation of the earth. Uncertain, however, as we may be as to the exact time of the creation, we may profitably apply ourselves to the contemplation of this immense fabric. Indeed, the beautiful and uniform works around us must strike the mind of every beholder with wonder and admiration, unless he be enveloped in ignorance, and chained down to the earth with sensuality. These works every way proclaim the wisdom, the power, and the goodness of the Creator. Creation is a book which the wisest philosopher may study with the deepest attention. To trace the works of art, the more it is examined, the more it opens to us sources of admiration of its great Author, the more it calls for our inspection, and the more it demands our praise. Here every thing is adjusted in the exactest order; all answering the wisest ends, and acting according to the appointed laws of Deity. Here the Christian is led into the most delightful field of contemplation. To him, every pebble becomes a preacher, and every atom a step by which he ascends to his Creator. Placed in this beautiful temple, and looking around on all its various parts, he cannot help joining with the Psalmist in saying, "O Lord, how manifold are thy works; in wisdom hast thou made them all!" COUNCIL, an assembly of ecclesiastical persons met together for the purpose of consultation on ecclesiastical matters.

COUNCIL, Œcumenical or General, is an assembly which has been supposed to represent the whole body of the Christian church. It is obvious, however, that there is room for considerable diversity of opinion as to what constitutes a general council in the ecclesiastical sense of the expression; and it is no less clear that, in the proper sense of the phrase, such a council has never been held. The Romanists reckon eighteen of them, Bullinger six, Dr. Prideaux seven, and Bishop Beveridge eight, which, he says, are all the general councils which have ever been held since the time of the first Christian emperor. Adopting the number contended for by the Romish writers, they must be all divided into two classes, Eastern and Western; the former called by the emperors, the latter by the popes. The following is the order:—

EIGHT EASTERN COUNCILS.

1. At Nice, in Bithynia, in the year 325, which sat about two months, and was occasioned by the Arian heresy. Authors differ respecting the number of bishops that were assembled; Eusebius saying there were two hundred and fifty, and Socrates that there were three hundred and eighteen. The emperor himself honoured it with his presence; Hosius, Bishop of Cordova, in Spain—a man of great piety and learning—presided. It was at this council that the term ὁμοουσιος, of the same substance, was applied to the Son, to express the identity of his nature with that of the Father. The profession of the faith, called the Nicene Creed, was then drawn up, and subscribed by all, except a small number of Arians.

2. Constantinople, (L.) in 381, convened by the Emperor Theodosius, in order to oppose the heresies of Sabellius, Marcellus, Photinus, and Apollinarius, which were still more or less prevailing, and to settle still more definitely some points of the Nicene Creed against the Arians, especially by making additions declaratory of belief in the divinity of the Holy Spirit. At this council, a hundred and fifty prelates were present.

3. Ephesus, 431, consisting of two hundred bishops assembled to judge of the Nestorian heresy, which they condemned by a solemn sentence, confirmatory of the sentence pronounced against Nestorius, the year before, by Pope Celestine I, in a synod held at Rome.

4. Chalcedon, 451, composed, according to some, of six hundred, and, according to others, of six hundred and fifty bishops. It condemned the errors of Eutychus, who affirmed that there was but one nature in Christ.

5. Constantinople, (II.,) in 553, convoked by Justinian, and consisting of a hundred and sixty-five bishops. Its principal transaction was the condemnation of what is called the "Three Chapters," by which is meant the writings of Theodore of Mopsuestia, Theodoret of Cyr, and the Epistle of Ibas to Maris the Persian. It also issued an anathema against Origen, Arius, Macedonius, and others.

6. Constantinople, (III.,) in 680, consisting of somewhere about two hundred prelates, renewed the condemnation of the Monothelite heresy, which asserted that there was only one will in Christ; a sentence which had been pronounced against its abettors, in a council held at Rome the preceding year.

7. Nice, 787. This council, commonly called the Second Nicene, assembled at Constantinople the year before, but was so disturbed by the violence of the Iconoclasts, that the members were obliged to adjourn and meet elsewhere. There were present three hundred and fifty bishops, besides many monks and priests, who came to the conclusion, on the subject of image-worship, that it was relatively lawful; the effect of which was its confirmation and prevalence.

8. Constantinople, (IV.,) in 869; the principal business of which was the deposition of Photius, who had intruded into the see of Constantinople, and the restoration of Ignatius, who had been unjustly expelled.

TEN WESTERN COUNCILS.

1. Lateran, (I.,) in the year 1123. It was convened by Pope Calixtus II., who presided in person, and consisted of three hundred bishops. It decreed that investiture to ecclesiastical dignities was the exclusive right of the church; and that the practice of secular princes giving such investiture was an usurpation. The celibacy of the clergy was also decreed.

2. Lateran, (II.,) in 1139, composed of nearly a thousand bishops, under the presidency of Pope Innocent II. It decided on the due election of this pope, and condemned the errors of Peter de Bruys, and Arnold of Brescia.

3. Lateran, (III.,) in 1179. At this council, with Pope Alexander III. at their head, three hundred and two bishops condemned what they were pleased to call the "errors and impieties" of the Waldenses and Albigenses.

4. Lateran, (IV.,) in 1215, composed of four hundred and twelve bishops, under Innocent III., had for its objects the recovery of the Holy Land, reformation of abuses, and the extirpation of heresy.

5. Lyons, (I.,) in 1245, consisting of a hundred and forty bishops, and convened for the purpose of promoting the crusades, restoring ecclesiastical discipline, and dethroning Frederick II, Emperor of Germany. It was also decreed at this council that cardinals should wear red hats.

6. Lyons, (II.,) in 1274. There were five hundred bishops and about a thousand inferior clergy present. Its principal object was the re-union of the Greek and Latin Churches.

7. Vienne, in Gaul, 1311, consisting of three hundred bishops, who were convoked to suppress the Knights Templars; condemn those who were accused of heresy, and assist the Christians in Palestine.

8. Florence, 1439—42. It was composed of one hundred and forty-one bishops, the patriarch of Constantinople, and the legates of the patriarchs of Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem. It effected a renunciation of schism on the part of the Greeks, and an abjuration of heresy on the part of the Armenians.

9. Lateran, (V.,) in 1512, convened by Pope Julius II., to oppose another held by nine cardinals of high rank the year before at Pisa, with a view to bridle his wild animosity, turbulence, and contumacy. It declared that council schismatic, abolished the pragmatic sanction, and strengthened the power of the Roman See.

10. Trent, convoked and opened by Paul III. in 1545; continued under Julius III., and, after numerous interruptions, brought to a close in 1563, under the pontificate of Pius IV. Its object was professedly to reform ecclesiastical abuses, but really to counteract and crush the reformation. It arrived at the following conclusions, which were enacted under the pain of anathema:—

[1.] All the books of Scripture, canonical and apocryphal, not excluding that of Baruch, though wanting in the old catalogues, which are contained in the Latin church version, commonly called the Vulgate, are possessed of the same divine authority.

[2.] Tradition, whether it regards matters of faith or practice, must be received with the same veneration, forasmuch as it is the unwritten word of God.

[3.] The Holy Scriptures are only to be read and interpreted in and according to the Vulgate, which is the only authentic version.

[4.] No person shall presume, in reliance on his own insight and wisdom, to pervert the Holy Scriptures, to make them favour his views of faith and morals, and contrary to the sense which the church has received, and still receives, which alone can determine what is the true meaning and interpretation; or to explain them contrary to the universal consent of the Fathers.

[5.] Faith is the commencement, foundation, and root of justification, but not altogether exclusive of good works; for persons who are justified increase in the righteousness which they acquire through Christ, by means of their observance of the commandments of God, and the rules of the church. Justification does not consist merely in the forgiveness of sins, but also in the renovation and sanctification of the inner man through grace.

[6.] In the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, after the consecration of the bread and wine, the God-man, Jesus Christ, is really and substantially present under the form of bread and wine, which contains no contradiction; for though, in accordance with his natural existence, he is always in heaven, yet sacramentaliter he is present in many other places in regard to his substance. The other sacraments have only the virtue of sanctification when they are used; but that of the Lord's Supper possesses it previous to the use; for the apostles had not yet received the supper from the hands of the Lord Jesus Christ, when he assured them, that it was his body that he communicated to them; and it has always been the faith of the church, that immediately on the consecration, the true body and the true blood of our Lord Jesus Christ are together with his soul and his divine nature present under the form of the bread and wine. This takes place in virtue of that natural union and concomitancy according to which the flesh and blood of our risen Lord are constantly united, so that under either of the forms as much is contained as under both. By the consecration of the bread and wine, a conversion of the substance of both into the substance of the body and blood of Christ is effected; which conversion the church hath very properly denominated transubstantiation. It is on this account that the bread and wine are to have (latræ cultus) divine worship paid to them.

On the subject of the General Councils, see L'Abbé Baronius, Nat. Alexander, Berti, Fleury, Du Pin, Mosheim, Jortin, and Grier.

Whatever may be said in favour of general councils, their utility has been doubted by some of the wisest men. Dr. Jortin says, "they have been too much extolled by Papists, and by some Protestants. They were a collection of men who were frail and fallible. Some of those councils were not assemblies of pious and learned divines, but cabals, the majority of which were quarrelsome, factious, domineering, dishonest prelates, who wanted to compel men to approve all their opinions, of which they themselves had no clear conceptions, and to anathematize and oppress those who would not implicitly submit to their determinations."—Jortin's Works, vol. vii., charge 2.

COUNCILS, Provincial or Occasional, have been numerous. At Aix la Chapelle, A.D. 816, a council was held for regulating the canons of cathedral churches. The council of Savonnières, in 859, was the first which gave the title of Most Christian King to the King of France; but it did not become the peculiar appellation of that sovereign till 1469. Of Troyes, in 887, to decide the disputes about the imperial dignity. The second council of Troyes, 1107, restrains the clergy from marrying. The council of Clermont, in 1095. The first crusade was determined in this council. The bishops had yet the precedence of cardinals. In this assembly the name of Pope was for the first time given to the head of the church, exclusively of the bishops, who used to assume that title. Here also, Hugh, archbishop of Lyons, obtained of the Pope a confirmation of the primacy of his see over that of Sens. The council of Rheims, summoned by Eugenius III. in 1148, called an assembly of Cistercian Gaul, in which advowes, or patrons of churches, are prohibited from taking more than ancient fees, upon pain of deprivation and ecclesiastical burial. Bishops, deacons, sub-deacons, monks, and nuns, are restrained from marrying. In this council the doctrine of the Trinity was decided; but upon separation the Pope called a congregation, in which the cardinals pretended they had no right to judge of doctrinal points; that this was the privilege peculiar to the Pope. The council of Sutrium, in 1046, wherein three popes who had assumed the chair were deposed. The council of Clarendon in England, against Becket, held in 1164. The council of Lombez, in the country of Albigeois, in 1200, occasioned by some disturbances on account of the Albigenses; a crusade was formed on this account, and an army sent to extirpate them. Innocent III. spirited up this barbarous war. Dominic was the apostle, the Count of Toulouse the victim, and Simon, Count of Montfort, the conductor or chief. The council of Paris in 1210, in which Aristotle's metaphysics were condemned to the flames, lest the refinements of that philosopher should have a bad tendency on men's minds, by applying these subjects to religion. The council of Piza, begun March the 2d, 1409, in which Benedict XIII. and Gregory XII. were deposed. Another council, sometimes called general, held at Piza in 1505. Lewis XII. of France, assembled a national council at Tours (being highly disgusted with the Pope), 1510, where was present the cardinal De Gurce, deputed by the emperor; and it was then agreed to convene a general council at Piza. Murray's Hist. Relig.

COURAGE is that quality of the mind that enables men to encounter difficulties and dangers. Natural courage is that which arises chiefly from constitution; moral or spiritual is that which is produced from principle, or a sense of duty. Courage and Fortitude are often used as synonymous, but they may be distinguished thus: fortitude is firmness of mind that supports pain; courage is active fortitude, that meets dangers, and attempts to repel them. See FORTITUDE. Courage, says Addison, that grows from constitution, very often forsakes a man when he has occasion for it; and when it is only a kind of instinct in the soul, it breaks out on all occasions, without judgment or discretion; but that courage which arises from a sense of duty, and from a fear of offending Him that made us, always acts in a uniform manner, and according to the dictates of right reason.

COURTS, CHURCH, among the Presbyterians, those ecclesiastical associations of ministers and elders, consisting of sessions, presbyteries, synods, and the general assembly, which in Scotland are considered as forming the perfection of church government and discipline. Each subordinate court takes cognizance of ecclesiastical matters within its own bounds; and from each there is an appeal to that which is above it in order, till the matter is carried before the General Assembly, which is the supreme court, and the decision of which is final.

COURT, SPIRITUAL, a seat of ecclesiastical judgment for the administration of justice in ecclesiastical matters. In England there are six spiritual courts.

1. The Archdeacon's Court, which is the lowest, and is held in such places where the Archdeacon, either by prescription or composition, has jurisdiction in spiritual or ecclesiastical causes within his archdeaconry. The Judge of this court is called the official of the archdeaconry.

2. The Consistory Courts of the archbishops and bishops of every diocese, held in their cathedral churches, for trial of all ecclesiastical causes within the diocese. The bishop's chancellor or commissary is the judge.

3. The Prerogative Court, held at Doctors' Commons, in London, in which all testaments and last wills are proved, and administrations upon the estates of intestates granted, where the party dies beyond seas or within his province, leaving bona notabilia.

4. The Archbishop's Court (so called because anciently held in the arched church of St. Mary, in Cheapside, London), is that which has jurisdiction upon appeal in all ecclesiastical causes, except what belong to the Prerogative Court. The judge is the official principal of the archbishop.

5. The Court of Peculiars, of the Archbishop of Canterbury, subservient to, and in connexion with, that of the Archbishops.

6. The Court of Delegates, so called because the judges are delegated and set in virtue of the King's commission, under the Great Seal, pro hac vice, upon appeals to the King on ecclesiastical matters.

These courts proceed according to the civil and canon laws, by citation libel or articles, answer upon oath, proofs by witnesses and presumptions, definitive sentence without a jury, and by excommunication for contempt of sentence. In times of intolerance many acts of the most cruel enormity were committed in these courts.

COVENANT, in ordinary life, a contract or agreement between two or more parties on certain terms. In theology, it is used either in the scriptural, or in a systematic and popular acceptation.

1. In the Scriptures, when employed to designate a transaction between God and man, it uniformly denotes an arrangement, disposition, or institution, according to which the divine favour is dispensed to those with whom it is made. It is represented, not as a contract or bargain, in virtue of which, on the ground of something done by man, its blessings are to be communicated; but as a free and voluntary constitution on the part of Jehovah, consisting of a deed or grant of blessings, and the particular mode or tenure of their conveyance. Besides minor arrangements of this description, the Bible exhibits two primary covenants or dispensations, Gal. v. 24—26, which it denominates the first and second, Heb. viii. 7, and the old and new covenants, verse 13. Of these, the first or old covenant is expressly stated to be that which God made with the children of Israel, when he took them to be a peculiar people to himself, and is the same that is commonly called the Mosaic or Sinaitic Covenant, because given to Moses on Mount Sinai. It was a covenant of peculiarity, by which the whole of the Israelites became what no other nation of this world, before or since, has been—the peculiar people of God, or a kingdom governed immediately by God, and whose visible rulers and judges were to have no legislative power, but were to act merely as vicegerents of Jehovah, and execute his laws. The great moral code, which is binding on all mankind, at all times, and under all circumstances, and the specific enactments of which are only so many expressions of that love to God and man which is essential to the well-being of creation, was laid as the basis of this constitution, and on this account it is frequently called the law: regular forms of divine worship were appointed; a regular priesthood separated for its performance; and the requisite civil and political institutes ordained. The whole, while admirably adapted to answer every purpose of existing legislation and government, had a prospective or prefigurative reference to a future and superior dispensation; or the second and new covenant, which was instituted by the Lord Jesus Christ, ratified by the shedding of his blood, and is the gracious charter or instrument according to which God has revealed it to be his pleasure to dispense the sovereign blessings of his mercy to sinners of all nations under heaven. Between these two dispensations there are several striking and important points of contrast. The former was national: the latter does not regard any nation more than another. The former was typical; the latter is antitypical. The former was temporary; the latter is eternal. The former could only secure the enjoyment of Canaan; the latter secures the heavenly inheritance. The former could not bestow justification or eternal life: this the latter was specially instituted to do. The former did not preserve from apostasy, or render obedience certain; the latter does. See Heb. viii. 6—13.

But though the Christian economy may be termed the second or new covenant, in relation to the posteriority of its establishment to that of the first and old covenant, it has nevertheless a retrospective bearing and influence, not only on those who lived under the Mosaic institution, but even to the very period of the fall; and according to the plan of its constitution, formed in the divine mind from eternity, and gradually developed in promises and figures, sinners who believed the testimony of God, and confided in his mercy, were absolved from guilt, and admitted to the enjoyment of the divine favour. Gal. iii. 15—17; Rom. iii. 25, 26; Heb. ix. 15.

2. Besides this view, which the Scriptures furnish of the covenants, there is another which has been taken by systematic divines, though they are not altogether agreed with respect to it. Some speak of two, and others of three covenants. The latter position, which is most extensively propagated, holds forth—1. A covenant of works, which it is maintained was made with Adam on his creation, in virtue of which he was constituted the federal head of the human race, and which, as the law of Nature, was to be binding on all his posterity. Of this covenant, that made at Sinai is considered to have been merely a republication. 2. A covenant of redemption, or a covenant-engagement entered into by the Father and the Son from eternity, with a view to the redemption of the elect, agreeably to which the Father constituted the Son their Head and Redeemer; and the Son voluntarily undertook their redemption, and became their sponsor or surety. 3. A covenant of grace, which is a compact or agreement between God and elect sinners, in which God, on his part, declares his free good-will concerning eternal salvation, and every thing relative thereto, freely to be given to those in covenant, by and for the sake of the Mediator Christ; and man, on his part, consenting to that goodness by a sincere faith. See Witatus, Boston, and Strong, on the Covenants; and Russell's Familiar Survey of the Old and New Covenants.

COVENANT, in ecclesiastical history, denotes a contract or convention agreed to by the Scotch, in the year 1638, for maintaining their religion free from innovation. In 1581, the general assembly drew up a confession of faith, or national covenant, condemning episcopal government, which was signed by James I., and which he enjoined on all his subjects. It was again subscribed in 1590 and 1596. The subscription was renewed in 1638, and the subscribers engaged by oath to maintain religion in the same state as it was in 1580, and to reject all innovations introduced since that time. This oath annexed to the confession of faith, received the name of the Covenant.

COVENANT, Solemn League and, a compact established in the year 1643, which formed a bond of union between Scotland and England. It was sworn and subscribed by many in both nations, who hereby solemnly abjured popery and prelacy, and combined together for their mutual defence against the imposition of these evils. It was approved by the parliament and assembly at Westminster, and ratified by the general assembly of the Kirk of Scotland, in 1645. King Charles I. disapproved of it when he surrendered himself to the Scotch army, in 1646; but in 1650, Charles II. declared his approbation both of this and the national covenant by a solemn oath; and in August of the same year made a further declaration at Dunfermline to the same purpose, which was also renewed at Scone, in 1651. The League was ratified by parliament in this year, and subscription to it required by every member, without which the constitution of the parliament was declared null and void. It produced a serious distraction in the subsequent history of that country, and was voted illegal by parliament and provision made against it. Encyc. Brit.

COVENANTERS, those who subscribed to the covenant of 1638. The name is still usually given in Ireland to the Cameronians, which see.

COVENANTING, personal, a solemn transaction by which many pious and devoted Christians have dedicated themselves to the service of God. Such bonds or covenants, written and subscribed with their own hands, have been found among their papers after their death, and it cannot be denied, that most of them are exceedingly edifying; but instances have also been known of persons abusing this custom for purposes of superstition and self-righteousness, and of some who have gone so far as to write and sign such a document with their own blood.

COVETOUSNESS, an unreasonable desire after that we have not, with a dissatisfaction with what we have. It may further be considered as consisting in, 1. An anxious carking care about the things of this world. 2. A rapacity in getting. 3. Too frequently includes sinister and illegal ways of obtaining wealth. 4. A tenaciousness in keeping. It is a vice which marvellously prevails upon and insinuates into the heart of man, and for these reasons: it often bears a near resemblance to virtue; brings with it many plausible reasons; and raises a man to a state of reputation on account of his riches. "There cannot be," as one observes, "a more unreasonable sin than this. It is unjust; only to covet, is to wish to be unjust. It is cruel; the covetous must harden themselves against a thousand plaintive voices. It is ungrateful; such forget their former obligations and their present supporters. It is foolish; it destroys reputation, breaks the rest, unfits for the performance of duty, and is a contempt of God himself: it is unprecedented in all our examples of virtue mentioned in the Scripture. One, indeed, spoke unadvisedly with his lips; another cursed and swore; a third was in a passion; and a fourth committed adultery; but which of the saints ever lived in a habit of covetousness? Lastly, it is idolatry, Col. iii. 5, the idolatry of the heart; where, as in a temple, the miserable wretch excludes God, sets up gold instead of him, and places that confidence in it which belongs to the Great Supreme alone." Let those who live in the habitual practice of it consider the judgments that have been inflicted on such characters, Josh. vii. 21; Acts v.; the misery with which it is attended; the curse such persons are to society; the denunciations and cautions respecting it in the Holy Scripture; and how effectually it bars men from God, from happiness, and from heaven. Scott's Essays, 72, 73; South's Sermon, vol. iv. ser. 1; *Robinson's Mor. CREATION. See COSMOGONY.

CREDULITY, the belief of any proposition without sufficient evidence of its truth.

CREED, a form of words in which the articles of faith are comprehended. It is derived from the Latin credo (I believe), with which the apostles' creed begins. In the Eastern Church a summary of this sort was called μαθημα (the lesson), because it was learned by the catechumens; γραφη (the writing), or κανων (the rule). But the most common name in the Greek Church was συμβολον, or symbol, which term has also passed into the West. Hence creeds and confessions are commonly called symbolical books.

The most ancient form of creeds is that which goes under the name of the Apostles' Creed (see below); besides this, there are several other ancient forms and scattered remains of creeds to be met with in the primitive records of the church; as, 1. The form of apostolical doctrine collected by Origen.—2. A fragment of a creed preserved by Tertullian.—3. A remnant of a creed in the works of Cyprian.—4. A creed composed by Gregory Thaumaturgus for the use of his own church.—5. The creed of Lucian, the martyr.—6. The creed of the apostolical constitutions. Besides these scattered remains of the ancient creeds, there are extant some perfect forms, as those of Jerusalem, Cesarea, Antioch, &c.

CREED, APOSTLES', is a formula or summary of the Christian faith, drawn up, according to Rufinus, by the apostles themselves; who, during their stay at Jerusalem, soon after our Lord's ascension, agreed upon this creed as a rule of faith. Baronius and others conjecture that they did not compose it till the second year of Claudius, a little before their dispersion; but there are many reasons which induce us to question whether the apostles composed any such creed. For, 1. Neither St. Luke, nor any other writer before the fifth century, makes any mention of an assembly of the apostles for composing a creed.—2. The fathers of the first three centuries, in disputing against the heretics, endeavour to prove that the doctrine contained in this creed was the same which the apostles taught; but they never pretend that the apostles composed it.—3. If the apostles had made this creed, it would have been the same in all churches and in all ages; and all authors would have cited it after the same manner. But the case is quite otherwise. In the second and third ages of the church there were as many creeds as authors; and the same author sets down the creed after a different manner in several places of his works; which is an evidence that there was not, at that time, any creed reputed to be the apostles'. In the fourth century, Rufinus compares together the three ancient creeds of the churches of Aquileia, Rome, and the East, which differ very considerably. Besides, these creeds differed not only in the terms and expressions, but even in the articles, some of which were omitted in one or other of them; such as those of the descent into hell, the communion of the saints, and the life everlasting. From all which it may be gathered, that though this creed may be said to be that of the apostles, in regard to the doctrines contained therein, yet it cannot be referred to them as the authors of it. Its great antiquity, however, may be inferred from hence, that the whole form, as it now stands in the English liturgy, is to be found in the works of Ambrose and Rufinus; the former of whom flourished in the third, and the latter in the fourth century. The primitive Christians did not publicly recite the creed, except at baptisms, which, unless in cases of necessity, were only at Easter and Whitsuntide. The constant repenting of it was not introduced into the church till the end of the fifth century; about which time Peter Gnaphius, bishop of Antioch, prescribed the recital of it every time divine service was performed. See King's History of the Apostles' Creed; and Barrow's Exposition of it in his Works, vol. ii.

CREED, ATHANASIAN, a formulary of confession of faith, long supposed to have been drawn up by Athanasius, bishop of Alexandria, in the fourth century, to justify himself against the calumnies of his Arian enemies; but it is now generally allowed not to have been his. Dr. Waterland ascribes it to Hilary, bishop of Arles. This creed obtained in France about A.D. 850, and was received in Spain and Germany about 180 years later. As to our own country, we have clear proofs of its being sung alternately in our churches in the tenth century. It was in common use in some parts of Italy in 960, and was received at Rome about 1014. As to the Greek and Oriental Churches, it has been questioned whether they have ever received it, though some writers are of a contrary persuasion. The episcopal churches of America have rejected it. As to the matter of it, it is given as a summary of the true orthodox faith. Unhappily, however, it has proved a fruitful source of unprofitable controversy. See Dr. Waterland's Critical History of it.

CREED, NICENE, a formulary of Christian faith; so called, because it is a paraphrase of that creed which was made at the first general council of Nice. This latter was drawn up by the second general council of Constantinople, A.D. 381, and therefore might be more properly styled the Constantinopolitan Creed. The creed was carried by a majority, and admitted into the church as a barrier against Arius and his followers.

The three creeds above mentioned are used in the public offices of the Church of England, and subscription to them is required of all the established clergy. Subscription to these was also required of the dissenting teachers by the toleration act; but from which they are now relieved by 19 Geo. III.

CRIME, a voluntary breach of any known law. Faults result from human weakness, being transgressions of the rules of duty. Crimes proceed from the wickedness of the heart, being actions against the rules of nature. See PUNISHMENT and SIN.

CRISP, DR., a divine of the seventeenth century. He was fond of expressions which alarm, and paradoxes which astonish; and perplexed himself much about the divine purposes. He did not distinguish, as he ought, between God's secret will in his decrees, and his revealed will in his covenant and promises. The root of his error seems to be this:—he viewed the union between Christ and the believer to be of such a kind as actually to make a saviour of the sinner, and a sinner of the Saviour. He speaks as if God considered the sinner as doing and suffering what Christ did and suffered; and Christ as having committed their sins, and as being actually guilty of them. See ANTINOMIANS and NEONOMIANS. Crisp's Sermons, edited by Dr. Gill; and Bennett's History of Dissenters, vol. i., p. 400.

CRITICISM. See BIBLICAL CRITICISM.

CROSIER, a tall staff of silver or gold, curved at the upper end, which is carried before bishops, abbots, and abbesses, as an ensign expressive of their dignity, while they are exercising the functions of their office; and the figure of which is also borne in their coat of arms. When bestowing the blessing upon the people, they take the staff into their own hands. It was originally a shepherd's crook, the bishops being regarded as the pastors of their dioceses. By degrees the humble emblem became highly adorned, and was made of costly materials. Artists like Benvenuto Cellini and Giovanni de Bologna were employed to make it. The investiture of the bishop is indicated by the delivery of the crozier. Some say that the crozier was originally only a simple staff, which, from the earliest times, has been given as an emblem of authority to judges, kings, &c. In conformity to this explanation, St. Isidore says that bishops bear the staff because they have the right to correct the erring, and the duty to support the weak. The excess of splendour lavished in later times upon this instrument gave occasion to the following satirical lines:—

"In ancient times, as I have been told,
The crozier was wood, and the bishop was gold;
But now I perceive, without being told,
The bishop is wood, and the crozier is gold."

CROISTERS, a religious order, founded in honour of the invention or discovery of the cross by the Empress Helena. They were, till of late, dispersed in several parts of Europe, particularly in the Low Countries, France, and Bohemia; those of Italy were suppressed even before the late revolutions. These religious follow the rule of St. Augustine. They had in England the name of Crouched Friars.

CROSS, one straight body laid at any angle upon another; the ensign or emblem of the Christian religion, as being a representation of the instrument of punishment on which Jesus Christ suffered death from the Jews; the form in which many churches and cathedrals are built. The cross of the ancients was simply a piece of wood, fastened across a tree or upright post, on which were exe-executed criminals of the very worst class. After the crucifixion of Jesus, and the extension of the Christian religion, the cross was assumed as the ensign of his followers. The cross was used emblematically before the Christian era. Upon a multitude of medals and ancient monuments are to be found crosses placed in the hands of statues of Victory, and of figures of emperors. It was also placed upon a globe, which, ever since the days of Augustus, has been the sign of the empire of the world, and the image of Victory. The shields, the cuirasses, the helmets, the imperial cap, were all thus decorated. The cross has also been often stamped upon the reverses of money, as is proved by the old English game, cross and pile. The coins struck at Constantinople, and those of the Franks from the time of Clovis, were also thus marked. Examples of these are given in the dissertation by Duncange, "Sur les Medailles Byzantines," and in the treatise by Le Blanc, "Sur les Monnaies de France." The cross is now the universal Christian emblem, being used upon the arms and banners of the soldier, the vestments of the priest, and in the armorial bearings of nobles. The forms of cathedrals, and often the patterns of their pavements, are adapted to the representation of the cross, which is also sculptured and elevated upon tombs and sepulchres. Sculptured crosses of various descriptions, elevated upon handsome pedestals, were formerly erected in cemeteries and market-places, to designate peculiar events; as the queen's crosses at Northampton, Waltham, &c. Very fine ones are still to be seen in many parts of Great Britain, and particularly in Ireland. In order to understand the meaning of the sign of the cross among the first Christians, it must be kept in mind, that the cross was in their time an instrument of infamous punishment, like the gallows at present, and that they assumed this sign to show that they gloried in being the followers of Christ, notwithstanding the infamy which had been attempted to be thrown upon him by the manner of his execution. The custom of making the sign of the cross in memory of Jesus, may be traced to the third century of our era. Constantine the Great had crosses erected in public places, in palaces and churches. This emperor is generally supposed to have been the first who ordered the cross to be used as the sign or emblem under which he would fight and conquer, in remembrance of the miraculous appearance of a cross in the heavens. A certain legend relates that, before his battle with Maxentius, a cross appeared to him, bearing the words Τοῦτο νικά, (Under this thou shalt conquer, In hoc signo vinces,) in consequence of which he had a standard made bearing this image, and called labarum. It was customary, in his time, to paint a cross at the entrance of a house, to denote that it belonged to a Christian. Subsequently, the churches were, for the greater part, built in the form of this instrument. But it did not become an object of adoration until the Empress Helena (Constantine's mother) found a cross in Palestine, which was believed to be the one on which Christ suffered, and conveyed a part of it to Constantinople. This is the origin of the festival of the finding of the cross, which the Catholic Church celebrates on the 3rd of May. Standards and weapons were now ornamented with it; and the Emperor Heraclius thought he had recovered the palladium of his empire, when he gained possession of a piece of the true cross in 628, which had fallen into the hands of the Persians in 616. In memory of this event, the festival of the exaltation of the cross was instituted, Heraclius having caused the cross to be erected at Jerusalem, on Mount Calvary. This festival is celebrated on the 14th of September. It is remarkable how this holy relic became multiplied. Numberless churches possessed some part of it, the miraculous power of which was said to have been proved by the most astonishing facts; and many persons actually believed that it could be infinitely divided without decreasing. It was in vain that the Iconoclasts, who condemned the worship of images, attempted to overthrow the adoration of the cross. The crucifix was considered as a principal object of worship, in preference to the images of the saints, and in compliance with the teachings of John of Damascus, was adored, during the seventh century, in all the churches of the East. That the West also ascribed a mysterious power to this symbol, is evident from the use which was made of it in the trials "by the judgment of God" in the middle ages. There never has existed any sign which has been so often repeated in works of art as the cross. This may be ascribed, in part, to its form being applicable to many more purposes than those of other emblems; such, for instance, as the crescent. The distinguishing cypher of the Jesuits is IHS, which signifies In hac cruce salus, or Jesus, in Greek letters, and abbreviated. Crosses have been the badge of numberless orders, military and civil. To make the sign of the cross is thought by many people, in Catholic countries, a defence against evil spirits, evil influences, &c. The Greeks make this sign constantly, hardly taking a glass of raky without signing the cross over it. In Russia, the common people never commit any act of gross wickedness without doing the same. Catholic bishops, archbishops, abbots, and abbesses wear a small golden cross. The Catholic benediction is generally performed by making the sign of the cross over the object. There are different kinds of crosses, as the common cross, †, St. Andrew's cross, ×, &c. Two sorts of crosses are used for the forms of churches, the Greek and the Latin. The Greek cross has its arms at right angles, and all of equal length; whereas the Latin cross has one of its limbs much longer than the other three. Bramante originally designed St. Peter's for a Latin cross; Michael Angelo reduced it to the proportions of the Greek cross; but Carlo Maderno again elongated it to the original dimensions of Bramante. The cathedral of St. Paul's, London, is a Latin cross, with its base spread by a sort of second transept, which increases the breadth of the western front.

Cross, in baptism; in the administration of the ordinance of baptism, the practice of making the sign of the cross on the forehead of the person baptized, was adopted at an early period, though not enjoined by any command, or sanctioned by any example, in Scripture. The use of the cross, indeed, was very frequent in the primitive ages of Christianity. Such was the respect paid to it, that it formed, in one mode or another, a distinguishing part of the civil and religious ceremonies of those times. The first Christian writer who mentions it, in connexion with baptism, is Tertullian, who wrote after the middle of the second century. This writer says, (De Cov. Mil. c. 2,) that "at every setting out or entry upon business, whenever we come in or go out from any place, when we dress for a journey, when we go into a bath, when we go to meat, when the candles are brought in, when we lie down or sit down, and whatever business we have, we make on our foreheads the sign of the cross;" and speaking of baptism, in his treatise De Carn. Resur., he says, "the flesh is signed that the soul may be fortified."

CROSS-BEARER, (porte-croix, cruciger.) in the Roman Catholic church, the chaplain of an archbishop, or a primate, who bears a cross before him on solemn occasions. The pope has the cross borne before him every where; a patriarch any where out of Rome; and primates, metropolitans, and those who have a right to the pallium, throughout their respective jurisdictions. Gregory XI. forbade all patriarchs and prelates to have it borne in the presence of cardinals. A prelate wears a single cross, a patriarch a double cross, and the pope a triple one on his arms.

CRUCIFIX, a cross, upon which the body of Christ is fastened in effigy, used by the Roman Catholics, to excite in their minds a strong idea of our Saviour's passion.

CRUCIFIXION, the death or punishment of the cross, which was the most dreadful of all others, both for the shame and pain of it; and so scandalous, that it was inflicted as the last mark of detestation upon the vilest of the people. It was the punishment of robbers and murderers, provided that they were slaves too; but otherwise, if they were free, and had the privilege of the city of Rome, this was then thought a prostitution of that honour, and too infamous a punishment for such a one, let his crimes be what they would. The form of a cross being such as has been already described, (see Cross.) the body of the criminal was fastened to the upright piece by nailing the feet to it, and on the other transverse piece generally by nailing the hands on each side. Now, because these parts of the body, being the instruments of action and motion, are provided by nature with a much greater quantity of nerves than others have occasion for; and because all sensation is performed by the spirit contained in the nerves; it will follow, as Stanhope observes, that wherever they abound, the sense of pain must needs in proportion be more quick and tender. The Jews confess, indeed, that they crucified people in their nation, but deny that they inflicted this punishment upon any one alive. They first put them to death, and then fastened them to the cross, either by the hands or neck. But there are indisputable proofs of their crucifying men frequently alive. The worshippers of Baal-peor, and the king of Ai, were hung up alive; as were also the descendants of Saul, who were put into the hands of the Gibeonites. 2 Sam. xxi. 9.

Before crucifixion, the criminal was generally scourged with cords; sometimes little bones, or pieces of bones, were tied to these scourges, so that the condemned person might suffer more severely. It was also a custom, that he who was to be crucified should bear his own cross to the place of execution. After this manner, we find Christ was compelled to bear his cross; and as he sunk under the burden, Simon the Cyrenian was constrained to bear it after him and with him. But whereas it is generally supposed that our Lord bore the whole cross, i. e. the long and transverse part both, this seems to be a thing impossible; and therefore Lipsius, (in his treatise De Supplicio Crucis.) has set the matter in a true light, when he tells us that Jesus only carried the transverse beam, because the long beam, or the body of the cross, was either fixed in the ground before, or made ready to be set up as soon as the prisoner came; and from hence he observes, that painters are very much mistaken in the description of our Saviour's carrying the whole cross. There were several ways of crucifying; sometimes the criminal was fastened with cords to a tree, sometimes he was crucified with his head downwards. This way, it is said, Peter chose, out of respect to his master, Jesus Christ, not thinking himself worthy to be crucified like him; though the common way of crucifying was by fastening the criminal with nails, one through each hand, and one through both feet, or one through each of them; for this was not always performed in the same manner. The ancients sometimes represent Jesus Christ crucified with four nails, and sometimes with three. The criminal was fixed to the cross quite naked; and in all probability the Saviour of sinners was not used with any greater tenderness than others upon whom this punishment was inflicted. The text of the gospel shows clearly that Jesus Christ was fastened to the cross with nails; and the Psalmist (Ps. xxii. 16.) had foretold long before, that they should pierce his hands and his feet; but there are great disputes concerning the number of these nails. The Greeks represent our Saviour as fastened to the cross with four nails; in which particular, Gregory of Tours agrees with them, one on each hand and foot. But several are of opinion that our Saviour's hands and feet were pierced with three nails only, viz. one on each hand, and one through both his feet; and the custom of the Latins is rather for this last opinion; for the generality of the old crucifixes made in the Latin church have only three nails. Nonnus thinks that our Saviour's arms were besides bound fast to the cross with chains; and St. Hilary speaks of the cords wherewith he was tied to it. Sometimes they who were fastened upon the cross lived a good while in that condition. St. Andrew is believed to have continued three days alive upon it. Eusebius speaks of certain martyrs in Egypt who were kept upon the cross till they were starved to death. Pilate was amazed at Jesus Christ's dying so soon, because naturally he must have lived longer, if it had not been in his power to have laid down his life, and to take it up again. The thighs of the two thieves, who were crucified with our Saviour, were broken, in order to hasten their death, that their bodies might not remain upon the cross on the Sabbath day, John xix. 31, 33; and to comply with the law of Moses, which forbids the bodies to be left there after sunset. But among other nations, they were suffered to remain upon the cross a long time. Sometimes they were devoured alive by birds and beasts of prey. Guards were appointed, to observe that none of their friends or relations should take them down and bury them. The Roman soldiers, who had crucified Jesus Christ and the two thieves, continued near the crosses till the bodies were taken down and buried.

CRUDEN, ALEXANDER, compiler of the Concordance to the Holy Scriptures, was born at Aberdeen, in 1704, and educated at the Marischal College in that city, where he took his degrees, but declined to enter upon the ministry because of the patronage act, which set aside the power of popular elections. He came to London in 1722, and was employed at Ware, in Herts, as a classical tutor to some young persons; after which, he went to the Isle of Man, in a similar capacity. In 1732, he took up his stated residence in London, and engaged as a corrector of the press, blending with this occupation the trade of a bookseller, which he carried on in a shop under the Royal Exchange. Here his literary attainments, indefatigable industry, and strict integrity, procured him the esteem of several persons eminent for their wealth and influence, through whose interference he obtained the appointment of bookseller to the queen, vacant by the death of Mr. Matthews. His Concordance first made its appearance in 1737, and was dedicated to her Majesty, Queen Caroline, consort of George II., who graciously accepted a copy of the work at the hand of the author, expressed her great satisfaction therewith, and declared her intention of remembering him, but lived only sixteen days after the presentation. Her death precluded the performance of her promise, and was a sore disappointment to poor Cruden, who became embarrassed in pecuniary difficulties, which compelled him to dispose of his stock in trade, abandon his shop, and he was eventually confined in an asylum for insane persons, at Bethnal Green. Recovering the use of his mental faculties, he returned to his former occupation of correcting the press; and was now usefully employed by printers, publishers, and authors, in seeing their works through the press. Under his inspection, several editions of the Greek and Roman classics were published with great accuracy. His manners were invariably simple and inoffensive; he was always to be trusted, and he performed his engagements with the strictest fidelity. In this way he passed fifteen years of his life, when he was again placed, for a short time, viz. from the 12th to the 29th of September, 1753, under restraint, in a house at Chelsea. Though liberated after a confinement of only seventeen days, his conduct was for some time marked by great eccentricity, which, though it abundantly characterised the moral and benevolent cast of his mind, it is nevertheless painful to narrate. In 1761 he published the second edition of his Concordance, which is unquestionably the best book of the kind extant in our language; and he soon after procured a pardon for an unhappy fellow-creature who had been condemned to death for the forgery of a seaman's will. He was a member of the congregational church in Great St. Helen's, under the pastoral care of Dr. Guyse, whom he styled his "faithful and beloved pastor." He lived to see a third edition of his valuable Concordance published in 1769; after which he visited Aberdeen, his native place, where he continued about a year, and then returned to London, where he closed his days, at his lodgings in Camden Street, Islington, on the 1st of November, 1770, aged 70, being found dead in a praying posture. Among the many excellences of his character, his liberality was none of the least; and the proceeds of the second and third editions of his Concord- ance, (amounting to eight hundred pounds,) enabled him to gratify it to a considerable extent. "Notwithstanding his natural infirmities," says Mr. Alexander Chalmers, "we cannot but venerate his character; he was a man whom neither infirmity nor neglect could debase; who sought consolation where alone it could be found; whose sorrows served to instruct him in the distresses of others; and who employed his prosperity to relieve those who, in every sense, were ready to perish."—Gen. Biog. Dict.

CRUSADE may be applied to any war undertaken on pretence of defending the cause of religion, but has been chiefly used for the expeditions of the Christians against the infidels for the conquest of Palestine.

These expeditions commenced A. D. 1096. The foundation of them was a superstitious veneration for those places where our Saviour performed his miracles, and accomplished the work of man's redemption. Jerusalem had been taken and Palestine conquered by Omar. This proved a considerable interruption to the pilgrims, who flocked from all quarters to perform their devotions at the holy sepulchre. They had, however, still been allowed this liberty, on paying a small tribute to the Saracen caliphs, who were not much inclined to molest them. But, in 1064, this city changed its masters. The Turks took it from the Saracens; and, being much more fierce and barbarous, the pilgrims now found they could no longer perform their devotions with the same safety. An opinion was about this time also prevalent in Europe, which made these pilgrimages much more frequent than formerly: it was imagined that the 1000 years mentioned in Rev. xx. were fulfilled: that Christ was soon to make his appearance in Palestine to judge the world; and consequently, that journeys to that country were in the highest degree meritorious, and even absolutely necessary. The multitudes of pilgrims who now flocked to Palestine, meeting with a very rough reception from the Turks, filled all Europe with complaints against those infidels, who profaned the holy city, and derided the sacred mysteries of Christianity even in the place where they were fulfilled. Pope Gregory VII. had formed a design of uniting all the princes of Christendom against the Mohammedans; but his exorbitant encroachments upon the civil powers of princes had created him so many enemies, and rendered his schemes so suspicious, that he was not able to make great progress in his undertaking. The work was reserved for a meaner instrument. Peter, commonly called the Hermit, a native of Amiens in Picardy, had made the pilgrimage to Jerusalem; and, being deeply affected with the dangers to which that act of piety now exposed the pilgrims, as well as with the oppression under which the eastern Christians now laboured, formed the bold, and, in all appearance, impracticable design of leading into Asia, from the farthest extremities of the West, armies sufficient to subdue those potent and warlike nations that now held the holy land in slavery. He proposed his scheme to Pope Martin II., who, prudently resolving not to interpose his authority till he saw a probability of success, summoned at Placentia a council of 4000 ecclesiastics and 30,000 seculars. As no hall could be found large enough to contain such a multitude, the assembly was held in a plain. Here the pope himself, as well as Peter, harangued the people, representing the dismal situation of their brethren in the East, and the indignity offered to the Christian name in allowing the holy city to remain in the hands of the infidels. These speeches were so agreeable to those who heard them, that the whole multitude suddenly and violently declared for the war, and solemnly devoted themselves to perform this service, which they believed to be meritorious in the sight of God. But though Italy seemed to have embraced the design with ardour, Martin thought it necessary, in order to obtain perfect success, to engage the greater and more warlike nations in the same enterprise. Having, therefore, exhorted Peter to visit the chief cities and sovereigns of Christendom, he summoned another council at Clermont in Auvergne. The fame of this great and pious design being now universally diffused, procured the attendance of the greatest prelates, nobles, and princes; and when the pope and the hermit renewed their pathetic exhortations, the whole assembly, as if impelled by immediate inspiration, exclaimed with one voice, "It is the will of God!" These words were deemed so much the effect of a divine impulse, that they were employed as the signal of rendezvous and battle in all future exploits of these adventurers. Men of all ranks now flew to arms with the utmost ardour, and a cross was affixed to their right shoulder by all who enlisted in this holy enterprise. At this time Europe was sunk in the most profound ignorance and superstition. The ecclesiastics had gained the greatest ascendancy over the human mind; and the people, who committed the most horrid crimes and disorders, knew of no other expiation than the observances imposed on them by their spiritual pastors. But amidst the abject superstition which now prevailed, the military spirit had also universally diffused itself; and, though not supported by art or discipline, was become the general passion of the nations governed by the feudal law. All the great lords possessed the right of peace and war. They were engaged in continual hostilities with one another. The open country was become a scene of outrage and disorder; the cities, still mean and poor, were neither guarded by walls nor protected by privileges. Every man was obliged to depend for safety on his own force or his private alliances; and valour was the only excellence which was held in esteem, or gave one man the pre-eminence above another. When all the particular superstitions, therefore, were here united in one great object, the ardour for private hostilities took the same direction; "and all Europe," as the Princess Anna Commena expresses it, "torn from its foundations, seemed ready to precipitate itself in one united body upon Asia."

All ranks of men now deeming the crusades the only road to heaven, were impatient to open the way with their swords to the holy city. Nobles, artisans, peasants, even priests, enrolled their names; and those who declined this service, were branded with the reproach of impiety or cowardice. The nobles were moved, by the romantic spirit of the age, to hope for opulent establishments in the East, the chief seat of arts and commerce at that time. In pursuit of these chimerical projects, they sold at low prices their ancient castles and inheritances, which had now lost all value in their eyes. The infirm and aged contributed to the expedition by presents and money, and many of them attended it in person, being determined, if possible, to breathe their last in sight of that city where their Saviour died for them. Even women, concealing their sex under the disguise of armour, attended the camp, and often forgot their duty still more by prostituting themselves to the army. The greatest criminals were forward in a service which they considered as an expiation for all crimes; and the most enormous disorders were, during the course of these expeditions, committed by men inured to wickedness, encouraged by example, and impelled by necessity. The adventurers were at last so numerous, that their sagacious leaders became apprehensive lest the greatness of the armament would be the cause of its own disappointment. For this reason they permitted an undisciplined multitude, computed at 300,000 men, to go before them under the command of Peter the Hermit, and Gautier or Walter, surnamed the moneyless, from his being a soldier of fortune. These took the road towards Constantinople, through Hungary and Bulgaria; and, trusting that Heaven, by supernatural assistance, would supply all their necessities, they made no provision for subsistence in their march. They soon found themselves obliged to obtain by plunder what they vainly expected from miracles; and the enraged inhabitants of the countries through which they passed, attacked the disorderly multitude, and slaughtered them without resistance. The more disciplined armies followed after; and, passing the straits of Constantinople, were mustered in the plains of Asia, and amounted in the whole to 700,000 men. The princes engaged in this first crusade were, Hugo, Count of Vermandois, brother to Philip I., King of France; Robert, Duke of Normandy; Robert, Earl of Flanders; Raimond, Earl of Toulouse and St. Giles; the celebrated Godfrey of Bouillon, Duke of Lorraine, with his brothers Baldwin and Eustace; Stephen, Earl of Chartres and Blois; Hugo, Count of St. Paul; with many other lords. The general rendezvous was at Constantinople. In this expedition Godfrey besieged and took the city of Nice. Jerusalem was taken by the confederated army, and Godfrey chosen king. The Christians gained the famous battle of Ascalon against the Sultan of Egypt, which put an end to the first crusade, but not to the spirit of crusading. The rage continued for near two centuries. The second crusade, in 1144, was headed by the Emperor Conrad III., and Louis VII., king of France. The emperor's army was either destroyed by the enemy, or perished through the treachery of Manuel the Greek Emperor; and the second army, through the unfaithfulness of the Christians of Syria, was forced to break up the siege of Damascus. The third crusade, in 1188, immediately followed the taking of Jerusalem by Saladin, the Sultan of Egypt. The princes engaged in this expedition were, the Emperor Frederic Barbarossa; Frederic, Duke of Suabia, his second son; Leopold, Duke of Austria; Berthold, Duke of Moravia; Herman, Marquess of Baden; the Counts of Nassau, Thuringia, Missen, and Holland; and above sixty other princes of the empire; with the Bishops of Besançon, Cambray, Munster, Osnaburg, Missen, Passau, Visburg, and several others. In this expedition the Emperor Frederic defeated the Sultan of Iconium: his son Frederic, joined by Guy Lusignan, King of Jerusalem, in vain endeavoured to take Acre or Ptolemais. During these transactions, Philip Augustus, King of France, and Richard I., King of England, joined the crusade, by which means the Christian army consisted of 300,000 fighting men; but great disputes happening between the kings of France and England, the former quitted the Holy Land, and Richard concluded a peace with Saladin. The fourth crusade was undertaken in 1195, by the Emperor Henry VI., after Saladin's death. In this expedition the Christians gained several battles against the infidels, took a great many towns, and were in the way of success, when the death of the emperor obliged them to quit the Holy Land, and return into Germany. The fifth crusade was published by Pope Innocent III., in 1198. Those engaged in it made fruitless efforts for the recovery of the Holy Land; for, though John de Neule, who commanded the fleet equipped in Flanders, arrived at Ptolemais a little after Simon of Montfort, Renard of Dampierre, and others, yet the plague destroying many of them, and the rest, either returning or engaging in the petty quarrels of the Christian princes, nothing was done; so that the Sultan of Aleppo easily defeated their troops in 1204. The sixth crusade began in 1228, in which the Christians took the town of Damietta, but were forced to surrender it again. In 1229 the Emperor Frederic made peace with the Sultan for ten years. About 1240, Richard, Earl of Cornwall, brother to Henry III., King of England, arrived in Palestine, at the head of the English crusade; but finding it most advantageous to conclude a peace, he re-embarked, and steered towards Italy. In 1244, the Karasians, being driven out of Turkey by the Tartars, broke into Palestine, and gave the Christians a general defeat near Gaza. The seventh crusade was headed, in 1249, by St. Lewis, who took the town of Damietta; but a sickness happening in the Christian army, the king endeavoured to retreat, in which, being pursued by the infidels, most of his army were miserably butchered, and himself and the nobility taken prisoners. A truce was agreed upon for ten years, and the king and lords set at liberty. The eighth crusade, in 1279, was headed by the same prince, who made himself master of the port and castle of Carthage in Africa; but dying a short time after, he left his army in a very ill condition. Soon after, the King of Sicily coming up with a good fleet, and joining Philip the Bold, son and successor of Lewis, the King of Tunis, after several engagements with the Christians, in which he was always worsted, desired peace, which was granted upon conditions advantageous to the Christians; after which both princes embarked to their own kingdoms. Prince Edward of England, who arrived at Tunis at the time of this treaty, sailed towards Ptolemais, where he landed a small body of 300 English and French, and hindered Bendochar from laying siege to Ptolemais; but being obliged to return to take possession of the crown of England, this crusade ended without contributing any thing to the recovery of the Holy Land. In 1291, the town of Acre or Ptolemais was taken and plundered by the Sultan of Egypt, and the Christians quite driven out of Syria. There has been no crusade since that period, though several Popes have attempted to stir up the Christians to such an undertaking; particularly Nicholas IV., in 1292, and Clement V., in 1311.

Though these crusades were effects of the most absurd superstition, they tended greatly to promote the good of Europe. Multitudes, indeed, were destroyed. M. Voltaire computes the people who perished in the different expeditions, at upwards of two millions. Many there were, however, who returned; and these having conversed so long with people who lived in a much more magnificent way than themselves, began to entertain some taste for a refined and polished way of life. Thus the barbarism in which Europe had been so long immersed, began to wear off soon after. The princes, also, who remained at home found means to avail themselves of the frenzy of the people. By the absence of such numbers of restless and martial adventurers, peace was established in their dominions. They also took the opportunity of annexing to their crowns many considerable fiefs, either by purchase or the extinction of heirs; and thus the mischiefs which must always attend feudal governments were considerably lessened.—With regard to the bad success of the crusaders, it was scarcely possible that any other thing could happen to them. The Emperors of Constantinople, instead of assisting, did all in their power to disconcert their schemes; they were jealous, and not without reason, of such an inundation of barbarians. Yet, had they considered their true interests, they would rather have assisted them, or at least stood neuter, than enter into alliances with the Turks. They followed the latter method, however, and were often of very great disservice to the western adventurers, which at last occasioned the loss of their city. But the worst enemies the crusaders had were their own internal feuds and dissensions. They neither could agree while marching together in armies with a view to conquest, nor could they unite their conquests under one government after they had made them. They set up three small states, one at Jerusalem, one at Antioch, and another at Edessa. These states, instead of assisting, made war upon each other, and on the Greek Emperors, and thus became an easy prey to the common enemy. The horrid cruelties they committed, too, must have inspired the Turks with the most invincible hatred against them, and made them resist with the greatest obstinacy. They were such as could have been committed only by barbarians inflamed with the most bigoted enthusiasm. When Jerusalem was taken, not only the numerous garrisons were put to the sword, but the inhabitants were massacred without mercy and without distinction. No age or sex was spared; not even sucking children. According to Voltaire, some Christians, who had been suffered by the Turks to live in that city, led the conquerors into the most private caves, where women had concealed themselves with their children, and not one of them was suffered to escape. What eminently shows the enthusiasm by which these conquerors were animated, is their behaviour after this terrible slaughter. They marched over heaps of dead bodies towards the holy sepulchre, and, while their hands were polluted with the blood of so many innocent persons, sung anthems to the common Saviour of mankind! Nay, so far did their religious enthusiasm overcome their fury, that these ferocious conquerors now burst into tears. If the absurdity and wickedness of their conduct can be exceeded by any thing, it must be by what follows. In 1204, the frenzy of crusading seized the children, who are ever ready to imitate what they see their parents engaged in. Their childish folly was encouraged by the monks and schoolmasters, and thousands of these innocents were conducted from the houses of their parents, on the superstitious interpretation of these words: "Out of the mouths of babes and sucklings hast thou perfected praise." Their base conductors sold a part of them to the Turks, and the rest perished miserably.—Hume's Hist. of England, vol. i. p. 292, &c.; and vol. ii. p. 280; Enc. Brit.; and Mosheim's Ecc. Hist.

CRYPTO-CALVINISTS, a name given, some time after the Reformation, to the favourers of Calvinism in Saxony, Denmark, Sweden, &c., on account of their secret attachment to the Genevan doctrine and discipline.

CULDEES, the members of a very ancient religious fraternity, whose principal seat was the island of Iona, or Icolmkill, one of the western islands of Scotland, but whose laborious missionary exertions were extended over considerable portions of Scotland, England, Wales, and Ireland, and in whose constitution we discover a simplicity of views and habits which necessarily lead us to associate them with the men of more primitive times. They owe their establishment to Columba, a native of Ireland, who, after proceeding to Scotland, and succeeding in the conversion of the northern Picts to Christianity, landed at Hii, or Iona, in the year 563, and received the island from the king of that people for the purpose of founding a monastery. Here he erected a seminary, in which he taught his disciples the Holy Scriptures, to the study of which he was himself devotedly attached; and when they were duly prepared, he sent them forth, with the holy book in their hand, to evangelize the dark and benighted regions which extended in every direction. They held no fellowship with the Church of Rome, and for many centuries maintained their ground against the attempted encroachments of that see. They rejected auricular confession, penance, and absolution; knew nothing of the chrism in baptism, or the rite of confirmation; and opposed the doctrine of the real presence, the worship of saints and angels, and the celibacy of the clergy, and works of supererogation. In the twelfth century their influence began to be overpowered by the force of popish superstition; but they resisted to the very last every effort that was made to incorporate their secluded establishment with the dominant hierarchy.

Their form of government was essentially Presbyterian. To the members of their synod, or assembly, was given the name of seniores, or elders, to whom, in their collective capacity, belonged the right of appointing and ordaining those who engaged in the ministerial or missionary office. To these, when settled in any particular place, was given the designation of bishop—a dignity which does not appear to have been in any respect different from that of presbyter or pastor. These bishops, to how great soever a distance they resided from Iona, were subject to the discipline of the college, with which they kept up a regular correspondence.

It is not known in what precise year the Culdees became extinct, but there is reason to believe, that, in the west of Scotland, they continued to exhibit a testimony on behalf of primitive truth in opposition to the corruption of Rome, till very near the period when the light of the Reformation was introduced into those northern parts of our island.

CURATE, the lowest degree in the Church of England; he who represents the incumbent of a church, parson, or vicar, and officiates in his stead: he is to be licensed and admitted by the bishop of the diocese, or by an ordinary having episcopal jurisdiction; and when a curate hath the approbation of the bishop, he usually appoints the salary too; and in such case, if he be not paid, the curate hath a proper remedy in the ecclesiastical court, by a sequestration of the profits of the benefice; but if the curate be not licensed by the bishop, he is put to his remedy at common law, where he must prove the agreement, &c. A curate, having no fixed estate in his curacy, not being instituted and inducted, may be removed at pleasure by the bishop, or incumbent. But there are perpetual curates as well as temporary, who are appointed where tithes are inappropriate, and no vicarage endowed; these are not removable, and the impropiators are obliged to find them; some whereof have certain portions of the tithes settled on them. Curates must subscribe the declaration according to the Act of Uniformity, or are liable to imprisonment. Though the condition of curates be somewhat ameliorated by a late act, it must be confessed that they are still, in many respects, exposed to hardships: their salaries are not equal to many dissenting ministers, who have nothing to depend on but the liberality of their people. Can there be a greater reproach to the dignified ecclesiastics of this country, than the comparatively miserable pittance allowed to curates, who do all the labour?

CURIA, PAPAL, is a collective appellation of all the authorities in Rome, which exercise the rights and privileges enjoyed by the Pope, as first bishop, superintendent, and pastor of the Roman Catholic Church. The right to grant or confirm ecclesiastical appointments is exercised by the Dataria, or papal chancery, which has its name from the common subscription, Datum apud Sanctum Petrum. This body receives petitions, draws up answers, and collects the revenues of the pope, for the pallia, spolia, benefices, annates, &c. It is a lucrative branch of the papal government, and part of the receipts goes to the apostolic chamber. In former times, the cardinal grand penitentiary, as president of the penitenzieria, had a very great influence. He still issues all dispensations and absolutions in respect to vows, penances, fasts, &c.; in regard to which the Pope has reserved to himself the dispensing power: also with respect to marriages within the degrees prohibited to Catholics. Besides these authorities, whose powers extend over all Catholic Christendom, there are in Rome several others occupied only with the government of the Roman state; as the Sagra Consulta, or chief criminal court, in which the cardinal secretary of state presides; the signatura di giustizia, a court for civil cases, consisting of twelve prelates, over which the cardinal provveditore, or papal minister of justice, presides, and with which the signatura di grazia concurs; the apostolic chamber in which twelve prelates are employed under the cardinale camerlingo, administering the property of the church and the papal domains, and receiving the revenue which belongs to the Pope as temporal and spiritual sovereign of the Roman state, and also that which he derives from other countries, which stand immediately under him, and are his fiefs. Besides these, there is a number of governors, prefects, procuratori, &c., in the different branches of the administration. The drawing up of bulls, answers, and decrees, which are issued by the Pope himself, or by these authorities, is done by the papal chancery, consisting of a vice-chancellor and twelve abbreviatori, assisted by several hundred secretaries: the brevia only are excepted, and are drawn up by a particular cardinal. All these offices are filled by clergymen; and many of them are so lucrative, that considerable sums are paid for them, somewhat in the same manner as commissions are purchased in the English army. At the death of Sixtus V. there existed 4000 venal offices of this kind; but this number has since been diminished, and many abuses have been abolished.

The highest council of the Pope, corresponding in some measure to the privy council of a monarch, is the college of the cardinals, convened whenever the Pope thinks fit. The sessions of this senate, which presides over all the other authorities in Rome, are called consistories. They are of three different kinds. The secret consistory is held generally twice a month, after the Pope has given private audience to every cardinal. In these sessions bishops are elected, pallia granted, ecclesiastical and political affairs of importance transacted, and resolutions adopted on the reports of the congregations delegated by the consistory. Beatifications and canonizations also originate in this body. Different from the secret are the semi-secret consistories, the deliberations of which relate principally to political affairs, and the results of them are communicated to the ambassadors of foreign powers. The public consistories are seldom held, and are principally ceremonial assemblies: in these the Pope receives ambassadors, and makes known important resolutions, canonizations, establishments of orders, &c. According to rule, all cardinals residing in Rome should take part in the consistories; but, in point of fact, no one appears without being specially summoned by the Pope; who, if able to do so, always presides in person, and the cardinal secretary of state (who is minister of the interior and for foreign affairs) is always present, as are likewise the cardinals presidents of the authorities.

At present there are twenty-two congregations of cardinals at Rome: 1. The holy Roman, and general inquisition, or holy office (santo officio.) 2. Visita Apostolica. 3. Consistoriale. 4. Vescovi regolari. 5. De Concilio (Tridentino). 6. Residenza di vescovi. 7. Immunita ecclesiastica. 8. Propaganda. 9. Indici (of prohibited books.) 10. Sagri riti. 11. Ceremoniale. 12. Disciplina regolare (orders of monks.) 13. Indulgenze e sagre reliquie. 14. Esame dei vescovi. 15. Correzioni dei libri della chiesa Orientale. 16. Fabbrica di S. Pietro. 17. Consulta. 18. Buon governo. 19. Loretto. 20. Hydraulic works and the Pontine marshes. 21. Economica. 22. Extraordinary ecclesiastical affairs. Few, however, of these congregations are fully supplied with officers.

CURSE, the action of wishing any tremendous evil to another. In Scripture language it signifies the just and awful sentence of God's law, condemning sinners to suffer the full punishment of their sin, or the punishment inflicted on account of transgression, Gal. iii. 10.

CURSING AND SWEARING. See SWEARING.

CUSTOM, a very comprehensive term, denoting the manners, ceremonies, and fashions of a people, which, having turned into habit, and passed into use, obtain the force of laws. Custom and habit are often confounded. By custom, we mean a frequent reiteration of the same act; and by habit, the effect that custom has on the mind or the body. See HABIT.

"Viewing man," says Lord Kaimes, "as a sensitive being, and perceiving the influence of novelty upon him, would one suspect that custom has an equal influence? and yet our nature is equally susceptible of both; not only in different objects, but frequently in the same. When an object is new, it is enchanting; familiarity renders it indifferent; and custom, after a longer familiarity, makes it again desirable. Human nature, diversified with many and various springs of action, is wonderful, and, indulging the expression, intricately constructed. Custom hath such influence upon many of our feelings, by warping and varying them, that we must attend to its operations, if we would be acquainted with human nature. A walk upon the quarter-deck, though intolerably confined, becomes, however, so agreeable by custom, that a sailor, in his walk on shore, confines himself commonly within the same bounds. I knew a man who had relinquished the sea for a country life: in the corner of his garden he reared an artificial mount, with a level summit, resembling, most accurately, a quarter-deck, not only in shape, but in size; and here was his choice walk." Such we find is often the power of custom.

CUTTY-STOOL, the stool or seat of repentance in the Scotch kirks, placed near the roof, and painted black, on which offenders against chastity sit during service, professing repentance, and receiving the minister's rebukes. It is somewhat remarkable that a breach of the seventh commandment should be the only sin which subjects the offender to this lash of ecclesiastical discipline; drunkenness, lying, sabbath-breaking, &c., being suffered to pass with impunity.

D.

DALETTES, a name sometimes given to a class of Scotch Independents, of whom the late David Dale, Esq. was an elder. They have lately coalesced with the INGHAMITES, which see.

DAMIANISTS, a denomination in the sixth century, so called from Damian, bishop of Alexandria. Their opinions were the same as the ANGELITES, which see.

DAMNATION, condemnation. This word is used to denote the final loss of the soul; but it is not always to be understood in this sense in the sacred Scripture. Thus it is said in Rom. xiii. 2, "They that resist shall receive to themselves damnation," i. e. condemnation, "from the rulers, who are not a terror to good works, but to the evil." Again in 1 Cor. xi. 29, "He that eateth and drinketh unworthily, eateth and drinketh damnation to himself;" i. e. condemnation; exposes himself to severe temporal judgments from God, and to the judgment and censure of the wise and good. Again, Rom. xiv. 23, "He that doubteth is damned if he eat;" i. e. is condemned both by his own conscience and the word of God, because he is far from being satisfied that he is right in so doing.

DANCERS, a sect which sprung up about 1573, in Flanders, and places about. It was their custom all of a sudden to fall a dancing, and holding each other's hands, to continue thereat, till being suffocated with the extraordinary violence, they fell down breathless together. During these intervals of vehement agitation they pretended to be favoured with wonderful visions. Like the Whippers, they roved from place to place, begging their victuals, holding their secret assemblies, and treating the priesthood and worship of the church with the utmost contempt. Thus we find, as Dr. Haweis observes, that the French Convulsionists and the Welsh Jumpers have had predecessors of the same stamp. There is nothing new under the sun. Haweis, and Noheim's Church Hist. Cent. 14.

DATARY, an officer in the Pope's court. He is always a prelate, and sometimes a cardinal, deputed by his holiness to receive such petitions as are presented to him, touching the provision of benefices. By his post the Datary is empowered to grant, without acquainting his holiness therewith, all benefices that do not produce upwards of twenty-four ducats annually; but for such as amount to more, he is obliged to get the provisions signed by the Pope, who admits him to audience every day. If there be several candidates for the same benefice, he has the liberty of bestowing it on which of them he thinks proper, provided he has the requisite qualifications. The Datary has a yearly salary of two thousand crowns, exclusive of the perquisites, which he receives from those who apply to him for any benefice. This officer has a substitute, named the Sub-Datary, who is likewise a prelate, and has a yearly pension of a thousand crowns; but he is not allowed to confer any benefice, without acquainting the Datary therewith. When a person has obtained the Pope's consent for a benefice, the Datary subscribes his petition with an annuit sanctissimus, i. e. "the most holy Father consents to it." The Pope's consent is subscribed in these words: Fiat ut petitur, i. e. "be it according to the petition." After the petition has passed the proper offices, and is registered, it is carried to the Datary, who dates it, and writes these words, Datum Romæ apud, &c., "given at Rome in the pontifical palace," &c. Afterwards the Pope's bull, granting the benefice, is despatched by the Datary, and passes through the hands of more than a thousand persons, belonging to fifteen different offices, who have all their stated fees. The reader may from hence judge how expensive it is to procure the Pope's bull for a benefice, and what large sums go into the office of the Datary, especially when the provisions, issued from thence, are for bishoprics, and other rich benefices.

DAVIDISTS, the adherents of David George, a native of Delft, who, in 1525, began to preach a new doctrine, publishing himself to be the true Messiah; and that he was sent of God to fill heaven, which was quite empty for want of people to deserve it. He is likewise said to have denied the existence of angels good and evil, and to have disbelieved the doctrine of a future judgment. He rejected marriage, with the Adamites; held with Manes, that the soul was not defiled by sin; and laughed at the self-denial so much recommended by Jesus Christ. Such were his principal errors. He made his escape from Delft, and retired first into Friesland, and then to Basil, where he changed his name, assuming that of John Bruck, and died in 1556. He left some disciples behind him, to whom he promised that he would rise again at the end of three years. Nor was he altogether a false prophet herein: for the magistrates of that city being informed, at the three years' end, of what he had taught, ordered him to be dug up and burnt, together with his writings, by the common hangman.

DEACON, Διακονος, a servant, a minister.

1. In the New Testament the word is used for any one that ministers in the service of God: bishops or presbyters are also styled deacons; but more particularly and generally it is understood of the secondary order of ministering servants in the church. 1 Cor. iii. 5; Col. i. 23, 25; Phil. i. 1; 1 Tim. iii.

The primitive deacons took care of the secular affairs of the church, received and disbursed monies, kept the church's accounts, and provided every thing necessary for its temporal good. Thus, while the bishop attended to the souls, the deacons attended to the bodies of the people: the pastor to the spiritual, and the deacons the temporal interests of the church. Acts vi.

2. In ecclesiastical polity, the lowest of the different orders of the clergy. In the Roman Catholic church he served at the altar, in the celebration of what are called the holy mysteries. He is also allowed to baptize and preach, with the permission of the bishop. Formerly deacons were allowed to marry, but this was prohibited to them very early; and at present the Pope dispenses with this prohibition only for very important reasons. In such cases they re-enter the condition of laymen. There are eighteen Cardinal-deacons in Rome, who have the charge of the temporal interests and the revenues of the church. A person, to be consecrated deacon, must be twenty-three years of age. In the English church, deacons are also ecclesiastics, who can perform all the offices of a priest, except the consecration of the sacramental elements, and the pronouncing of the absolution. In German protestant churches the assistant ministers are generally called deacons. If there be two assistants, the first of them is called Archdeacon. In the Presbyterian churches, the deacon's office is generally merged in that of ruling elder; but in some it is distinct, and simply embraces the distribution of alms. Among Congregationalists the deacons, besides attending to the temporal concerns of the church, assist the minister with their advice, take the lead at prayer-meetings when he is absent, and preach occasionally to smaller congregations in the contiguous villages.

DEACONESS, a female deacon. It is generally allowed, that in the primitive church there were deaconesses, i. e. pious women, whose particular business it was to assist in the entertainment and care of the itinerant preachers, visit the sick and imprisoned, instruct female catechumens, and assist at their baptism; then more particularly necessary, from the peculiar customs of those countries, the persecuted state of the church, and the speedier spreading of the gospel. Such a one it is reasonable to think Phebe was, Rom. xvi. 1, who is expressly called διακονον, a deaconess, or stated servant, as Doddridge renders it. They were usually widows, and, to prevent scandal, generally in years, 1 Tim. v. 9. See also Spanheim. Hist. Christ. Secul. 1. p. 554. The apostolic constitutions, as they are called, mention the ordination of a deaconess, and the form of prayer used on that occasion, (lib. viii. ch. 19, 20.) Pliny also, in his celebrated epistle to Trajan (xcvii.) is thought to refer to them, when speaking of two female Christians whom he put to the torture, he says, quæ ministra dicebantur, i. e. "who were called deaconesses." But as the primitive Christians seem to have been led to this practice from the peculiarity of their circumstances, and the Scripture is entirely silent as to any appointment to this supposed office, or any rules about it, it is very justly laid aside, at least as an office.

DEAN, an ecclesiastical dignitary, next under the bishop in cathedral churches, and head of the chapter. The Latin word is decanus, derived from the Greek δεκα, ten, because the dean presides over at least ten canons, or prebendaries. A dean and chapter are the bishop's council, to assist him in the affairs of religion.

DEATH, is generally defined to be the separation of the soul from the body. It is styled, in scripture language, a departure out of this world to another, 2 Tim. iv. 7; a dissolving of the earthly house of this tabernacle, 2 Cor. v. 1; a going the way of all the earth, Josh. xxiii. 14; a returning to the dust, Ecc. xiii. 7; a sleep, John xi. 11. Death may be considered as the effect of sin, Rom. v. 12; yet, as our existence is from God, no man has a right to take away his own life, or the life of another, Gen. ix. 6. Satan is said to have the power of death, Heb. ii. 14; not that he can at his pleasure inflict death on mankind, but as he was the instrument of first bringing death into the world, John viii. 44; and as he may be the executioner of God's wrath on impenitent sinners, when God permits him. Death is but once, Heb. ix. 27; certain, Job xiv. 1, 2; powerful and terrific, called the king of terrors, Job xviii. 14; uncertain as to the time, Prov. xxviii. 1; universal, Gen. v.; necessary, that God's justice may be displayed, and his mercy manifested: desirable to the righteous, Luke ii. 28—30. The fear of death is a source of uneasiness to the generality, and to a guilty conscience it may indeed be terrible; but to a good man it should be obviated by the consideration that death is the termination of every trouble; that it puts him beyond the reach of sin and temptation; that God has promised to be with the righteous, even to the end, Heb. xiii. 5; that Jesus Christ has taken away the sting, 1 Cor. xv. 54; and that it introduces him to a state of endless felicity, 2 Cor. v. 8.

Preparation for Death. This does not consist in bare morality; in an external reformation from gross sins; in attention to a round of duties in our own strength; in acts of charity; in a zealous profession; in possessing eminent gifts:—but in reconciliation to God; repentance of sin; faith in Christ; obedience to his word; and all as the effect of regeneration by the Spirit, John iii. 3; 1 Cor. xii. 3; Tit. iii. 5. Bates's four last things; Hopkins, Iredelcourt, Sherlock, and Fellows, on Death; Bp. Porteus's Poem on Death; Grove's admirable Sermon on the fear of Death; Watts's World to Come.

Spiritual Death is that awful state of ignorance, insensibility, and disobedience, which mankind are in by nature, and which excludes them from the favour and enjoyment of God, Luke i. 79. See SIN.

Brothers of Death, a denomination usually given to the religious of the order of St. Paul, the first hermit. They are called brothers of death, on account of the figure of a death's head which they were always to have with them, in order to keep perpetually before them the thoughts of death. The order was properly suppressed by Pope Urban VIII.

DECALOGUE, the ten commandments given by God to Moses.

The ten commandments were engraved by God on two tables of stone. The Jews, by way of eminence, called these commandments the ten words, from whence they had afterwards the name of decalogue; but they joined the first and second into one, and divided the last into two. They understand that against stealing to relate to the stealing of men, or kidnapping; alleging that the stealing one another's goods or property is forbidden in the last commandment. The Church of Rome has struck the second commandment quite out of the decalogue; and to make their number complete, has split the tenth into two. The reason is obvious.

DECEIT consists in passing any thing upon a person for what it is not, as when falsehood is made to pass for truth. See HYPOCRISY.

DECEPTION, SELF. See SELF-DECEPTION.

DECLAMATION OF THE PULPIT. "The dignity and sanctity of the place, and the importance of the subject, require the preacher to exert the utmost powers of his voice, to produce a pronunciation that is perfectly distinct and harmonious, and that he observe a deportment and action which is expressive and graceful. The preacher should not roar like a common crier, and rend the air with a voice like thunder; for such kind of declamation is not only without meaning and without persuasion, but highly incongruous with the meek and gentle spirit of the Gospel. He should likewise take particular care to avoid a monotony; his voice should rise from the beginning, as it were, by degrees, and its greatest strength should be exerted in the application. Each inflection of the voice should be adapted to the phrase and to the meaning of the words; and each remarkable expression should have its peculiar inflexion. The dogmatic requires a plain uniform tone of voice only, and the menaces of God's word demand a greater force than its promises and rewards; but the latter should not be pronounced in the soft tone of a flute, nor the former with the loud sound of a trumpet. The voice should still retain its natural tone in all its various inflexions. Happy is that preacher who has a voice that is at once strong, flexible, and harmonious. An air of complacency and benevolence, as well as devotion, should be constantly visible in the countenance of the preacher; but every appearance of affectation must be carefully avoided; for nothing is so disgusting to an audience as even the semblance of dissimulation. Eyes constantly rolling, turned towards heaven, and streaming with tears, rather denote a hypocrite than a man possessed of the real spirit of religion, and who feels the true import of what he preaches. An air of affected devotion infallibly destroys the efficacy of all that the preacher can say, however just and important it may be. On the other hand, he must avoid every appearance of mirth or raillery, or of that cold unfeeling manner which is so apt to freeze the heart of his hearers. The body should in general be erect, and in a natural and easy attitude. The perpetual movement or contortion of the body has a ridiculous effect in the pulpit, and makes the figure of a preacher and a harlequin too similar; on the other hand, he ought not to remain constantly upright and motionless, like a speaking statue. The motions of the hands give a strong expression to a discourse; but they should be decent, grave, noble, and expressive. The preacher who is incessantly in action, who is perpetually clapping his hands, or who menaces with a clenched fist, or counts his arguments on his fingers, will only excite mirth among his auditory. In a word, declamation is an art that the sacred orator should study with assiduity. The design of a sermon is to convince, to affect, and to persuade. The voice, the countenance, and the action, which are to produce the triple effect, are therefore objects to which the preacher should particularly apply himself." See SERMON.

DECREES OF GOD, are his settled purposes, whereby he foreordains whatsoever comes to pass. Dan. iv. 24. Acts xv. 18. Eph. i. 11. This doctrine is the subject of one of the most perplexing controversies that has occurred among mankind; it is not, however, as some think, a novel doctrine. The opinion, that whatever occurs in the world at large, or in the lot of private individuals, is the result of a previous and unalterable arrangement by that supreme power which presides over nature, has always been held by many of the vulgar, and has been believed by speculative men. The ancient stoics, Zeno and Chrysippus, whom the Jewish Essenes seem to have followed, asserted the existence of a deity, that, acting wisely but necessarily, contrived the general system of the world; from which, by a series of causes, whatever is now done in it unavoidably results. Mohammed introduced into his Koran the doctrine of absolute predestination of the course of human affairs. He represented life and death, prosperity and adversity, and every event that befalls a man in this world, as the result of a previous determination of the one God who rules over all. Augustine, and the whole of the earliest reformers, but especially Calvin, favoured this doctrine. It was generally asserted, and publicly owned, in most of the confessions of faith of the reformed churches, and particularly in the Church of England; and to this we may add, that it was maintained by a great number of divines in the last two centuries.

As to the nature of these decrees, it must be observed that they are not the result of deliberation, or the Almighty's debating matters within himself, reasoning in his own mind about the expediency or in expediency of things, as creatures do; nor are they merely ideas of things future, but settled determinations founded on his sovereign will and pleasure. Is. xl. 14. They are to be considered as eternal: this is evident; for if God be eternal, consequently his purposes must be of equal duration with himself; to suppose otherwise, would be to suppose that there was a time when he was undetermined and mutable; whereas no new determinations or after thoughts can arise in his mind. Job xxiii. 13, 14.—2. They are free, without any compulsion, and not excited by any motive out of himself. Rom. ix. 15.—3. They are infinitely wise, displaying his glory, and promoting the general good. Rom. xi. 33.—4. They are immutable, for this is the result of his being infinitely perfect; for if there were the least change in God's understanding, it would be an instance of imperfection. Mal. iii. 6.—5. They are extensive or universal, relating to all creatures and things in heaven, earth, and hell. Eph. i. 11. Prov. xvi. 4.—6. They are secret, or at least cannot be known till he be pleased to discover them. It is therefore presumption for any to attempt to enter into or judge of his secret purpose, or to decide upon what he has not revealed. Deut. xxix. 29. Nor is an unknown or supposed decree at any time to be the rule of our conduct. His revealed will alone must be considered as the rule by which we are to judge of the event of things, as well as of our conduct at large. Rom. xi. 34.—7. Lastly, they are effectual; for as he is infinitely wise to plan, so he is infinitely powerful to perform: his counsel shall stand, and he will do all his pleasure. Is. xlvi. 10.

This doctrine should teach us—1. Admiration. "He is the rock, his work is perfect, for all his ways are judgment; a God of truth, and without iniquity; just and right is he." Deut. xxxii. 4.—2. Reverence. "Who would not fear thee, O king of nations? for to thee doth it appertain." Jer. x. 7.—3. Humility. "O the depth of the riches, both of the wisdom and knowledge of God! how unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways past finding out!" Rom. xi. 33.—4. Submission. "For he doeth according to his will in the armies of heaven, and among the inhabitants of the earth; and none can stay his hand, or say unto him—What doest thou?" Dan. iv. 35.—5. Desire for heaven. "What I do, thou knowest not now; but thou shalt know hereafter." John xiii. 7. See NECESSITY, PREDESTINATION.

DECREES OF COUNCILS, are the laws made by them to regulate the doctrine and policy of the church.

DECRETAL, a letter of a pope, determining some point of question in the ecclesiastical law. The decretals compose the second part of the canon law. The first genuine one, acknowledged by all the learned as such, is a letter of Pope Siricius, written in the year 385, to Himerus, bishop of Tarragona, in Spain, concerning some disorders which had crept into the churches of Spain. The oldest collection of decretals was made by Isidore, of Seville, (who died 636,) and is yet extant in manuscript. Gratian published a collection of decretals, containing all the ordinances made by the popes till the year 1150. Gregory IX., in 1227, following the example of Theodosius and Justinian, formed a constitution of his own, collecting into one body all the decisions and all the causes which served to advance the papal power; which collection of decretals was called the Pentateuch, because it contained five books.

DEDICATION, a religious ceremony, whereby any person or thing is solemnly consecrated, or set apart to the service of God and the purposes of religion.

The use of dedications is very ancient, both among the worshippers of the true God, and among the heathen. In the Scripture, we meet with dedications of the tabernacle, altars, &c. Under Christianity, dedication is only applied to a church, and is properly the consecration thereof. See CONSECRATION.

DEFENCE. See SELF-DEFENCE.

DEFENDER OF THE FAITH, (Fidei Defensor.) a peculiar title belonging to the king of England; as Catholicus, to the king of Spain; Christianissimus, to the king of France; and Apostolicus, to the king of Hungary, &c These titles were given by the popes of Rome. That of Fidei Defensor was conferred by Leo X. on King Henry VIII. for writing against Martin Luther; and the bull for it bears date quinto idus, October, 1521. It was afterwards confirmed by Clement VII. But the Pope, on Henry's suppressing the houses of religion, at the time of the Reformation, not only deprived him of his title, but deposed him of his crown also; though, in the thirty-fifth year of his reign, his title, &c. was confirmed by parliament, and has continued to be used by all his successors. Chamberlayne says, the title belonged to the kings of England before that time, and for proof hereof appeals to several charters granted to the University of Oxford: so that Pope Leo's bull was only a renovation of an ancient right.

DEGRADATION, ECCLESIASTICAL, is the deprivation of a priest of his dignity. We have an instance of it in the eighth century, at Constantinople, in the person of the patriarch Constantine, who was made to go out of the church backwards, stripped of his pallium, and anathematized. In our own country, Cranmer was degraded by order of the bloody queen Mary. They dressed him in episcopal robes, made only of canvas; put the mitre on his head, and the pastoral staff in his hand, and in this attire showed him to the people, and then stripped him piece by piece.

DEISTS, a class whose distinguishing character it is, not to profess any particular form or system of religion, but only to acknowledge the existence of a God, and to follow the light of nature, rejecting revelation and opposing Christianity. The name of deists seems to have been first assumed, as the denomination of a party, about the middle of the sixteenth century, by some gentlemen in France and Italy, who were desirous of thus disguising their opposition to Christianity by a more honourable appellation than that of atheists. Viret, an eminent reformer, mentions certain persons in his epistle dedicatory, prefixed to the second volume of his "Instruction Chrétienne," published in 1653, who called themselves by a new name, that of deists. These, he tells us, professed to believe in God, but showed no regard to Jesus Christ, and considered the doctrine of the apostles and evangelists as fables and dreams. He adds, that they laughed at all religion, though they outwardly conformed to the religion of those with whom they lived, or whom they wished to please, or feared to offend. Some, he observed, professed to believe the immortality of the soul; others denied both this doctrine and that of providence. Many of them were considered as persons of acute and subtle genius, and took pains in disseminating their notions. The deists hold, that, considering the multiplicity of religions, the numerous pretences to revelation, and the precarious arguments generally advanced in proof thereof, the best and surest way is to return to the simplicity of nature, and the belief of one God; which is the only truth agreed to by all nations. They complain, that the freedom of thinking and reasoning is oppressed under the yoke of religion, and that the minds of men are tyrannized over, by the necessity imposed on them of believing inconceivable mysteries; and contend that nothing should be required to be assented to or believed, but what their reason clearly conceives. The distinguishing character of modern deists is, that they discard all pretences to revelation as the effects of imposture or enthusiasm. They profess a regard for natural religion, though they are far from being agreed in their notions concerning it.

They are classed, by some of their own writers, into mortal and immortal deists; the latter acknowledging a future state, and the former denying it, or representing it as very uncertain. Dr. Clarke distinguishes four sorts of deists. 1. Those who pretend to believe the existence of an eternal, infinite, independent, intelligent Being, who made the world, without concerning himself in the government of it.—2. Those who believe the being and natural providence of God, but deny the difference of actions as morally good or evil, resolving it into the arbitrary constitution of human laws; and therefore they suppose that God takes no notice of them. With respect to both these classes, he observes, that their opinions can consistently terminate in nothing but downright atheism.—3. Those who, having right apprehensions concerning the nature, attributes, and all-governing providence of God, seem also to have some notion of his moral perfections; though they consider them as transcendent, and such in nature and degree, that we can form no true judgment, nor argue with any certainty concerning them: but they deny the immortality of human souls; alleging that men perish at death, and that the present life is the whole of human existence.—4. Those who believe the existence, perfections, and providence of God, the obligations of natural religion, and a state of future retribution, on the evidence of the light of nature, without a divine revelation: such as these, he says, are the only true deists: but their principles, he apprehends, should lead them to embrace Christianity; and therefore he concludes that there is now no consistent scheme of deism in the world. The first deistical writer of any note that appeared in this country, was Herbert, baron of Cherbury. He lived and wrote in the seventeenth century. His book "De Veritate," was first published at Paris in 1624. This, together with his book "De Causis Errorum," and his treatise "De Religione Laici," were afterwards published in London. His celebrated work "De Religione Gentilium," was published at Amsterdam in 1663, in 4to., and in 1700 in 8vo.; and an English translation of it was published at London in 1705. As he was one of the first that formed deism into a system, and asserted the sufficiency, universality, and absolute perfection of natural religion, with a view to discard all extraordinary revelation as useless and needless, we shall subjoin the five fundamental articles of this universal religion. They are these:—1. There is one supreme God.—2. That he is chiefly to be worshipped.—3. That piety and virtue are the principal part of his worship.—4. That we must repent of our sins; and if we do so, God will pardon them.—5. That there are rewards for good men, and punishments for bad men, both here and hereafter. A number of advocates have appeared in the same cause; and however they may have differed among themselves, they have agreed in their attempts to invalidate the evidence and authority of divine revelation. We might mention Hobbes, Blount, Toland, Collins, Woolston, Tindal, Morgan, Chubb, Lord Bolingbroke, Hume, Gibbon, Paine, and some add Lord Shaftesbury to the number. Among foreigners, Voltaire, Rousseau, Condorcet, and many other celebrated French authors, have rendered themselves conspicuous by their deistical writings. "But," as one observes, "the friends of Christianity have no reason to regret the free and unreserved discussion which their religion has undergone. Objections have been stated and urged in their full force, and as fully answered; arguments and raillery have been repelled; and the controversy between Christians and Deists has called forth a great number of excellent writers, who have illustrated both the doctrines and evidences of Christianity in a manner that will ever reflect honour on their names, and be of lasting service to the cause of genuine religion, and the best interests of mankind." See articles CHRISTIANITY, INFIDELITY, INSPIRATION, and SCRIPTURE, in this work. Leland's View of Deistical Writers; Sermons at Boyle's Lecture; Halyburton's Natural Religion insufficient; Leslie's Short Method with the Deists; Bishop Watson's Apology for the Bible; Fuller's Gospel of Christ its own Witness; Bishop Porteus's Charge to the Clergy for 1794; and his Summary of the Evidences of Christianity.

DEITY OF CHRIST. See JESUS CHRIST.

DELUGE, the flood which overflowed and destroyed the earth. This flood makes one of the most considerable epochas in chronology. Its history is given by Moses, Gen. vi. and vii. Its time is fixed by the best chro-nologers to the year from the creation 1656, answering to the year before Christ 2293. From this flood, the state of the world is divided into diluvian and antediluvian.

Men who have not paid that regard to sacred history which it deserves, have cavilled at the account given of an universal deluge. Their objections principally turn upon three points:—1. The want of any direct history of that event by the profane writers of antiquity.—2. The apparent impossibility of accounting for the quantity of water necessary to overflow the whole earth to such a depth as it is said to have been.—And, 3. There appearing no necessity for an universal deluge, as the same end might have been accomplished by a partial one.

To the above arguments we oppose the plain declarations of Scripture. God declared to Noah that he was resolved to destroy every thing that had breath under heaven, or had life on the earth, by a flood of waters; such was the threatening, such was the execution. The waters, Moses assures us, covered the whole earth, buried all the mountains; every thing perished therein that had life, excepting Noah and those with him in the ark. Can an universal deluge be more clearly expressed? If the deluge had only been partial, there had been no necessity to spend an hundred years in the building of an ark, and shutting up all sorts of animals therein, in order to re-stock the world; they had been easily and readily brought from those parts of the world not overflowed into those that were; at least all the birds would never have been destroyed, as Moses says they were, so long as they had wings to bear them to those parts where the flood did not reach. If the waters had only overflowed the neighbourhood of the Euphrates and the Tigris, they could not be fifteen cubits above the highest mountains; there was no rising that height but they must spread themselves, by the laws of gravity, over the rest of the earth; unless, perhaps, they had been retained there by a miracle: in that case Moses, no doubt, would have related the miracle, as he did that of the waters of the Red Sea, &c. It may also be observed, that in the regions far remote from the Euphrates and Tigris, viz., Italy, France, Switzerland, Germany, England, &c., there are frequently found in places many scores of leagues from the sea, and even in the tops of high mountains, whole trees sunk deep under ground, as also teeth and bones of animals, fishes entire, sea shells, ears of corn, &c., petrified, which the best naturalists are agreed could never have come there but by the deluge. That the Greeks and western nations had some knowledge of the flood, has never been denied; and the Africans, Chinese, and Americans, have traditions of the deluge. The ingenious Mr. Bryant, in his Mythology, has pretty clearly proved that the deluge, so far from being unknown to the heathen world at large, is in reality conspicuous throughout every one of their acts of religious worship. In India, also, Sir William Jones has discovered, that in the oldest mythological books of that country, there is such an account of the deluge as corresponds sufficiently with that of Moses.

Various have been the conjectures of learned men as to the natural causes of the deluge. Some have supposed that a quantity of water was created on purpose, and at a proper time annihilated by divine power. Dr. Burnet supposes the primitive earth to have been no more than a crust investing the water contained in the ocean, and in the central abyss which he and others suppose to exist in the bowels of the earth; at the time of the flood, this outward crust broke in a thousand pieces, and sunk down among the water, which thus spouted up in vast cataracts and overflowed the whole surface. Others, supposing a sufficient fund of water in the sea or abyss, think that the shifting of the earth's centre of gravity drew after it the water out of the channel, and overwhelmed the several parts of the earth successively. Others ascribe it to the shock of a comet; and Mr. King supposed it to arise from subterraneous fires bursting forth with great violence under the sea. But are not most, if not all these hypotheses quite arbitrary, and without foundation from the words of Moses? It is, perhaps, in vain to attempt accounting for this event by natural causes, it being altogether miraculous and supernatural, as a punishment to men for the corruption then in the world. Let us be satisfied with the sources which Moses gives us, namely, the fountains of the great deep broken up, and the windows of heaven opened; that is, the waters rushed out from the hidden abyss of the bowels of the earth, and the clouds poured down their rain incessantly. Let it suffice us to know, that all the elements are under God's power; that he can do with them as he pleases, and frequently in ways we are ignorant of, in order to accomplish his own purposes.

The principal writers on this subject have been Woodyard, Cockburn, Bryant, Burnet, Whiston, Stillingfleet, King, Catcott, and Tytler.

DEMONS (Greek δαιμων and δαίμονιον), a name given in the New Testament to fallen angels, or, morally evil and impure spirits, and in some instances, such as Acts xvi. 18; 1 Cor. x. 20, 21; 1 Tim. iv. 1; Rev. ix. 20, to heathen gods, human spirits whom the heathen deified and worshipped, and the canonized saints of corrupt churches. According to the heathen philosophers, demons held a middle rank between the celestial gods and men upon earth, and carried on all intercourse between them; conveying the addresses of men to the gods, and the divine benefits to men. They also believed that some of them were employed in executing the vengeance of the gods on the impious. Agreeably to this view, they divided their demons into two kinds: αγαθοδαιμων, ευδαιμων, a good demon, or tutelary genius, whom they assigned to every one at his birth, to watch over his character, fortunes, &c.; and κακοδαιμων, a malignant demon, who thwarts, vexes, and injures any one.

DEMONIAC, one possessed or affected by a demon or demons. The subject of demoniacal possession, since the time of Jos. Mede, has given rise to much discussion. One class of writers have supposed that the demoniacs were merely madmen; others that the bodies of human beings were actually possessed, controlled, governed, and inhabited by wicked and impure spirits. Among the supporters of the former opinion are Heinsius, Mede, Sykes, Mead, Farmer, Lardner, and, almost without exception, modern Socinian and Rationalist writers. On the other side of the question may be placed the uniform interpretation of the passages in the New Testament, in which the subject is spoken of, in their literal sense, by the ancient church, the best commentators, and those generally bearing the name of orthodox in every age, and among all sects coming under this denomination. The following is a brief summary of the respective arguments on both sides, beginning with those which have been advanced against actual possession. 1. The word demon properly signifies the soul of a dead person, which it cannot be supposed is referred to where speeches and actions are imputed to the imaginary demoniac. In reply to this, it has been deemed sufficient to maintain that the word does not uniformly denote the spirits of the departed.—2. Among the heathens lunacy and epilepsy were ascribed to the operation of certain demons, who were therefore called larvati and cerriti. To this it has been answered, that it is not impossible but that the heathens were right; but that, at all events, their opinion, whether right or wrong, is no proof that the Jews were in error; for the demoniacs of Scripture are represented as differing from insane and epileptic persons. Compare Matt. iv. 24, where the δαμονιοζουνοις are opposed to the σιληνιαζουνοις, the παρλυτικοις, and the ποικιλαις νοσοις, και βασανις συνεχομενοις. And in chap. x. 1, the power to cast out demons is expressly distinguished from the power of healing all manner of sickness, and all manner of disease. See also Luke iv. 33—36: compare especially ver. 41 with ver. 40, where the contrast is most striking.—3. It is argued that the Jews had the same idea of these diseases, and the instance of Saul's madness, and Matt. xvii. 14, 15; John vii. 20; viii. 48, 52; x. 20; are adduced to prove the assertion. These passages certainly prove that lunatics, epileptics, and demoniacs are sometimes synonymous terms; but this admission will only go to show that they were occasionally identified; while the argument deduced from the contrast between lunatics and demoniacs in the passages quoted above will not be destroyed.—4. Christ is said to have adopted the common language of the people, which it was not necessary to change. He was not sent to correct the mistakes which existed in the popular philosophy of the day in which he lived. This argument takes for granted the very point to be proved. But is such an accommodation as it supposes for a moment to be reconciled with the character of such a teacher as Jesus? If the demons were simply natural diseases, was it not of the highest importance for him to have undeceived his contemporaries on these points, and to have corrected the false and pernicious philosophy of the age? Were we to follow out this principle of accommodation, we might explain away most of our Lord's doctrines, and regard them as mere Jewish notions, which indeed has been done by the Socinians and Rationalists of Germany.—5. No reason can be given why there should be demoniacal possessions in our Lord's time, and not at present, when we have no grounds to suppose that any instances of this nature anywhere occur. In reply to this objection, it may be observed, that these possessions were then permitted in order to give to the devil's hostility to man an ocular perceptibility; to place in a clear light the power and benevolence of the Lord Jesus in defeating the baneful purposes of this ancient enemy of the human race, and to confute the error so prevalent among the Sadducees, who affirmed that there was neither angel nor spirit.

In addition to the arguments just produced in refutation of the anti-demonianists, the following positions may be laid down in support of real possession:—

1. The doctrine of demoniacal possessions is consistent with the whole tenor of Scripture. Evil is there represented as having been introduced by a being of this description, who in some wonderful manner influenced the immaterial principle in man. The continuance of evil in the world is frequently imputed to the continued agency of the same being. His delight is in every possible way to harass and injure mankind, both as to mind and outward estate. See Job passim.

2. The doctrine is consistent with the dictates of reason. If one man may cause evil to another, a thing which is done in thousands of instances every day, is it not possible that evils of a different kind might be produced by means of other beings, while the moral government of God remained unimpeached?

3. The supposition that the demoniacs spoken of in Scripture were lunatics, is fraught with numerous and insuperable difficulties. The facts recorded of them demonstrate that they were not merely such. Insane persons either reason rightly on wrong grounds, or wrongly on right grounds, or blend right and wrong together. But these demoniacs reasoned rightly on right grounds. They uttered propositions undeniably true, and such as were always perfectly adapted to the occasions. They excelled in the accuracy of their knowledge the disciples themselves; at least we never find any of these applying to our Lord the epithet of "the Holy One of God." They were alike consistent in their knowledge and their language. Their bodies were agitated and convulsed. The powers of their minds were controlled in such a manner, that their actions were unreasonable; yet they addressed our Lord in a consistent and rational, though in an appalling and mysterious manner. Our Lord answered them, not by appealing to the individuals whose actions had been so irrational, but to something distinct from them, which he requires and commands to leave them: that is, to evil spirits, whose mode of continuing evil in such instances had been so fearfully displayed. These evil spirits answer him by an intimate knowledge of his person and character, which was hidden from the wise and prudent of the nation. Before him, as their future judge, they believed and trembled, saying, "Art thou come to torment us before the time?"

It is an admirable observation of Jortin on this point, that where any circumstances are added concerning the demoniacs, they are generally such as show that there was something preternatural in the case; for these afflicted persons unanimously joined in doing homage to Christ and his apostles: they all knew him, and united in confessing his divinity. If, on the contrary, they had been lunatics, some would have worshipped, and some would have reviled him, according to the various ways in which the disease had affected their minds.

4. The other facts recorded of the demoniacs are such as render it impossible, on any fair principles of interpretation, to conclude that they were merely insane. The principal of these is that most extraordinary event of the possession of the herd of swine, by the same demons which had formerly shown their malignity in the human form. This extraordinary event cannot be accounted for, except upon the commonly received literal interpretation of the evangelic narrative in which it is recorded. Nothing can be more absurd and trifling than the attempts that have been made to explain it on other grounds.

Whatever difficulties may seem to attach to the common, simple, and ancient interpretation of the different cases of possession, it must be regarded as most probably correct, for this very satisfactory reason, that the difficulties of the new interpretation are always greater. On one side we have the wonderful doctrine, that it pleased the Almighty to permit invisible and evil beings to possess themselves, in some incomprehensible manner, of the bodies and souls of men. On the other, we have Christ the revealer of truth, establishing falsehood, sanctioning error, or encouraging deception. We have the evangelists inconsistent with themselves, and a narrative, which is acknowledged to be inspired, and to be intended for the unlearned, unintelligible and false. Between such difficulties I prefer the former; and if I cannot comprehend how such things could be, I submit to the infinite wisdom and power of the Supreme, and surrender my reason to the guidance of Divine Revelation. The difference between Christianity and philosophy, or the mode of speculating which assumes that title, may be said to consist in this. In matters of philosophy, the vulgar may be in error, and the speculatists may be right; but in Christianity, the popular opinion is generally right. The philosopher who would fashion the statements of Scripture according to his own notions of truth and falsehood, is sure to conclude with error.

DENOMINATIONS, THE THREE, the designation given to an association of Dissenting ministers residing in and about London, belonging to the Presbyterian, Independent, and Baptist denominations, and usually described as—"The General Body of Protestant Dissenting Ministers of London and Westminster." The origin of this association is involved in some obscurity; for while it is certain the Dissenting ministers of London associated to present addresses to Charles II., James II., and William and Mary, it nevertheless appears, from Calamy's Life, that it was only on the accession of Queen Anne, that those of the three denominations united in an address at court. This body was not organized till 1727, in which year it was determined that "no persons be allowed to join the Association of Protestant Dissenting Ministers, but such as are approved by one or other of the Three Denominations." Each denomination has, therefore, its own distinct board of approved ministers, which is entirely self-constituted, not being in any way elected or supported by the churches; and it is through such board that ministers become members of the general body.

The first meetings of the ministers were held in the Dissenting Meeting-houses; but after the erection of Dr. Williams's Library in Red Cross Street, permission was obtained from its trustees to meet there; which permission has ever since been renewed by an annual vote, so that the body of associated ministers has no connexion with the funds or trust of the library, as many have erroneously supposed.

No explicit avowal has ever been made of the objects of this association; but it appears, beyond dispute, that its earlier proceedings were not confined to political discussions or loyal addresses to the throne. Dr. Calamy has recorded, that he "preached, in October, 1731, the first sermon to ministers in Dr. Williams's Library;" and his editor adds, in a note, "a concio ad clerum continued for some years." At that period the members of the body were so far united in religious sentiment, that they could join together in acts of Christian worship; but the existence and spread of Arianism and Socinianism in the Presbyterian and Baptist boards has for a long time, compelled them to confine their proceedings to matters connected with the political rights and circumstances of Dissenters, and other topics of national interest, in reference to which they wish to express their opinion.

This body is very attentive to etiquette, being observant of the births, marriages, deaths, &c., of the members of the royal family. They accordingly vote dutiful and loyal addresses either of congratulation or condolence, as the case may require. On the accession of the sovereign, they enjoy the privilege of addressing the king on the throne, when the whole body are introduced, and have the honour of kissing hands. On other occasions, they present their addresses by a deputation of about twenty, who are received in the royal closet.

The General Body probably includes one hundred and fifty members, about one half of which are of the Independent or Congregational board. The Socinians form a very small minority of the whole body.

DEPRAVITY, corruption, a change from perfection to imperfection. See FALL, SIN.

DEPRECATORY, a term applied to the manner of performing some ceremonies in the form of prayer. The form of absolution in the Greek Church is deprecative, thus expressed—"May God absolve you;" whereas in the Latin Church it is declarative—"I absolve you."

DEPUTIES, a committee of gentlemen annually chosen by the several congregations of Protestant Dissenters of London and its vicinity, for the purpose of protecting their civil rights. It originated at a general meeting held on the 9th of November, 1732, in the meeting-house, Silver Street, London, to consider of an application to the legislature for the repeal of the Corporation and Test Acts, when a committee of twenty-one persons was appointed to mature the measure. At a subsequent meeting, on the 29th of the same month, it was resolved,—that every congregation of the three denominations of Protestant Dissenters, Presbyterian, Independents, and Baptists, in and within twelve miles of London, should be recommended to appoint two deputies. This appointment accordingly took place; and the idea being suggested that it would be very advantageous to Dissenters to have a permanent body to superintend their civil concerns, it was finally resolved that the appointment should be annual; and the first meeting of deputies, elected in pursuance of these resolutions, was held at Salter's Hall, January 12, 1736-1737. Since that time the election has regularly taken place, and the committee have unremittingly watched over bills brought into parliament in any way affecting Dissenters,—kept alive an interest in behalf of the repeal of the Test and Corporation Acts,—supported every measure which promised to be beneficial in extending and consolidating religious liberty,—and successfully exerted themselves in protecting individual ministers and congregations against those molestations to which they have been exposed on the part of bigoted and persecuting churchmen.

DERVISH, derived from two Turkish words, der, "a door," and vish, "extended," because the wandering poor often laid themselves down before the doors of the wealthy—is applied to him who voluntarily embraces poverty, and adheres to it as a religious profession. Like fakir, in the Arabic, it signifies originally one who has neither fire nor fixed place of abode. The first founders of the order had considerable difficulty in effecting the innovation into Mohammedanism; they were restrained by the popular prohibition,—no monkery in Islamism! Hence they took care to leave out vows of chastity, and of living in community; nor did they exact a too severe obligation to fast and pray. Like all enthusiasts, they doubtless wished to discover some way of worshipping that should more efficaciously obtain the favour of Heaven. But in false religion there are always as many knaves as enthusiasts; perhaps, indeed, the two characters are oftener combined in the same person than we suspect. Hence the first dervishes aimed at astonishing the multitude as much as propitiating the Divine favour, by their violent and whimsical exercises—by their austerities and macerations. In the latter respect, they have left Christian monks far behind. Yet, with all their foolery,—and, we may safely add, their roguery,—the doctrines which they taught were remarkable for their morality, and, above all, for inculcating a constant communion with God.

The Turkish dervishes pretend that their origin may be traced to Ali, and even to Abubekr—the first of the four immediate successors of Mohammed. But Ali, the fourth of those caliphs, was no dervish. He instituted no order: he was merely the first Mussulman who renounced riches, which he distributed to the poor. His example was imitated by others after him; so that, insensibly, a class of persons arose, who, like the Sisters of Mercy, devoted themselves to the service of the indigent and the helpless, and reduced themselves to voluntary poverty. But things soon changed. The legacies left by the faithful for the use of the poor were intrusted to the distribution of these zealous men, and thus the order became insensibly possessed of great riches. Besides, men so pious must necessarily have interest in heaven: hence their prayers must be purchased—a fruitful source of income. But human avarice is insatiable; and our dervishes, like their brethren of a purer faith, hit on another expedient: they manufactured and sold amulets, as the latter did relics, to which their knavery assigned miraculous virtues. Thus they acquired great consideration, and their order daily augmented by votaries, not from the lowest only, but from the highest ranks in society.

When one order was established, nothing could be easier than to establish others; for knavery is always fertile in invention. Of these, no fewer than thirty-two successively appeared, each endeavouring to outdo the other in address of discipline and extravagance of manner. Of course, all this was intended to have its effect on spectators; and that effect it assuredly produced. No man will act the mountebank for nothing: superstition has its jack-puddings as well as Bartholomew fair; and the object of both is in many cases the same. The dervishes grew rich and respected. They can say what they like with perfect impunity, even to the highest. They follow the army to the field, and, with the Koran in hand, animate the warriors of the faith (so are Mussulman soldiers called) against all infidels and mis-believers.

The dervishes who live in community, and who constitute by far the greater number, have their superior or sheikh, and are subject to a noviciate and religious practices, independent of the prayers which every Mussulman is bound to repeat. As celibacy is not strictly enjoined, though the observance of it is encouraged, many are married. These do not, however, live in community: they have all their separate establishments; but all are expected to pass the night preceding any public exhibition, in the religious retirement to which they belong. Besides these, there are the travelling dervishes, who are continually rambling from one part of the Mohammedan world to the other,—some to preach, some on pilgrimage, many to beg and plunder.

Of the numerous order of dervishes formerly subsisting in Turkey, three only are deserving the notice of the reader,—the Mevlevy, the Bedevy, and the Rufai; and even of these the Mevlevy are the only ones who are held in any degree of repute, at least among the higher classes.

I. The Mevlevy had for their founder

Mevlana-Jelaleddin-Hoomy-Muhammed, who was surnamed Sultan-ul-Ulema, or Sovereign of the Learned. He was born at Balk, in Chorasán, A. H. 604. His descent was noble: his parental grandfather had married the daughter of Alaeddin (Aladdin), one of the kings of Chorasán; besides, that grandfather himself was descended, on the paternal side, from the Caliph Abubekr, and had for his mother a princess of the country.

Jelaleddin taught publicly in Conia (Iconium) just like the ancient philosophers. The whole city was eager to profit by his instructions. But in A. H. 642, a man named Shemseddin arrived from Tauris, and produced a great change in the habits of Jelaleddin. This Shemseddin was also descended from Abubekr, and was himself sheikh of an order of dervishes. His severer principles would not permit him to see, without pain, so eminent a doctor as Jelaleddin so much attached to the things of the world. He prevailed on the latter to suspend all teaching, and to pass several successive weeks with him in his retirement. This dissatisfied the disciples of Jelaleddin, who conspired against the life of the obnoxious dervish. The latter, however, saved himself by a timely flight; and the other was so disconsolate for the loss of his friend, that he renounced the world, and in 643 founded the order of the Mevlevy Dervishes. He composed a work called "Memevy," which contains some of the most popular poetry in the East—so popular, indeed, that many of his moral distichs have long been proverbial; and the chanting of his odes constitutes the chief occupation of his followers.

Jelaleddin died in 672, after bestowing such lustre on his order that it was recognised as superior to all the rest. The present sheikh of that order is Cheleby-Effendy, whose residence is also at Conia. As the successor of Jelaleddin, he has the right of nominating the sheikhs of each religious house, and he has the still more envied prerogative of girding every newly-made sultan with the sword of Othman.

The candidate for the honoured profession of Mevlevy must renounce the vanities of the world, and perform the meanest offices in the kitchen during his noviciate of a thousand and one days; nor is he permitted to go outside the inclosure before the expiration of that period. The sheikh then assigns him an apartment among his brethren, and admits him to all the religious ceremonies of the order.

Two days every week,—on Tuesdays and Fridays,—these dervishes perform their public exercises in an octangular hall, which they term their oratory; it has two galleries, and is dedicated to that purpose alone. That hall has no other ornament than the name of the founder, in large letters of gold. Just below the name is the place of the sheikh, indicated by a sheepskin spread on the floor. Opposite to this is what may be termed the orchestra, where several of the brethren sit and play on musical instruments. There is also a grated place for the sultan, who is sometimes present on these occasions.

At twelve o'clock, the doors of the oratory are opened; the curious enter in great numbers, and occupy the galleries. Soon some of the dervishes arrive, salute the name of their founder, and kneel round the hall. They then prostrate their foreheads to the ground, raise themselves, and sit on their heels. The sheikh enters in his turn, salutes the same revered name, takes his place, and begins the prayer called Fat-ha. After the dervishes in the orchestra sing a Persian ode, which they accompany with music.

In the mean time, the remaining brethren have arrived, and taken their places, after the necessary salutation and prostration. When all are assembled, the orchestra of little kettledrums, and fifes made of Indian reed, strikes up an air, which at first is very measured; but suddenly it becomes animated, when all the dervishes rise, and, with the sheikh at their head, slowly pace the room three times. The third turn being made, the superior stands still: every brother passes, makes him a low bow, seizes his hand, lifts it to his lips and forehead, and begins to turn round.

Now begins the real entertainment, in which every punch exhibits his part. Every one turns round, at first leisurely, but as the music from the orchestra becomes more animated, with increased velocity, until the eye can scarcely follow the rapidity of the gyrations. The music is accompanied by the chanting of an ode, which describes the duties and praises the profession of the dervish. The number of those who are at one time occupied in this whirligig foolery, varies from nine to thirteen,—the time from five to seven minutes. They are then relieved by an equal number, but each band resumes the exercise three or four times during the exhibition. While these harlequins are thus occupied, the Simazen-Bashy, or Master of the Dance,—an old fellow with a cunning eye,—observes them very closely, that each one may preserve the exact circle of his gyration. When all this is past, and the worshippers completely exhausted with the activity of their devotion, the sheikh prays for the prosperity of the empire and the health of the sultan. All then leave the place, the chief closing the rear.

II. In extravagance, the Bedevy, the members of which are called Howlers by Europeans, greatly exceed that of the one we have just dismissed. They have a religious establishment at St. Dmitry, a village near Constantinople. The place in which they exhibit themselves is a rectangular room, the walls of which are liberally covered with short extracts from the Koran, except where certain musical instruments are suspended. At the angle pointing towards the holy city, is a niche called Mihrab, where the Koran is carefully preserved. Immediately below is a bundle of sharp instruments. The name of the founder occupies one of the most conspicuous parts of the wall. Their religious exercise is as follows:—

Their office commences with prayer (namaz), repeated by the sheikh. All sit round him, after prostrating themselves to the earth, and chant in concert some verses from the Koran, all the time moving their bodies to right and left. This prelude continues about half an hour. Then all rise and gravely seat themselves on their heels in the centre of the room, so as to form right lines. Other prayers are recited, accompanied by a similar motion of the body. At a signal from the sheikh, all rise a second time, advance one foot forward, and fall back to their former position. This exercise they continue in exact concert. They recite all the attributes of God, and in words resembling the litanies of the Latin Church. They would appear to have reached their highest pitch of enthusiasm whenever they pronounce the word Allah! which they do at least twenty times a minute: their voice is then raised to great loudness. The oldest dervish assists the sheikh, at whose right hand he is placed in quality of regulator: he animates his brethren both by voice and gesture, and thereby gives new vigour to their howlings. Now each of the dervishes adopts a peculiar bodily motion; sometimes from right to left, and at others backwards and forwards. This emblematic motion is, according to the founder, intended to represent the rolling and pitching of a ship when agitated with the waves: as the ocean may be said to have no bound, bottom, or shore, it is considered a feeble symbol of God's immensity. Now nothing is heard beyond stifled sounds issuing from the palpitating bosoms of the dervishes; the sweat falls from their foreheads,—their lips are covered with foam,—the veins of their necks are so swelled that they appear ready to burst. Some fall down, as if suddenly seized with epilepsy: they struggle in the arms of their brethren, still vociferating Allah! Some make a feint of swooning, and are instantly carried away. Others appear exhausted with fatigue; and at the very moment one would think they were going to die, they revive, and recommence their howlings with more fury than ever. Soon, as if in a delirium, they seize the sharp instruments that blood may be added to their bellowings.

But enthusiasm, however ardent, is not always willing to sustain much bodily pain, and knavery will carefully avoid it. These exhibitors take care to scratch the skin only; if a few drops of blood besmear the visage, their purpose is answered just as much as if they were to let their veins dry. Sometimes, indeed, some of the tribe may be found whose faces exhibit doleful marks; but these are no better than bunglers, and are doubtless the laughing-stock of their more adroit brethren.

The exercises we have described are called by the dervishes themselves Muchabêlê (exaltation of the glory of God), and Tewhid (celebration of the unity of God).

III. Seid-Ahmed-Rufai, who, in A.H. 578, died in a wood between Bagdad and Bassora, founded the order which bears his name.

This class of dervishes has great resemblance to the Bedevy, like whom they make devotion to consist in calling on the name of God in a tone so loud as to spend their breath. Their religious exercise, or office, is divided into five parts. The first consists of the namaz, recited in common, under the direction of the sheikh, to whom they testify the signs of respect which are due to his character. This prayer being ended, all stand upright, and in right line, occupying the centre of the room: all begin to chant verses from the Koran, moving their bodies at the same time in concert from right to left, but without changing their position; gradually they raise their voices, and accelerate their motions, according to the direction of their leader, who beats time with his hands. This second part of the service is ended by repeating the attributes of God: this they do with their eyes shut, and so long that their voice fails them. A few instants of repose succeed to such violent exertion. During the necessary suspension, one of the dervishes, occupying the centre of the line, furnishes himself with a pair of cymbals, the leader with a kettle-drum, and a third with a sort of tamborine. These instruments are struck up so as to produce a most discordant sound: this is the signal for the commencement of the third portion of service. The music serves as an accompaniment to the Hamdey-Muhammedy, or hymns in honour of Mohammed, which the leader chants, while the others join in a sort of chorus, consisting of the words Ya Allah! and Ya Hoo! These exclamations are terminated by howlings, which appear like a struggle, or trial, on the part of the dervishes, to compete with the barbarous music, that increases in discordance every moment. At the fourth division of the exercises, the sheikh orders the instruments to be laid aside, and the vocal part of the worship to be renewed. The Ilahis are then chanted,—Persian hymns composed by certain saintly dervishes. The motion of the body, which on the former occasion was from right to left, is now changed into a see-saw backwards and forwards: during this motion all cry Allah! and Hoo! with a quickness perpetually increasing, and with greater loudness than before. At this part of the performance, sharp swords, red hot, are brought into action, and delivered by the sheikh to the most dexterous of the band. These brandish the formidable weapon, and feign to apply it occasionally to their cheeks, or some other part of the body, and at the same time they describe innumerable circles with it. When this feat is performed with velocity and dexterity, who does not see that the eyes of the spectators may be deceived—that the sword never comes in contact with the bare skin? Lastly, to conclude the jugglery, some prayers are repeated by the sheikh, and a little spittle applied to cure a wound which was never inflicted.

DESATIR, a lately discovered collection of sixteen sacred books, consisting of the fifteen old Persian prophets, together with a book of Zoroaster. This, at least, is what the book itself pretends to be. The collection is written in a language not spoken at present anywhere, and equally different from the Zend, the Pehlvi, and the modern Persian. The last of the fifteen prophets, Sasan, who lived at the time of the downfall of the Sassanides, when the Arabians conquered the country, made a literal translation of the Desatir, which he accompanied with commentaries. This work was afterwards, until the seventeenth century, one of the chief sources of the ancient Persian religious doctrines, interwoven with astrology and demonology; and, after having been forgotten for about a century and a half, was discovered by a learned Parsée at Ispahan. His son, Mollah Firuz, was induced, by the Marquess of Hastings, to publish an edition of it at Bombay, in 1820, to which Erskine added an English translation. The translator, however, considers the collection as spurious; and Sylvester de Sacy (Journal des Savants, Feb. 1821) believes that the Desatir is the work of a Parsée in the fourth year of the Hegirah, who, as he thinks, invented the language in order to give to the collection, which is itself a collection of old traditions and significant mysteries, an air of genuineness. Joseph von Hammer, however, another very eminent orientalist, is said to consider it to be genuine. At all events, it is interesting to learn, from this work, with greater accuracy, an old religious system of the East, in which are to be found, with Pandemonium and the metempsychosis, the elements of the worship of the stars, of astrology, the theurgy, the doctrine of amulets, as well as the elements of the Hindoo religion, particularly the system of castes. Yet no trace of any connexion with the Zendavesta and the magic of the Parsées has been found in the Desatir.

DESCENT of Christ into hell. See HELL.

DESERATION, a term made use of to denote an unhappy state of mind, occasioned by the sensible influences of the divine favour being withdrawn. Some of the best men in all ages have suffered a temporary suspension of divine enjoyments, Job xxix. 2; Ps. li.; Isa. xlix. 14; Lam. iii. 1; Isaiah i. 10. The causes of this must not be attributed to the Almighty, since he is always the same, but must arise from ourselves. Neglect of duty, improper views of Providence, self-confidence, a worldly spirit, lukewarmness of mind, inattention to the means of grace, or open transgression, may be considered as leading to this state. The contrary opinion, which has been called the "Sovereignty of Desertions," is liable to many objections, and has been awfully employed to lull the conscience to sleep, and render it content to remain in a state of spiritual darkness, instead of its being excited to self-examination, repentance, and application to the only source of pardon, purification, and peace. As all things, however, are under the divine control, so even desertion, or, as it is sometimes expressed, "the hidings of God's face," may be useful to excite humility, exercise faith and patience, detach us from the world, prompt to more vigorous action, bring us to look more to God as the fountain of happiness, conform us to his word, and increase our desires for that state of blessedness which is to come.—Hervey's Ther. and Asp., dial. xix.; Watts's Medit. on Job xxiii. 3; Lambert's Serm., vol. i. ser. 16; Flavel's Works, vol. i. p. 167, folio.

DESTRUCTIONISTS, those who believe that the final punishment threatened in the Gospel to the wicked and impenitent, consists not in an eternal preservation in misery and torment, but in a total extinction of being, and that the sentence of annihilation shall be executed with more or less torment, preceding or attending the final period, in proportion to the greater or less guilt of the criminal.

The name assumed by this denomination, like those of many others, takes for granted the question in dispute, viz., that the Scripture word destruction means annihilation: in strict propriety of speech, they should be called Annihilationists. The doctrine is largely maintained in the sermons of Mr. Samuel Bourn, of Birmingham; it was held also by Mr. J. N. Scott, Dr. John Taylor, of Norwich, Mr. Marsom, and many others.

In defence of the system, Mr. Bourn argues as follows:—There are many passages of Scripture in which the ultimate punishment to which wicked men shall be adjudged is defined, in the most precise and intelligible terms, to be an everlasting destruction from the power of God, which is equally able to destroy as to preserve. So when our Saviour is fortifying the minds of his disciples against the power of men, and the punishment of his justice, he expresseth himself thus:—"Fear not them that kill the body, and after that have no more that they can do; fear him who is able to destroy both soul and body in hell." Here he plainly proposes the destruction of the soul (not its endless pain and misery) as the ultimate object of the divine displeasure, and the greatest object of our fear. And when he says, "These shall go away into everlasting punishment, but the righteous into life eternal," it appears evident that by that eternal punishment, which is set in opposition to eternal life, is not meant any kind of life, however miserable, but the same which the apostle expresses by everlasting destruction from the presence and power of the Lord. The very term, death, is most frequently made use of to signify the end of wicked men in another world, or the final effect of divine justice in their punishment. The wages of sin (saith the apostle) is death; but eternal life is the gift of God, through Christ Jesus our Lord. See also Rom. viii. 6.

To imagine that by the term death is meant an eternal life, though in a condition of extreme misery, seems, according to him, to be confounding all propriety and meaning of words. Death, when applied to the end of wicked men in a future state, he says, properly denotes a total extinction of life and being. It may contribute, he adds, to fix this meaning, if we observe that the state to which temporal death reduces men is usually termed by our Saviour and his apostles sleep; because from this death the soul shall be raised to life again: but from the other, which is fully and properly death, and of which the former is but an image or shadow, there is no recovery; it is an eternal death, an everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord, and the glory of his power.

He next proceeds to the figures by which the eternal punishment of wicked men is described, and finds them perfectly agreeing to establish the same doctrine. One figure of comparison, often used, is that of combustible materials thrown into a fire, which will consequently be entirely consumed, if the fire be not quenched. "Depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels." The meaning is a total irrevocable destruction; for, as the tree that bringeth not forth good fruit is hewn down and cast into the fire, and is destroyed; as the useless chaff, when separated from the good grain, is set on fire, and, if the fire be not quenched, is consumed: so, he thinks, it plainly appears, that the image of unquenchable or everlasting fire is not intended to signify the degree or duration of torment, but the absolute certainty of destruction, beyond all possibility of recovery. So the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah are said to have suffered the vengeance of an eternal fire; that is, they were so effectually consumed, or destroyed, that they could never be rebuilt; the phrase, eternal fire, signifying the irrevocable destruction of those cities, not the degree or duration of the misery of the inhabitants who perished.

The images of the worm that dieth not, and the fire that is not quenched, used in Mark ix. 43, are set in opposition to entering into life, and intended to denote a period of life and existence.

Our Saviour expressly assigns different degrees of future misery, in proportion to men's respective degrees of guilt, Luke xii. 47, 48. But if all wicked men shall suffer torments without end, how can any of them be said to suffer but a few stripes? All degrees and distinctions of punishment seem swallowed up in the notion of never-ending or infinite misery.

Finally, death and eternal destruction, or annihilation, is properly styled, in the New Testament, an everlasting punishment, as it is irrevocable and unalterable for ever; and it is most strictly and literally styled an everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord, and from the glory of his power.

Dr. Edwards, in his answer to Dr. Chauncey, on the salvation of all men, says that this scheme was provisionally retained by Dr. Chauncey, i. e. in case the scheme of universal salvation should fail him; and therefore Dr. Edwards, in his examination of that work, appropriates a chapter to the consideration of it. Among other reasonings against it are the following:—

1. The different degrees of punishment which the wicked will suffer according to their works, proves that it does not consist in annihilation, which admits of no degrees.

2. If it be said that the punishment of the wicked, though it will end in annihilation, yet shall be preceded by torment, and that this will be of different degrees, according to the degrees of sin; it may be replied, this is making it to be compounded partly of torment, and partly of annihilation. The latter also appears to be but a small part of future punishment, for that alone will be inflicted on the least sinner, and on account of the least sin; and that all punishment which will be inflicted on any person above that which is due to the least sin, is to consist in torment. Nay, if we can form any idea in the present state of what would be dreadful or desirable in another, instead of its being any punishment to be annihilated after a long series of torment, it must be a deliverance, to which the sinner would look forward with anxious desire. And is it credible that this was the termination of torment that our Lord held up to his disciples as an object of dread? Can this be the destruction of body and soul in hell? Is it credible that everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord, and from the glory of his power, should constitute only a part, and a small part, of future punishment; and such too as, after a series of torment, must, next to being made happy, be the most acceptable thing that could befall them? Can this be the object threatened by such language, as recompensing tribulation, and taking vengeance in flaming fire? 2 Thesa. i. Is it possible that God should threaten them with putting an end to their miseries? Moreover, this destruction is not described as the conclusion of a succession of torments, but as taking place immediately after the last judgment. When Christ shall come to be glorified in his saints, then shall the wicked be destroyed.

3. Everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord, and from the glory of his power, cannot mean annihilation; for that would be no exertion of divine power, but merely the suspension of it; for let the upholding power of God be withheld for one moment, and the whole creation would sink into nothing.

4. The punishment of wicked men will be the same as that of wicked angels, Matt. xxv. 41. "Depart, ye cursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels." But the punishment of wicked angels consists not in annihilation, but torment. Such is their present punishment in a degree, and such, in a greater degree, will be their punishment hereafter. They are "cast down to hell;" they "believe and tremble;" they are reserved in chains under darkness, to the judgment of the great day; they cried, saying, "What have we to do with thee? Art thou come to torment us before our time?" Could the devils but persuade themselves they should be annihilated, they would believe and be at ease rather than tremble.

5. The Scriptures explain their own meaning in the use of such terms as death, destruction, &c. The second death is expressly said to consist in being cast into the lake of fire and brimstone, and as having a part in that lake, Rev. xx. 14; xxi. 8; which does not describe annihilation, nor can it be made to consist with it. The phrase, "cut him asunder," Matt. xxiv. 51, is as strong as those of death or destruction; yet that is made to consist of having their portion with hypocrites, where shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth.

6. The happiness of the righteous does not consist in eternal being, but eternal well-being; and as the punishment of the wicked stands every where opposed to it, it must consist, not in the loss of being, but of well-being, and in suffering the contrary.

The great Dr. Watts may be considered, in some measure, a destructionist; since it was his opinion that the children of ungodly parents who die in infancy are annihilated. See ANNIHILATION, HELL; Bourn's Sermons; Dr. Edwards on the Salvation of all Men strictly examined; Adams's View of Religions.

DETRACTION, in the native importance of the word, signifies the withdrawing or taking off from a thing; and as it is applied to the reputation, it denotes the impairing or lessening a man in point of fame, rendering him less valued and esteemed by others. Dr. Barrow observes, (Works, vol. i. ser. 19.) that it differs from slander, which involves an imputation of falsehood; from reviling, which includes bitter and foul language; and from censuring, which is of a more general purport, extending indifferently to all kinds of persons, qualities, and actions; but detraction especially respects worthy persons, good qualities, and laudable actions, the reputation of which it aimeth to destroy. It is a fault opposed to candour.

Nothing can be more incongruous with the spirit of the Gospel, the example of Christ, the command of God, and the love of mankind, than a spirit of detraction; and yet there are many who never seem happy but when they are employed in this work: they feed and live upon the supposed infirmities of others; they allow excellence to none; they depreciate every thing that is praiseworthy; and, possessed of no good themselves, they think all others are like them. "O my soul! come thou not into their secret; unto their assembly, mine honour, be not thou united."

DEUTEROCANONICAL, in the school theology, an appellation given to certain books of holy Scripture, which were added to the canon after the rest, either by reason they were not written till after the compilation of the canon, or by reason of some dispute as to their canonicity. The word is Greek, being compounded of δεύτερος, second; and κανονικός, canonical.

The Jews, it is certain, acknowledged several books in their canon, which were put there later than the rest. They say that, under Esdras, a great assembly of their doctors, which they call, by way of eminence, the "great synagogue," made the collection of the sacred books which we now have in the Hebrew Old Testament; and they agree that they put books therein which had not been so before the Babylonish captivity; such as those of Daniel, Ezekiel, Haggai, &c.; and those of Esdras and Nehemiah. And the Romish Church has since added others to the canon, that were not, and could not be, in the canon of the Jews, by reason some of them were not composed till after—such as the book of Ecclesiasticus, with several of the apocryphal books, as the Maccabees, Wisdom, &c. Others were added still later, by reason their canonicity had not been yet examined; and till such examen and judgment, they might be set aside at pleasure. But since that church has pronounced as to the canonicity of those books, there is no more room now for her members to doubt of them, than there was for the Jews to doubt of those of the canon of Esdras. And the deuterocanonical books are with them as canonical as the protocanonical; the only difference between them consisting in this—that the canonicity of the one was not generally known, examined, and settled, as soon as that of the others. The deuterocanonical books in the modern canon are, the book of Esther, either the whole, or at least the seven last chapters thereof; the epistle to the Hebrews; that of James, and that of Jude; the second of Peter, the second and third of John, and the Revelation. The deuterocanonical parts of books are, the Hymn of the Three Children; the Prayer of Azariah; the Histories of Sussannah, of Bel and the Dragon; the last chapter of Mark; the bloody sweat; and the appearance of the angel, related in Luke, ch. xxii., and the history of the adulterous woman in John, ch. viii. See CANON.

DEVIL, the leader of the fallen angels, and the arch-foe of God and man. The name, like the French diable, German teuffel, Latin diabolus, is only a modified form of the Greek word δαιβολος, which, from διαβαλλειν, to calumniate, properly signifies calumniator, detractor, false accuser, &c. In the Syriac language, he is called achelkartzo, “the devourer of calumny,” which most emphatically expresses the delight which he takes in every attempt that is made to blast the character of good and holy men. It deserves to be particularly noticed, that though the term “devils,” in the plural, occurs frequently in the English version, in application to fallen spirits, the original word is not, in such instances, δαιβολοι, but δαιμονες, or δαιμονια. When used in the plural, δαιβολος never refers to fallen angels, but to human beings. See 1 Tim. iii. 11; 2 Tim. iii. 43; Titus ii. 3. There is, therefore, according to the strict propriety of Scripture language, only one devil, who is otherwise characterised by the epithets, the god and prince of this world; the prince of darkness; the prince of the power of the air; the accuser; Belial; the tempter; an adversary, deceiver, liar, &c. His power, though infinitely short of omnipotence, is represented as great and extensive; and his influence, exerted either immediately by himself, or through the agency of the innumerable multitude of wicked spirits who are enlisted in his service, is set forth as fearful in the extreme. Yet truly appalling as are the power and influence of this malignant demon, it is nevertheless a fact, substantiated no less by the testimony of Scripture than by the experience of mankind, that they may successfully be resisted by the weakest moral agent who shall avail himself of the means placed at his disposal for this end by his benevolent and merciful Creator. Nothing, therefore, can possibly be more absurd than for sinners to attempt to exculpate themselves by throwing the blame of their wicked actions on the devil. Tempt them, he may; and his methods of seduction are various, and well adapted to compass his ends; but force them to the commission of one sin, he cannot. “Resist the devil, and he will flee from you.” “Whom resist steadfast in the faith.” James iv. 7; 1 Peter v. 9. The position attempted to be maintained by the Socinians, that by Satan we are merely to understand “a symbolical person,” “the principle of evil personified,” “a fictitious personage,” “an evil disposition,” &c., cannot be reconciled with any rational or consistent principles of Scripture interpretation, and deserves to be classed with the hypothesis, that our Saviour himself had no real existence, but, as described by the evangelists, is only a personification of virtue or moral excellence.

DEVOTEE, in the primary sense of the word, means a person wholly given up to acts of piety and devotion; but it is usually understood, in a bad sense, to denote a bigot or superstitious person—one addicted to excessive and self-imposed religious exercises.

DEVOTION, a religious and fervent exercise of some public act of religion, or a temper and disposition of the mind rightly affected with such exercises. It is also taken for certain religious practices which a person makes it a rule to discharge regularly. Wherever the vital and unadulterated spirit of Christian devotion prevails, its immediate objects will be to adore the perfections of God; to entertain with reverence and complacency the various intimations of his pleasure, especially those contained in holy writ; to acknowledge our absolute dependence on, and infinite obligations to him; to confess and lament the disorders of our nature, and the transgressions of our lives; to implore his grace and mercy through Jesus Christ; to intercede for our brethren of mankind; to pray for the propagation and establishment of truth, righteousness, and peace, on earth; in fine, to long for a more entire conformity to the will of God, and to breathe after the everlasting enjoyment of his friendship. The effects of such a spirit habitually cherished, and feelingly expressed before him, must surely be important and happy. Among these may be reckoned a profound humility in the sight of God, a high veneration for his presence and attributes, an ardent zeal for his worship and honour, a constant imitation of our Saviour's divine example, a diffusive charity for men of all denominations, a generous and unwearied self-denial, a total resignation to Providence, an increasing esteem for the gospel, with clearer and firmer hopes of that immortal life which it has brought to light.

DIARY, a private register in which are recorded the views and experience of individuals, and their observations on passing events. The practice of keeping such a record it would be obviously wrong to inculcate strenuously on all Christians. Thousands have not the education or capacity which it requires. Many to whom it might not be otherwise impracticable, are so situated in providence, that they cannot command the necessary leisure. In some instances, it has been performed in so unguarded a manner, or such injudicious uses have been made of the document by surviving relatives or friends, that among all who felt an interest either in the posthumous reputation of the parties, or in the advancement of practical religion, it has excited only sentiments of sincere regret. Owing to the profound treachery and depravity of the human heart, the keeping of a diary, it has been alleged, has sometimes manifestly originated in a legal or an ostentatious disposition, and has merely supplied fuel for spiritual pride. The idea that the record will sooner or later meet the eyes of men, and recommend the writer to their esteem and admiration as a person of eminent piety, is apt, at least, to mingle itself with purer views, and even unconsciously to exercise a considerable influence on the statements, and the expressions employed. These and similar considerations have determined some of the most excellent ministers and private Christians to forbear the practice in question. With whatever vigilance they may inwardly have regarded the Lord's procedure towards them, and the varied workings of their own hearts, and with whatever zeal and activity they have aspired after proficiency in the divine life, it has been their decided purpose to record little or nothing on such subjects. Others, after writing a diary for years, have committed the whole, or the greater part of it, to the flames. In some cases, good men, on the verge of eternity, have been induced by a sense of duty, or by the importunity of friends, to prepare a succinct narrative of their life and experience, for the satisfaction and benefit of a private circle, if not for the advantage of the religious public.

The published journals, however, of some exemplary Christians have been so judiciously written, and have proved so highly useful for the direction and encouragement of others in the service of God, that it is a cause of lively gratitude that ever they existed, and that they were ever given to the world. Who will say that it is wrong in any Christian, possessing the requisite ability and leisure, provided he observe the dictates of modesty and prudence, and strive in dependence on divine grace, to be actuated only by pious and honourable motives, to record from time to time a few notices of what is most material in his own experience? The review of such memoranda, after months and years have passed away, may call to his recollection facts in his history important to himself, which without such help, he would have utterly forgotten; and may serve not only to awaken fresh sentiments of humility and gratitude, but to incite to renewed ardour and circumspection in the path of righteousness.

To ministers of the gospel, whose official character obliges them to bestow much attention on the spiritual interests of others, the keeping of a diary has been recommended as an excellent means of preventing them from overlooking or neglecting their own.

DIET is the name given to an Assembly of the States of Germany. The following is a short notice of the principal diets which were held in reference to the affairs of the Reformation. They are inserted in the order of time in which they were held.

1. THE DIET OF WORMS, in 1521, where Alexander, the pope's nuncio, having charged Luther with heresy, the Duke of Saxony said, that Luther ought to be heard; which the emperor granted, and sent a pass to him, provided he would not preach in his journey. Luther being at Worms, protested that he would not recant, except they should show his errors by the word of God alone, and not by that of men. Therefore the emperor ordered him to go out of Worms, and a month after, by an edict published the 26th of May, before all the princes of Germany, outlawed him.

2. DIET OF NUREMBERG, in 1523, where Francis Cheregat, Pope Adrian Vith's nuncio, demanded the execution of Leo Xth's bull, and of Charles Vth's edict published at Worms against Luther. But it was answered that it was necessary to call a council in Germany, to satisfy the nation about its grievances, which were reduced to a hundred articles, some whereof aimed at the destruction of the Pope's authority, and the discipline of the Roman Church. They added, that in the interim, the Lutherans should be commanded not to write against the Roman Catholics, &c. All these things were brought into the form of an edict published in the emperor's name.

3. DIET OF NUREMBERG, in 1524. Cardinal Campege, Pope Clement VIIth's legate, entered incognito into the town, for fear of exasperating the people. There the Lutherans having the advantage, it was decreed that, with the emperor's consent, the pope should call a council in Germany; but in the interim an assembly should be held at Spire, to determine what was to be believed and practised; and that, to obey the emperor, the princes ought to order the observation of the edict of Worms as strictly as they could. Charles V. being angry at this, commanded the edict of Worms to be observed very strictly, and prohibited the assembly at Spire.

4. DIET OF SPIRE, in 1526. Charles V. being in Spain, named his brother, the Archduke Ferdinand, to preside over that Assembly, where the Duke of Saxony and the Landgrave of Hesse demanded at first a free exercise of the Lutheran religion, so that the Lutherans preached there publicly against the Pope; and the Lutheran princes' servants had these five capital letters, V. D. M. I. Æ., embroidered on their sleeves, signifying Verbum Domini manet in Eternum, to show publicly that they would follow nothing else but the pure word of God. The archduke not daring to oppose those courses, proposed two things: the first, concerning the ancient religion which was to be obtained in observing the edict of Worms; and the second, concerning the help demanded by Lewis King of Hungary against the Turks. About the first, the Lutherans prevailing, it was decreed that the emperor should be desired to call a general or national council in Germany within a year, and that, in the interim, every one was to have liberty of conscience. And whilst they were deliberating in vain about the second, the valiant King Lewis was defeated and killed at the battle of Mohats.

5. DIET OF SPIRE, in 1529. There it was decreed, "That in all places where the edict of Worms against the Lutherans was received, it should be lawful to nobody to change his opinions; but in the countries where the new religion was received, it should be lawful to continue in it till the next council, if the ancient religion could not be re-established there without sedition; nevertheless the mass was not to be abolished there, and no Roman Catholic was to be allowed to turn Lutheran; that the Sacramentarians should be banished out of the empire, and the Anabaptists put to death; and that preachers should nowhere preach against the doctrine of the church." This decree destroying that of the first diet, six Lutheran princes, viz., the Elector of Saxony, the Marquess of Brandenburg, the two Dukes of Lunenburg, the Landgrave of Hesse, and the Prince of Anhalt, with the deputies of fourteen imperial towns, protested in writing two days after in the assembly against that decree, which they would not obey, it being contrary to the gospel; and appealed to the general or national council, to the emperor, and to any other unsuspected judge. From that solemn protestation came that famous name of Protestants, which the Lutherans took presently, and the Calvinists, and other reformed Christians, afterwards. They also protested that they would contribute nothing towards the war against the Turks till the exercise of their religion was free in all Germany. This protestation being presented to the emperor, he said that he would settle the affairs of Germany as soon as he had regulated those of Italy. The next year after, he called the famous diet of Augsburg spoken of before.

6. DIET OF AUGSBURGH, in the year 1530. It was called by the Emperor Charles V. to re-unite the princes about some matters of religion, and to join them all together against the Turks. The emperor appeared there with the greatest magnificence that was ever seen in Germany; because so many electors and princes never met together before. There the Elector of Saxony, followed by many princes, presented the Confession of Faith, called the Confession of Augsburg. The conference about matters of faith and discipline being concluded, the emperor ended the diet by a decree, that nothing should be altered in the doctrine and ceremonies of the Roman Church, till a council should order it otherwise.

7. DIET OF RATISBON, in 1541, for reuniting the Protestants with the Roman Catholics. The pope's legate having altered the twenty-two articles drawn by some learned doctors, the emperor proposed to choose some learned divines that might agree peaceably upon the articles; and being desired by the diet to choose them himself, he named three Roman Catholics, viz. Julius Phlengius, John Gropperus, and John Ekius; and three Protestants, viz. Philip Melancthon, Martin Bucer, and John Pistorius; but after an examination and disputation of a whole month, these divines could never agree about more than five or six articles, wherein the diet found some difficulties still. Therefore the emperor, to end those controversies, ordered by an edict, that the decisions of the doctors should be referred to a general council, or to the national council of all Germany, or to the next diet eighteen months after; and that, in the meanwhile, the Protestants should keep the articles agreed upon, forbidding them to solicit any body to change the ancient religion, &c. But to please the Protestants, he gave them leave by patent to keep their religion, notwithstanding the edict.

8. DIET OF RATISBON, in 1546, where none of the Protestant confederate princes appeared; nevertheless, it was decreed by the plurality of votes, that the council of Trent was to be followed, which the Protestant deputies opposed; and thus caused a war against them.

9. DIET OF AUGSBURGH, in 1547, about matters of religion; the electors being divided concerning the decisions of the council of Trent, the emperor demanded that the management of this affair should be left to him, and it was resolved that every one should conform to the council's decisions.

10. DIET OF AUGSBURGH, in 1548, where the commissioners named to examine some memoirs about a confession of faith, not agreeing together, the emperor named three divines, who drew the design of that famous Interim, so well known in Germany and elsewhere.

11. DIET OF AUGSBURGH, in 1550, where the emperor complained that the Interim was not observed, and demanded that all should submit to the council which they were going to renew at Trent; but Duke Maurice's deputies protested that their master did submit to the council on this condition, that the divines of the confession of Augsburg, not only should be heard there, but should vote also like the Roman Catholic bishops, and that the pope should not preside. But by the plurality of votes the submission to the council was resolved upon.

12. DIET OF RATISBON, in 1557. The assembly demanded a conference between some famous doctors of both parties; which conference, held at Worms in September, between twelve Roman Catholic divines and twelve Lutheran, was soon dissolved by the Lutherans dividing among themselves.

DIET is also used, in the Scotch Church, to denote the public service which any minister has to perform. Thus, if he has to preach three times on any given Sabbath, it is said he has three diets.

DIGGERS, a denomination which sprung up in Germany in the fifteenth century; so called because they dug holes for their assemblies under ground in caves and forests. They derided the church, its ministers and sacraments.

DILIGENCE, CHRISTIAN, is constancy in the performance of all those duties enjoined us in God's sacred word. It includes activity and vigour—watchfulness against intruding objects—firmness and resolution—patience and perseverance. The shortness of our time; the importance of our work; the pleasure which arises from discharging duty; the uncertainty of the time of our dissolution; the consciousness we do not labour in vain; together with the example of Christ and all good men, should excite us to the most unwearied diligence in the cause of God, of truth, and our own souls.

DISMISSORY LETTER, a letter given by a bishop to a candidate for holy orders, having a title in his diocese, directed to some other bishop, and giving leave for the bearer to be ordained by him.

DIOCESE (Greek διοίκησις, administration), an ecclesiastical division, which originated in the arrangement made by Constantine in the fourth century, when Christianity was made the religion of the state. This took place in accordance with the new division of the empire into 120 provinces, governed by twelve vicars or sub-prefects. Among the Romanists it signifies the territory over which the jurisdiction of an archbishop or bishop extends. With the Protestants in Germany, it signifies all the parishes that are under the inspection of one superintendent. In England, the province of Canterbury contains twenty-one dioceses, and the province of York three; each diocese is divided into archdeaconries, each archdeaconry into rural deaneries, and each deanery into parishes.

DIRECTORY, a kind of regulation for the performance of religious worship, drawn up by the assembly of divines in England, at the instance of the parliament, in 1644. It was designed to supply the place of the Liturgy, or Book of Common Prayer, the use of which they had abolished. It consisted of some general heads, which were to be managed and filled up at discretion; for it prescribed no form of prayer, or circumstances of external worship, nor obliged the people to any responses, excepting Amen. The substance of it is as follows:—It forbids all salutations and civil ceremony in the churches;—the reading the Scriptures in the congregation is declared to be part of the pastoral office;—all the canonical books of the Old and New Testament (but not of the Apocrypha) are to be publicly read in the vulgar tongue: how large a portion is to be read at once, is left to the minister, who has likewise the liberty of expounding, when he judges it necessary. It prescribes heads for the prayer before sermon; it delivers rules for preaching the word; the introduction to the text must be short and clear, drawn from words or context, or some parallel place of Scripture. In dividing the text, the minister is to regard the order of the matter more than that of the words: he is not to burden the memory of his audience with too many divisions, nor perplex their understanding with logical phrases and terms of art; he is not to start unnecessary objections; and he is to be very sparing in citations from ecclesiastical or other human writers, ancient or modern, &c. The Directory recommends the use of the Lord's Prayer as the most perfect model of devotion; it forbids private or lay persons to administer baptism, and enjoins it to be performed in the face of the congregation. It orders the communion table at the Lord's Supper to be so placed, that the communicants may sit about it. It also orders that the Sabbath be kept with the greatest strictness, both publicly and privately; that marriage be solemnized by a lawful minister of the word, who is to give counsel to, and pray for the parties; that the sick be visited by the minister under whose charge they are; the dead to be buried without any prayers or religious ceremonies; that days of fasting are to be observed when the judgments of God are abroad, or when some important blessings are desired: that days of thanksgiving for mercies received be also observed; and, also, that singing of psalms together in the congregation is the duty of Christians. In an appendix to this Directory it is ordered, that all festivals, vulgarly called holydays, are to be abolished; that no day is to be kept but the Lord's Day; and that as no place is capable of any holiness under the pretence of consecration, no neither is it subject to pollution by any superstition formerly used; and therefore it is held requisite, that the places of public worship now used should still be continued and employed. Should the reader be desirous of perusing this Directory at large, he may find it at the end of Neale's History of the Puritans.

DISCIPLE, a scholar, or one who attends the lectures, and professes the tenets of another. A disciple of Christ is one who believes his doctrines, imbibes his spirit, and follows his example. See CHRISTIAN.

DISCIPLES OF CHRIST, (CAMPELLITES, OR REFORMERS,) a sect which recently sprang up in America, chiefly owing to the efforts of Alexander Campbell, who with his father, Thomas Campbell, renounced Presbyterianism, and became a keen immersionist. They amount in number to at least 100,000. Regarding all the sects and parties in the Christian world as having more or less departed from the primitive faith and practice, chiefly owing to the influence of metaphysics, creeds, synods, &c., they profess to avoid entirely the artificial and technical language of theology, and to teach the household of faith to use no dialect but that of Scripture. Regarding Calvinism, Arminianism, Trinitarianism, and Antitrinitarianism, &c., as extremes produced by each other, they reject them all, and build their faith on the simple doctrines of the Bible. Immersion they consider to be a pledge of the actual remission of all past sins, and of adoption into the family of God. In most points of belief and discipline, they seem to come pretty near the Sandemanian Baptists.

DISCIPLINARIANS, those in Baxter's time, who advocated the cause of pure communion. "Those that pleaded for discipline were called by the new name of disciplinarians; as if it had been a kind of heresy to desire discipline in the church."

DISCIPLINE, CHURCH, the application in a Christian church of those principles and rules, derived from divine authority, which regard the purity, order, peace, and useful efficiency of its members. Discipline is to a church, what order and regularity are to a family; or the maintaining of government and the administration of law to a nation. With respect to its object, it must carefully be observed, that it is not to pander to human domination, or to subserve the political interests of any party; to coerce the judgment and conscience of men; or to avenge any public or private injury; but it is designed to effect the observance of those means by which the holiness, comfort, and usefulness of Christians may be preserved and improved; to exhibit the influence of the Christian religion in producing all that is excellent, amiable, and beneficial; to secure the fulfilment of all the relative obligations of church union; to attract into such union persons whose minds and characters are governed by evangelical truth, and undissembled piety; and to remove from the visible ranks of the faithful such as prove themselves to be unworthy of a place among the followers of Christ. Matt. xviii. 15—18; 1 Cor. v.; 2 Thess. iii. 6; and Tit. iii. 10, 11: and other passages in the New Testament clearly recognise, or positively or authoritatively enforce, the exercise of discipline in the church of Christ; and it becomes all who bow to his spiritual rule, to hear what the Spirit saith on this point to the churches. See Lib. of Eccl. Know., and Hal-dane's Social Worship.

DISCIPLINE, BOOK OF, in the History of the Church of Scotland, is a common order drawn up by the assembly of ministers, in 1650, for the reformation and uniformity to be observed in the discipline and policy of the church. In this book, the government of the church by prelates is set aside; kirk sessions are established; the superstitious observation of fast days and saints' days is condemned, and other regulations for the government of the church are determined. This book was approved by the privy council, and is called the first book of discipline.

DISPENSATION, a particular form of the divine administration of the church, and of the world in relation to the church. In this view of the matter, there have been several dispensations or forms of the revealed administration of Heaven, all adapted to the purpose of God for the time, and all tending to the same great end. The present dispensation supposes that there may have been one or more past dispensations, and that there may be a dispensation yet to come. It may be in itself complete, or it may bear some relation both to a former and a future economy. It may be the conclusion or completion of that which has passed away, and the preparation for something that is to come. We cannot, therefore, arrive at correct views of its nature, without forming some correct estimate of what preceded it, and having some general notion of what is to follow it.

That changes of dispensation, in the sense in which the expression has been explained, have already occurred, and that one more is yet to follow, cannot for a moment be doubted by any one who is even superficially acquainted with the Scriptures. Such changes, however, by no means imply any fickleness or actual change on the part of God. It is not, indeed, so much change as progress we are called to mark. The gradual development of the successive parts of a great plan, so far from evincing alteration of purpose on the part of the contriver, is often a proof of the contrary; affords evidence of the penetrating wisdom and forethought which foresees future contingencies, and effectually provides against defeating the original design. The light of the early dawn, by whose medium we imperfectly see surrounding objects, and often mistake their nature, is of the same character, and proceeds from the same source, with that meridian brightness which converts objects of terror or disgust into a scene of surpassing and ravishing splendour. So it is with the dispensations of God. The morning star, which threw a faint and twinkling ray on the once fair but then gloomy scenes of paradise, was the harbinger of the brighter and steadier light of a distant period. The light which then dawned, though occasionally dimmed, and sometimes seemingly overpowered by the dark atmosphere through which it had to penetrate, was never afterwards entirely withdrawn. On the contrary, it gradually, though slowly, increased, diffusing through many ages a pale but celestial radiance, till at last it burst forth upon an astonished world, in the peerless splendour of the Sun of righteousness.

The first of the divine dispensations was adapted to man in a state of primeval innocence and purity. It placed him on the ground of equitable right and treatment. Its object was to make trial of the moral integrity and fidelity of a creature, formed holy and happy, but entirely dependent on God. Nothing occurred but what had been foreseen, and for the consequences of which full preparation had not been made. The creature's fall, though deeply mysterious, did not frustrate the Divine intention, or necessarily involve any change on the part of God, except in the revealed method of treatment. Mercy rejoiced against judgment—a new view was presented of the character of the Most High, and the boundless resources of his wisdom and benevolence were discovered to the intelligent universe. Then began the reign or the dispensation of grace; by which, to the angels, principalities, and powers, in heavenly places, Jehovah has been manifesting, in his conduct to the church, his manifold wisdom.

The destruction of the old world, and its renovation by the waters of the deluge, brought a new discovery of God's future intentions, and placed the earth and its inhabitants under another covenant or dispensation, the benefits of which all human creatures enjoy, and some of the provisions of which are to last till the earth shall be destroyed and purified by a deluge of fire.

The selection of Abraham and his seed was a further manifestation of the divine designs, and brought along with it fresh discoveries of that future blessing which all the nations of the earth are ultimately to inherit. The choice of Abraham was an exercise and display of sovereign mercy; his justification by faith in the divine promise was designed as the pattern of the justification of all believers; the influence of his faith on his character was intended to illustrate the operation of that powerful principle; while in the preservation and treatment of the Abrahamic family, God at once illustrated various parts of his own character—established the truth of former discoveries, and prepared the way for the accomplishment of future designs of mercy. So perfect is the correspondence between the dispensation of Abraham and that of Jesus, that all the children of faith are declared to be the children of Abraham, and blessed with him. If we be Christ's, we are assured that we are then Abraham's seed, and heirs according to the promise; heirs of that world which was promised to the father of the faithful, through the righteousness of faith, and which is insured to all believers, by the engagements of God's covenant.

But the present dispensation stands in a peculiar relation to the covenant made with Israel at Sinai, which it has entirely superseded, and with which it is often contrasted in Scripture. So important is a right understanding of the Mosaic covenant to a correct knowledge and due appreciation of the blessings of the present covenant, that I believe I hazard no mistaken observation when I say, that nine-tenths of the mistakes which have beclouded and injured Christianity, have arisen from the introduction into it of Jewish principles, practices, and errors. This was the early bane of the primitive churches, the evil against which the apostles had to struggle and to protest; which was the fruitful parent of the numerous sects and heresies into which Christianity became early divided, and which accounts for a large proportion of the difference of opinion that still prevails among Christians. I am altogether in error, if this is not the root of many of the mistaken views of the future state of the kingdom of Christ, which are entertained by those who consider that they have obtained more than common insight into the secret things of God, and who are as familiar with the visions of the apocalypse as with the first principles of the gospel.

What, then, was the dispensation of Moses? This is a question to which it is by no means easy to return an answer, not so much from the difficulty which attaches to the subject, as from the narrow limits of a single discourse. It was a peculiar form of administering the affairs of the church of God while it was in a state of pupillage and servitude, and by which both the church and the world were prepared for the establishment of a better and more enduring economy. In it, God appeared chiefly in the character of a lawgiver, and the system of his administration was a species of tutorage and discipline adapted to the condition of a weak, carnal, and worldly people. Under that form of God's covenant, men became members of his kingdom by birth and parentage,—entitled to its privileges by external conformity to its prescribed ritual,—and enjoyed, under a theocracy, peculiar immunities, while they were subject to special and severe penalties. The law of Moses, or the system of rites which may be thus designated, was fleshly, and suited to the character and circumstances of a carnal people. The washings of water tended only to the purifying of the flesh; the blood of bulls and of calves, and the ashes of a heifer, could extend their influence no farther; meats, and drinks, and days, could not establish the heart with grace, and often profited not those who were occupied therein. The sanctions of the law, whether in the form of promise or of penalty, were of the same earthly description, being limited, in a great measure, to the life that now is; all that belonged to that which is to come arising from a different system from that of Moses. In its general features, that system was harsh, pompous, and inflexible; mainly calculated to operate on the principle of fear, and admirably fitted to gender a spirit of bondage. Attractive, in some of its features, to the worldly eye, and accommodated to those who could not bear a more spiritual institute; but repulsive and unaccommodating to the spiritual mind, and little fitted to produce childlike confidence and heavenly joy. The schoolmaster with his rod, the lawgiver with his unbending rule, the judge with his unmitigable sentence, stood over the disciples of Moses to coerce them into obedience, or to punish them for the violations of his law. In perfect keeping with the circumstances in which it was delivered, it spake in thunder, in lightning, and in tempest, causing those who heard its voice, like those who witnessed its proclamation, exceedingly to fear and quake.

"The law made nothing perfect, being intended only as the introduction of a better hope." Its sacrifices, and the priesthood which was founded on them, were only shadows, and not even the images of the good things which were to come. The tabernacle and vessels of the ministry—the temple and all its glory—the land of Canaan, and the Jerusalem that was on earth—were but figures to the time then being of the great transactions of the world to come, of which we speak. Unfitted by its very nature and enactments to be an universal and permanent dispensation, the seeds of dissolution were implanted in its constitution, and preparation was made for its abrogation long before it took place. Adapted to the locality of Palestine, and never designed to extend far beyond it, the spirit of propagation and enterprise was neither recommended by its author, nor congenial with its institutions. Limited to place, temporary in duration, and preparatory in its whole design, it gradually decayed and waxed old, and was ready to vanish away, even without a positive act of dissolution—when He, whose voice shook Sinai to its foundation, once more shook, not the earth only, but also heaven; removing, by one sweeping blow, the things that were shaken, and establishing in their place the kingdom which cannot be moved.

This is the kingdom which we have received—the dispensation to which we belong—which the apostle enjoins us to hold fast, that thus we may have grace to serve God acceptably, with reverence and godly fear.

In contrast, therefore, with the old dispensation, its character may be summed up in three words,—SPIRITUAL, UNIVERSAL, PERPETUAL. It is spiritual in its nature, universal in its adaptation and design, and destined for no temporary or subordinate purpose, but to last while the world itself shall endure; till the suffering kingdom on earth be exchanged for God's unsuffering kingdom in heaven.

DISPENSATIONS OF PROVIDENCE are any particular or unusual modes of visible treatment to which, under the divine government, mankind are subjected. They are either merciful, or in judgment; though what frequently appear to belong to the latter class are only blessings in disguise.

DISPERSION of mankind was occasioned by the confusion of tongues at the overthrow of Babel, Gen. xi. 9. As to the manner of the dispersion of the posterity of Noah from the plain of Shinar, it was undoubtedly conducted with the utmost regularity and order. The sacred historian informs us, that they were divided in their lands; every one according to his tongue, according to his family, and according to his nation, Gen. x. 5, 20, 31. The ends of this dispersion were to populate the earth, to prevent idolatry, and to display the divine wisdom and power. See CONFUSION OF TONGUES.

DISSENTERS, those who separate from, or refuse to have any fellowship with the established church. Their origin may be traced as far back as the times of Wickliffe; but it was the year 1662 which formed the famous era of nonconformity, and laid the foundation of that more prominent and marked separation which was afterwards effected, and has continued ever since. At that period, and for some time after, the Presbyterians were the most numerous and influential section of the dissenting body in England; but for a century past their interest has been gradually declining, owing to the introduction among them of Arian and Socinian leaven; and, at the present day, with the exception of some fifty or sixty orthodox congregations in the north of England, they are all Socinian. Their number amounts to little more than 200; and most of them consist only of a few individuals. During that century, and especially during what has passed of the present, the congregational churches have greatly multiplied, so that according to a statistic summary made in 1829, their number amounted to 1289. The number of Baptist congregations, at the same time, amounted to 888. Add to which numerous other congregations of dissenters, though not connected with the bodies just mentioned, and it may safely be estimated, that the total number of orthodox dissenting congregations in England amounts nearly to 2500; containing an aggregate of between 800,000 and 900,000 hearers.

The Methodists, though they do not allow themselves to be called dissenters, are also in a state of separation from the Church of England, and have nearly 3000 places of worship, and little short of 1,000,000 hearers.

Dissenters object to the Church of England on the following, among other grounds. 1. That the church, as by law established and governed, is the mere creature of the state, as much as the army, the navy, the courts of justice, or the boards of customs and excise. 2. That she professes and asserts that the church hath power to decree rites and ceremonies, and authority in matters of faith. 3. That she has a multiplicity of offices and dignities which are utterly at variance with the simplicity of the apostolic and primitive times. 4. That the repetitions in her liturgy are numberless and vain; that, in many respects, it abounds in antiquated references and allusions, and, in others, is miserably deficient. 5. That the Apocrypha is read as a part of the public service. 6. That the creeds which she acknowledges and repeats, contain unwarrantable metaphysical representations and speculations relative to the doctrine of the Trinity. 7. That every one who is baptized is considered to be thereby regenerated and really received into the family of God. 8. That this rite, together with confirmation, the visitation of the sick, and the burial service, have a most manifest tendency to deceive and ruin the souls of men. Lastly, and more urgently than any other, that no distinction is made between the holy and the profane; the ordinances of religion being administered, without discrimination, to all who present themselves to receive them. The church and the world are thus completely amalgamated; and, as far as the system can be carried out, the nation is the church, and the church the nation.

The Scotch dissenters are chiefly Presbyterians, who object to the Established Presbyterian Church on the ground of the exercise of patronage, and other encroachments on the rights and consciences of the people. They are a numerous and influential body. A considerable congregational interest has also sprung up within the last thirty years, which at present numbers eighty-four churches, and has been the means of effecting much good in different parts of the country.

DISSIDENTS, a term sometimes applied to dissenters from the Church of England, but more commonly and particularly used of those in Poland, who, since the year 1736, are allowed the free exercise of their respective modes of worship, including Lutherans, Calvinists, Greeks, and Arminians, but excluding Anabaptists, Socinians, and Quakers. As early as the time of Luther the Reformation was introduced into Poland. During the reign of Sigismund Augustus (1548-72) great numbers of the people, and even half of the members of the diet, and more than half of the nobility, were Lutherans or Calvinists. The convention of Sandomir, concluded in 1570, united the Lutherans, Calvinists, and Bohemian brethren into one church—a union which had also a political tendency, and whose members obtained the same rights with the Catholics by the religious peace (par dissidentium) sworn by the king in 1573. But the great mistake in not settling the mutual relations of the two religious parties, gave rise to bloody contests. Although the rights of the dissidents were afterwards repeatedly confirmed, they were gradually repealed, particularly in 1717 and 1718, in the reign of Augustus II., when they were deprived of the right of voting in the diet. They lost still more some years afterwards (1733) under Augustus III.; and, in the diet of pacification, as it was called, in 1736, an old statute, requiring every Polish king to be of the Catholic Church, was revived. After the succession of the last king, Stanislaus Poniatovsky, the dissidents brought their grievances before the diet held in 1766, and were supported in their claims by Russia, Denmark, Prussia, and England. Russia, in particular, profited by the occasion to extend her influence in the affairs of Poland, supported them strongly by her mediation, in bringing about a new convention in 1767, by which they were again placed on an equal footing with the Catholics. The diet of 1768 repealed the decrees which had been formerly passed against them. The war against the confederates breaking out, however, and the kingdom being dismembered, nothing was accomplished until the year 1775, when the dissidents regained all their privileges, excepting the right of being elected senators or ministers of state. Later events in Poland have again placed them precisely on a level with the Catholics.

DISSOLUTION, death, or the separation of the body and soul. The "dissolution of the world" is an awful event which we have reason to believe, both from the Old Testament and the New, will certainly take place. 1. It is not an incredible thing, since nothing of a material nature is formed for perpetual duration.—2. It will doubtless be under the direction of the Supreme Being, as its creation was.—3. The soul of man will remain unhurt amidst this general desolation.—4. It will be an introduction to a greater and nobler system in the government of God, 2 Pet. iii. 13.—5. The consideration of it ought to have a great influence on us while in the present state, 2 Pet. iii. 11, 12. See CONFLAGRATION.

DIVINATION is a conjecture or surmise formed concerning some future event from something which is supposed to be a presage of it; but between which there is no real connexion, only what the imagination of the diviner is pleased to assign in order to deceive.

Divination of all kinds being the offspring of credulity, nursed by imposture, and strengthened by superstition, was necessarily an occult science, retained in the hands of the priests and priestesses, the magi, the soothsayers, the augurs, the visionaries, the priests of the oracles, the false prophets, and other like professors, till the coming of Jesus Christ, when the light of the Gospel dissipated much of this darkness. The vogue for these pretended sciences and arts is nearly past, at least in the enlightened parts of the world. There are nine different kinds of divination mentioned in Scripture. These are, 1. Those whom Moses calls Meonen, from Anan, a cloud, Deut. xviii. 10.—2. Those whom the prophet calls in the same place, Menacheseh, which the Vulgate and generality of interpreters render Augur.—3. Those who in the same place are called Mecascheph, which the Septuagint and Vulgate translate, “a man given to ill practices.”—4. Those whom in the same chapter, ver. 11, he calls Hhober.—5. Those who consult the spirits, called Python.—6. Witches, or magicians, called Judeoni.—7. Necromancers, who consult the dead.—8. Such as consult staves, Hosea iv. 12; called by some Rhabdomancy.—9. Hepatoscopy, or the consideration of the liver.

Different kinds of divination which have passed for sciences.—We have had, 1. Aeromancy, divining by the air.—2. Astrology, by the heavens.—3. Augury, by the flight and singing of birds, &c.—4. Chiromancy, by inspecting the hand.—5. Geomancy, by observing of cracks or clefts in the earth.—6. Haruspicy, by inspecting the bowels of animals.—7. Horoscopy, a branch of astrology, marking the position of the heavens when a man is born.—8. Hydromancy, by water.—9. Physiognomy, by the countenance. (This, however, is considered by some as of a different nature, and worthy of being rescued from the rubbish of superstition, and placed among the useful sciences. Lavater has written a celebrated treatise on it.)—10. Pyromancy, a divination made by fire. Thus we see what arts have been practised to deceive, and how designing men have made use of all the four elements to impose upon weak minds.

DIVINE, something relating to God. The word is also used figuratively for any thing that is excellent, extraordinary, and that seems to go beyond the power of nature and the capacity of man. It also signifies a minister or clergyman.

DIVINITY, the science of theology. See THEOLOGY.

DIVISIONS, ECCLESIASTICAL. See SCHISM.

DIVORCE is the dissolution of marriage, or separation of man and wife. Divorce a mensa et thoro, i. e. from bed and board; in this case the wife has a suitable maintenance allowed her out of her husband's effects. Divorce a vinculo matrimonii, i. e. from the bonds of matrimony, is strictly and properly divorce. This happens either in consequence of criminality, as in the case of adultery, or through some essential impediment; as consanguinity, or affinity within the degrees forbidden, precontract, impotency, &c., of which impediments the canon law allows no less than fourteen. In these cases the woman receives again only what she brought. Sentences which release the parties a vinculo matrimonii, on account of impuberty, frigidity, consanguinity within the prohibited degrees, prior marriage, or want of the requisite consent of parents or guardians, are not properly dissolutions of the marriage contract, but judicial declarations that there never was any marriage; such impediment subsisting at the time as rendered the celebration of the marriage rite a mere nullity. And the rite itself contains an exception to these impediments.

The law of Moses, says Dr. Paley, for reasons of local expediency, permitted the Jewish husband to put away his wife; but whether for every cause, or for what cause, appears to have been controverted amongst the interpreters of those times. Christ, the precepts of whose religion were calculated for more general use and observation, revokes his permission as given to the Jews for their hardness of heart, and promulgates a law which was thenceforward to confine divorces to the single cause of adultery in the wife. Matt. xix. 9. Inferior causes may justify the separation of husband and wife, although they will not authorize such a dissolution of the marriage contract as would leave either at liberty to marry again; for it is that liberty in which the danger and mischief of divorces principally consist. The law of this country, in conformity to our Saviour's injunction, confines the dissolution of the marriage contract to the single case of adultery in the wife; and a divorce even in that case can only be brought about by an act of parliament, founded upon a previous sentence in the spiritual court, and a verdict against the adulterer at common law; which proceedings, taken together, compose as complete an investigation of the complaint as a cause can receive. See Paley's Mor. and Pol. Philosophy, p. 273; Doddridge's Lectures, lect. 73.

DOCETÆ, a branch of the Gnostics, who derived their name from the Greek word δοκω, to seem, imagine, because they held that Jesus existed only in appearance, not in reality. They were divided into two parties. Some said that the body of Jesus was altogether an illusion; and that he only appeared to perform the functions of life, like the angels who were entertained by Abraham. The others taught that Christ had a real and tangible body, but that it was formed of a celestial substance, which was resolved again into the same ethereal elements when he returned to the Pleroma. This heresy seems to have spring up as a very early sect. In opposition to Ignatius, they did not need to eat the Lord's supper, nor could they have done so with any degree of satisfaction; as nothing would have been more painful than to take the bread and wine as signs of that which had no real existence. The Lovers struck at the very root and foundation of the Church; they held that Christ did not die, and consequently that we are not redeemed by his blood—in express contradiction of every expression used by the apostles respecting his death.

DOCTRINE. the principles or positions in any sect or manner. As the doctrines of the Bible are the first principles and the foundation of religion, they should be carefully examined and well understood. The sermons present us with a copious fund of scriptural truth, which, though it has not the form of a regular system, yet its parts are such, that, when united, make the most complete body of doctrine that we can possibly have. Every Christian, but divines especially, should make this their study, because in the various doctrines should be insisted on in private and explained to the people. It is not, however, as some suppose, to fill in every part of a minister's sermon, but considered as the basis upon which the practical part is to be built. Some of the divines in the last century overcharged their discourses with doctrine, especially Dr. Owen and Dr. Goodwin. It was common in that day to make thirty or forty remarks before the immediate consideration of the text, each of which was just introduced, and which, if enlarged on, would have afforded matter enough for a whole sermon. A wise preacher will join doctrine and practice together.

Doctrines, though abused by some, yet properly considered, will influence the heart and life. Thus the idea of God's sovereignty excites submission; his power and justice promote fear; his holiness, humility, and purity; his goodness, a ground of hope; his love excites joy; the obscurity of his providence requires patience; his faithfulness, confidence, &c.

DODDRIDGE, PHILIP, the celebrated author of "The Family Expositor," was born in London, June 26, 1702. His father, Daniel Doddridge, was an oilman, resident in London, and the son of one of the ministers ejected by the Act of Uniformity. His mother was the daughter of the Rev. John Bauman, of Prague, in Bohemia, who was compelled to forsake his native country, in consequence of the persecutions which threatened to succeed the expulsion of Frederic, Elector Palatine. Dr. Doddridge was the twentieth and youngest child; all the rest, except one daughter, having died in infancy. It is not a little singular, that, when Doddridge was born, he was laid aside as a dead child; but a person in the room observing some motion in him, took that care of him upon which the state of his recovery. His recovery was, however, such, that his father was obliged to leave him unprotected to the assistance of his mother and friends. The history of the infant and young Doddridge has reached almost every where; he could read in Hebrew at three years of age; in the ordinary course of the school in which they resided. He was first sent to school to a Mr. Stone, who instructed him in the rudiments of Greek and Latin. But when this seminary he was removed to a school of arts in a free school at Leicester, and Thomas, of which his father had been a member, had been formerly the master. He remained in that school three years, and was distinguished for his merit and diligence. At that he was instructed in much of the Greek and not only afterwards, in his excellent knowledge of both of which he always spoke in terms of the greatest respect and affection. In the same year he was sent to the school of Mr. Nathaniel Wood, of St. Albans, where he commenced his acquaintance with the learned and excellent Mr. Samuel Clark, who soon afterwards became to him a wise counsellor, and an affectionate friend, but a dissenting and great trust and liberal friend and benefactor. At that school he greatly improved his skill in the knowledge of the learned languages, became perfect master of his native tongue, and accustomed himself not only to form ideas, but with propriety and elegance to express them. He devoted much time to reading; cultivated a taste for polite literature; diligently studied history, both civil and ecclesiastical; and spent a great part of his time in the study of theology. His piety now became more habitual and evident; and on February 1, 1718, he was admitted a member of the church, under the pastoral care of Mr. Clark. In that year he quitted the school at St. Albans, and retired to the house of his sister, there to determine on his future plans. From the Duchess of Bedford he received an offer to be educated in either of the universities, as a clergyman of the Church of England; but whilst the proposal inspired him with gratitude, he respectfully declined it, because he could not conform to a church from which he conscientiously dissented. He applied to Dr. Calamy for advice as to the profession he should follow, who dissuaded him from becoming a minister; and, in consequence, he for some time reluctantly determined to follow the profession of the law, till at length a liberal offer of assistance and advice, which he received from Mr. Clark, altered those determinations, and he resolved immediately to prosecute his studies preparatory to becoming a dissenting minister. In October, 1719, Mr. Clark placed him in the academy of the learned and pious Dr. Jennings, who resided at Kibworth, in Leicestershire. There Dr. Doddridge greatly improved in every branch of literature; and, besides attending to all his academical studies, he, in one half year, read sixty books, consisting principally of theology, and that not in a hasty and careless manner, but with great seriousness and advantage. Though young, cheerful, and devoted to the attainment of knowledge, he did not, however, forget the more important concerns of his own personal religion. He formed some admirable rules for the regulation of his conduct and the improvement of his time; which he did not merely form, but cheerfully and inviolably performed. In 1723 his tutor, Dr. Jennings, died, having not long removed from Kibworth to Hinckley. Soon after his death, Dr. Doddridge preached his first sermon at Hinckley, from the words, "If any man love not the Lord Jesus, let him be anathema, maranatha;" and "two persons ascribed their conversion to the blessing of God on that sermon." For more than a year he continued to preach at Hinckley and the neighbouring places; when, having received an invitation from the congregation at Kibworth, he accepted their offer, and was there settled in June, 1723. In that retired and obscure village there were no external objects to divert his attention from the pursuit of his studies; and his favourite authors, Baxter, Howe, and Tillotson, he read with frequency and attention. To his pastoral duties he was not, however, inattentive; but in religious conversation, and visits of mercy, he spent a suitable portion of his valuable time. His preaching was plain and practical; and whilst his mind was richly stored with knowledge, and his imagination was lively, he made all his talents subservient to the moral and religious improvement of the people committed to his care. During the whole year he accustomed himself to rise every morning at five o'clock; and thus, as he would sometimes say, he had ten years more than he otherwise would have had. In 1725 he removed to Harborough, though he continued to be minister of the congregation at Kibworth. With Mr. Some, the dissenting minister at Harborough, he became acquainted; and from his prudence and piety derived many benefits. In 1728 he received invitations to settle at Nottingham; but fearful that they would interfere with his spiritual welfare, he declined, and continued at Harborough; and in 1729 he was chosen assistant to Mr. Some. In the same year, Dr. Doddridge, in conjunction with Dr. Watts, Rev. Mr. Saunders, Rev. Mr. Some, and others, established an academy for preparing young men for the work of the ministry among dissenters; and to that institution he was appointed tutor. No man was better qualified than Dr. Doddridge for that situation, and the institution soon acquired a just and widespread celebrity. The students he instructed in every department of science and learning, and connected with all their studies their religious improvement. Towards the close of the year, he received an invitation to settle at Northampton, in consequence of the removal of Mr. Tingey, the dissenting minister, to London; and, urged by Mr. Some and Mr. Clark to accept the call, he quitted Harborough December 24, and immediately entered on his more arduous and important duties. Soon after his settlement he became seriously ill; but on his recovery, in March, 1730, he was set apart to the pastoral office. In this year he published a tract, entitled "Free Thoughts on the most probable means of reviving the Dissenting interest, occasioned by the late Inquiry into the causes of its Decay, addressed to the Author of that Inquiry." That tract was, on the whole, favourably received; and for its spirit and temper deserves much praise. He performed the various duties of a dissenting pastor with exemplary diligence and affection. His sermons were well studied, and delivered with zeal and affection. He watched over his flock like one who had to give an account. He prayed with and for them. He visited the sick; attended to the wants of the poor; admonished those who erred; cautioned those who wavered; confirmed those who were undecided; and, in every respect, attended to the doctrines, discipline, and practice of his church and congregation. In 1732, he published some admirable "Sermons on the Education of Children." In 1735 he yet further manifested his affectionate concern for the rising generation, by his publication of "Sermons to Young People;" and in 1734, by his "Principles of the Christian Religion," in verse. In 1736 he published "Ten Sermons on the Power and Grace of Christ, and the Evidences of the Gospel," the three last of which, on the "Evidences of Christianity," have been since repeatedly printed separately, and have received great and well-merited praise. In 1741 he published some "Practical Discourses on Regeneration," which were well received, and by many have been greatly admired. In 1745 he published, in conjunction with Dr. Watts, "The Rise and Progress of Religion in the Soul." It has been translated into Dutch, German, Danish, and French. But the work for which Dr. Doddridge has been so long and deservedly celebrated, is "The Family Expositor," containing a version and paraphrase of the New Testament, with critical notes, and the practical improvement of each section. Of the doctrinal opinions contained in his Expositor, the learned and pious have, of course, entertained various sentiments, according to their various tenets; but critics and scholars, and Christians of every sect and party, have eulogised it with a candour which did honour to themselves, and conferred yet greater renown on the name of Dr. Doddridge. In addition to the foregoing works, he published "Two Sermons on Salvation by Grace;" a Tract, entitled, "A Plain and Serious Address to the Master of a Family;" the "Memoirs of Colonel Gardiner;" "A short Account of the Life of Mr. Thomas Staife;" and prepared "A Proper and New Translation of the Minor Prophets, with a Commentary on them:" but this, with other pieces similarly prepared, have never been published. In 1748, he revised the expository, and other works of Archbishop Leighton; and translated his Latin Prelections, consisting of two volumes, published at Edinburgh. At the age of twenty-eight, Dr. Doddridge married a prudent, kind, and religious woman, to whom he was greatly attached, and by whom he had several children. To their education he paid great attention; and their moral and religious characters he endeavoured to form and improve, as well by example as precept. In December, 1750, Mr. Samuel Clark having died, Doddridge visited St. Albans, to preach his funeral sermon, and there unhappily contracted a cold, which continued to afflict him during the remainder of the winter. Though his health gradually declined, he continued to attend to all his ministerial duties, till, unable any longer to pursue them, he was obliged, in the autumn of that year, to visit Bristol; but from that journey he received no benefit, and was recommended to take a voyage to Lisbon. That advice he followed. On September 30th, he set sail for that place; and on October 13th he landed at Lisbon. From the voyage he derived some benefit, and hopes were entertained of his recovery; but on October 26, 1751, he expired. His remains were interred in the burial ground belonging to the British factory at Lisbon, and their chaplain, the succeeding Sunday, preached his funeral sermon. In England, the intelligence excited deep and general regret; and the congregation at Northampton erected a handsome monument at the chapel, to express their affection and regret; and his friend, Gilbert West, wrote a suitable and elegant inscription.

Dr. Doddridge sustained all the relations of life with honour to himself and advantage to his family and the world; so that, as he approached nearer to the eternal world, his path, indeed, resembled that of the just, which is as the shining light, that shineth more and more unto the perfect day. For a further account of this eminent scholar and Christian, see Dr. Doddridge's works; his Life, written by Job Orton; and also by Dr. Andrew Kippis.

DOGMA, (Greek δογμα, from δοκω, to seem, think, be of opinion,) an opinion, tenet, principle, or article of belief; what is propounded for belief, or established as a fixed and indubitable doctrine.

DOGMAS, HISTORY OF, a branch of theological science, particularly attended to in Germany, the object of which is, to exhibit historically the origin and changes of the various Christian systems, showing what opinions were received by the various sects in different ages of the church, the sources of the different creeds, the arguments by which they were attacked and supported, what degrees of importance were attached to them in different ages, the circumstances by which they were affected, and the mode in which the dogmas were combined into systems. The sources of this branch of history are the public creeds, the acts of councils, and other ecclesiastical assemblies, letters and decrees of the heads of churches, liturgies and books of rituals, the works of the fathers, and of later ecclesiastical writers, as well as the statements of contemporary historians. It is easily seen how important and interesting a study this is, teaching, as it does, modesty and forbearance in the support of particular opinions, by showing the vast variety of those which have afforded subjects of bitter controversy at particular periods, and have then passed away into oblivion; and how much learning, industry, and critical acuteness are often required, in order to a thorough investigation of contested points of doctrine. The distinction between this branch of history and ecclesiastical history is obvious. It is the same as exists between political history and the history of politics. Lectures on this subject are delivered in all the German universities.

DOGMATICS, a systematic arrangement of the dogmas or articles of the Christian faith, with respect to which a distinction is made between biblical dogmatics,—the study of which goes to examine closely the doctrinal passages of the Holy Scriptures, and to derive the system of doctrines exclusively from the Bible,—and ecclesiastical dogmatics, which consist in the systematic exhibition of doctrines considered to be biblical by particular churches. The first attempt to furnish a complete and coherent system of Christian dogmas was made by Origen in the third century; he was succeeded by Augustine in the fourth, by Isidore of Seville in the sixth, and by John of Damascus in the eighth. In the middle ages, ingenious examinations of the doctrines were made by the schoolmen; but agitating, as they did, subtle questions of little or no practical importance, they loaded the science with useless refinements. Among the Protestants, Melancthon was the first who wrote a Compendium of Christian Doctrine, which is still justly esteemed.

DOMINICAN MONKS, the religious order of Dominic, otherwise called Preaching Friars, in England Black Friars, and in France Jacobins. Their founder, Dominic de Gusman, was born in the year 1170, at Calaruega, a small town of the diocese of Osona, in Old Castile. His mother, being with child of him, dreamed she was delivered of a little dog, which gave light to all the world, with a flambeau in his mouth. At six years of age he began to study humanity, under the direction of his uncle, who was arch-priest of the church of Gurnel de Ystan. The time he had to spare from his studies was spent in assisting at divine offices, singing in the churches, and adorning the altars. At thirteen years of age he was sent to the university of Palencia, in the kingdom of Leon, where he spent six years in the study of philosophy and divinity. From that time he devoted himself to all manner of religious austerities; and he employed his time successfully in the conversion of sinners and heretics. This raised his reputation so high, that the Bishop of Osma, resolving to reform the canons of his church, cast his eyes on Dominic for that purpose, whom he invited to take upon him the habit of a canon in the church of Osma. Accordingly Dominic astonished and edified the canons of Osma by his extraordinary humility, mortification, and other virtues. Some time after, Dominic was ordained priest by the Bishop of Osma, and was made sub-prior of the chapter. That prelate, making a scruple of confining so great a treasure to his own church, sent Dominic out, to exercise the ministry of an evangelical preacher. Accordingly, he went through several provinces—as Galicia, Castile, and Arragon, converting many; till, in the year 1204, the Bishop of Osma, being sent ambassador into France, took Dominic with him. In their passage through Languedoc, they were witnesses of the desolation occasioned by the Albigenses, and obtained leave of Pope Innocent III. to stay some time in that country, and labour on the conversion of these heretics. Here it was that he resolved to put in execution the design he had long formed of instituting a religious order, whose principal employ should be, preaching the gospel, converting heretics, defending the faith, and propagating Christianity. By degrees he collected together several persons inspired with the same zeal, whose number soon increased to sixteen. Pope Innocent III. confirmed this institution, at the request of Dominic, who went to Rome for that purpose. Then they agreed to embrace the rule of St. Augustine, to which they added statutes and constitutions, which had formerly been observed, either by the Carthusians or the Premonstratenses. The principal articles enjoined perpetual silence, abstinence from flesh at all times, wearing of woollen, rigorous poverty, and several other austerities.

The first monastery of this order was established at Toulouse, by the bounty of the Bishop of Toulouse, and Simon, Earl of Montfort. From thence Dominic sent out some of the community to several parts, to labour in preaching, which was the main design of his institute. In the year 1218, he founded the convent of the Dominicans at Paris in the Rue St. Jacques, or St. James's Street, from whence they had the name of Jacobins. At Metz, in Germany, he founded another monastery of his order; and another soon after at Venice. At Rome, he obtained of Pope Honorius III. the church of St. Sabina, where he and his companions took the habit which they pretended the Virgin showed to the holy Renaud, of Orleans, being a white garment and scapular; to which they added a black mantle and hood, ending in a point. In 1221, the order had sixty monasteries, being divided into eight provinces;—those of Spain, Toulouse, France, Lombardy, Rome, Provence, Germany, and England. Dominic, having thus settled and enlarged his order, died at Bologna, August 4, 1221, and was canonized by Pope Gregory IX., July 13, 1234.

The order of the Dominicans, after the death of their founder, made a very considerable progress in Europe, and elsewhere. They therefore erected four new provinces, viz.—those of Greece, Poland, Denmark, and the Holy Land. Afterwards the number of monasteries increased to such a degree that the order is now divided into forty-five provinces, having spread itself into all parts of the world. It has produced a great number of martyrs, confessors, bishops, and nuns. There are reckoned of this order three popes, sixty cardinals, a hundred and fifty archbishops, eight hundred bishops, besides the masters of the sacred palace, who have always been Dominicans.

There are nuns of this order, who owe their foundation to Dominic himself, who, whilst he was labouring on the conversion of the Albigenses, was so much concerned to see that some gentlemen of Guienne, not having wherewith to maintain their daughters, either sold or gave them to be brought up by heretics, that, with the assistance of the archbishop of Narbonne, and other charitable persons, he laid the foundation of a monastery at Prouille, where these poor maids might be brought up, and supplied with all necessaries for their subsistence. The habit of these religious was a white robe, a tawny mantle, and a black veil. Their founder obliged them to work at certain hours of the day, and particularly to spin yarn and flax, to make their own linen. The nuns of this order have above a hundred and thirty houses in Italy, forty-five in France, fifty in Spain, fifteen in Portugal, forty in Germany, and many in Poland, Russia, and other countries. They never eat flesh, excepting in sickness; they wear no linen, and lie on straw beds; but many monasteries have mitigated this austerity.

In the year 1221, Dominic sent Gilbert du Fresney, with twelve brothers into England; where they founded their first house at Oxford, the same year, and soon after another in London. In the year 1276, the mayor and aldermen of the city of London gave them two streets by the river Thames, where they had a very commodious monastery; whence that place is still called Black-Friars. They had monasteries likewise at Warwick, Canterbury, Stamford, Chelmsford, Dunwich, Ipswich, Norwich, Thetford, Exeter, Brecknock, Langley, and Guilford.

The Dominicans, being fortified with an authority from the court of Rome, to preach and take confessions, made great encroachments on the English bishops and the parochial clergy, insisting on a liberty of preaching wherever they thought fit. And many persons of quality, especially women, deserted from the parochial clergy, and confessed to the Dominicans; insomuch that the character of the secular clergy was greatly sunk thereby. This innovation made way for a dissoluteness of manners; for the people, being under no necessity of confessing to their parish priest, broke through their duty with less reluctance, in hopes of meeting with a Dominican confessor; those friars being generally in a travelling motion, making no stay where they came, and strangers to their penitents.

They found dangerous rivals in the Franciscans, and engaged in contests with them; the heat and bitterness of which were perpetuated by the hostilities of the Thomists and Scotists, and have continued even to modern times. These two orders divided the honour of ruling in church and state till the sixteenth century, when the Jesuits gradually superseded them in the schools and courts, and they fell back again to their original destination. They obtained new importance, however, by the censorship of books, which was committed, in 1620, to the master of the sacred palace at Rome, who is always a Dominican. What the Reformation took from them in Europe, the activity of their missions in South America and the East Indies restored. In the eighteenth century the order comprised more than a thousand monasteries, divided into forty-five provinces, and twelve congregations. The Dominican order is now flourishing only in Spain, Portugal, Sicily, and America; but they have hopes of a revival in Italy.

DONATISTS, ancient schismatics in Africa, so denominated from their leader Donatus. They had their origin in the year 311, when, in the room of Mensurius, who died in that year, on his return to Rome, Cecilian was elected bishop of Carthage, and consecrated, without the concurrence of the Numidian bishops, by those of Africa alone, whom the people refused to acknowledge, and to whom they opposed Majorinus, who accordingly was ordained by Donatus, bishop of Casæ Nigræ. They were condemned, in a council held at Rome, two years after their separation; and afterwards in another at Arles, the year following; and again at Milan, before Constantine the Great, in 316, who deprived them of their churches, and sent their seditious bishops into banishment, and punished some of them with death. Their cause was espoused by another Donatus, called the Great, the principal bishop of that sect, who with numbers of his followers, was exiled by order of Constans. Many of them were punished with great severity. See CIRCUMCELLIONES. However, after the accession of Julian to the throne in 362, they were permitted to return, and restored to their former liberty. Gratian published several edicts against them, and, in 377, deprived them of their churches, and prohibited all their assemblies. But, notwithstanding the severities they suffered, it appears that they had a very considerable number of churches, towards the close of this century; but at this time they began to decline on account of a schism among themselves, occasioned by the election of two bishops, in the room of Parmenian, the successor of Donatus. One party elected Primian, and were called Primianists; and another Maximian, and were called Maximianists. Their decline was also precipitated by the zealous opposition of St. Augustine, and by the violent measures which were pursued against them by order of the Emperor Honorius, at the solicitation of two councils held at Carthage—the one in 404, and the other in 411. Many of them were fined, their bishops banished, and some put to death. This sect revived and multiplied, under the protection of the Vandals, who invaded Africa in 427, and took possession of this province; but it sunk again under new severities, when their empire was overturned, in 534. Nevertheless, they remained in a separate body till the close of this century, when Gregory, the Roman pontiff, used various methods for suppressing them: his zeal succeeded, and there are few traces to be found of the Donatists after this period. They were distinguished by other appellations, as Circumcelliones, Montenses, or Montaineers, Campetes, Rupetes, &c. They held three councils—that of Cita in Numidia, and two at Carthage.

The Donatists, it is said, held that baptism conferred out of the church, that is, out of their sect, was null; and accordingly they re-baptized those who joined their party from other churches; they also re-ordained their ministers. Donatus seems likewise to have embraced the doctrine of the Arians; though St. Augustine affirms that the Donatists in this point kept clear of the errors of their leader.

DONATIVE, in the ecclesiastical sense of the word, is a benefice given by the patron to a priest, without presentation to the ordinary, and without institution and induction. As to the origin of donatives, it was one of these two ways. First, by royal license. Thus Sir Edward Coke says, the king may not only found a church or free chapel donative, but may license any subject to do the same. Secondly, donatives may be grounded upon peculiar privilege; as, when a lord of a manor, in a great parish, at a remote distance from his parish church, offers to build and endow a church there, provided it shall belong entirely to him and his family, to put in what incumbent they shall think fit, the bishops, to encourage such a work, may have permitted them to enjoy this liberty; which, being continued time out of mind, is turned into a prescription.

DORT, SYNOD or, a national synod, summoned by authority of the States-general, the provinces of Holland, Utrecht, and Overysseel excepted, and held at Dort, 1618. The most eminent divines of the United Provinces, and deputies from the churches of England, Scotland, Switzerland, Bremen, Hessa, and the Palatinate, assembled on this occasion, in order to decide the controversy between the Calvinists and Arminians. The synod had hardly commenced its deliberations before a dispute on the mode of proceeding drove the Arminian party from the assembly. The Arminians insisted upon beginning with a refutation of the Calvinistic doctrines, especially that of reprobation; whilst the synod determined, that as the remonstrants were accused of departing from the reformed faith, they ought first to justify themselves by scriptural proof of their own opinions. All means to persuade the Arminians to submit to this procedure having failed, they were banished the synod for their refusal. The synod, however, proceeded in their examination of the Arminian tenets, condemned their opinions, and excommunicated their persons; whether justly or unjustly, let the reader determine. But it is impossible, on any principles of Scripture or civil liberty, to justify the persecution which followed, and which drove these men from their churches and country into exile and poverty. The authority of this synod was far from being universally acknowledged, either in Holland or in England. The provinces of Friesland, Zealand, Utrecht, Guelderland, and Groningen, could not be persuaded to adopt their decisions; and they were opposed by King James I. and Archbishop Laud in England.

DOSITHEANS, an ancient sect among the Samaritans, in the first century of the Christian era; so called from Dositheus, who endeavoured to persuade the Samaritans that he was the Messiah foretold by Moses. He had many followers, and his sect was still subsisting at Alexandria in the time of the patriarch Eulogius, as appears from a decree of that patriarch published by Photius. In that decree, Eulogius accuses Dositheus of injuriously treating the ancient patriarchs and prophets, and attributing to himself the spirit of prophecy. He makes him contemporary with Simon Magus; and accuses him of corrupting the Pentateuch, and of composing several books directly contrary to the law of God.

DOXOLOGY, (from δοξα praise, and λογος word.) A hymn used in the service of the ancient Christians. It was only a single sentence, without a response, running in these words, "Glory be to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Ghost, world without end, Amen." Part of the latter clause, "As it was in the beginning, is now, and ever shall be," was inserted some time after the first composition. The fourth council of Toledo, A.D. 633, added the word honour to it, and read it, "Glory and honour be to the Father," &c., because the prophet David says, "Bring glory and honour to the Lord." It is not easy to say at what time the latter clause was inserted. Some ascribe it to the council at Nice, and pretend it was added in opposition to the Arians. But the first express mention made of it is in the second council of Vaison, A.D. 529, above two centuries later.

There was another small difference in the use of this ancient hymn; some reading it, "Glory be to the Father, and to the Son, with the Holy Ghost;" others, "Glory be to the Father, in or by the Son, and by the Holy Ghost." This difference of expression occasioned no dispute in the church, till the rise of the Arian heresy; but when the followers of Arius began to make use of the latter, and made it a distinguishing character of their party, it was entirely laid aside by the Catholics, and the use of it was enough to bring any one under suspicion of heterodoxy.

This hymn was of most general use, and was a doxology, or giving of praise to God, at the close of every solemn office. The Western church repeated it at the end of every psalm, and the Eastern church at the end of the last psalm. Many of their prayers were also concluded with it, particularly the solemn thanksgiving, or consecration prayer at the Eucharist. It was also the ordinary conclusion of their sermons.

There was likewise another hymn, of great note in the ancient church, called the Great Doxology, or Angelical Hymn, beginning with those words, which the angels sung at our Saviour's birth, "Glory be to God on high," &c. This was chiefly used in the communion service. It was also used daily in private devotions. In the Mozarabic liturgy, it is appointed to be sung before the lessons on Christmas-day. Chrysostom often mentions it, and observes, that the Ascetics, or Christians who had retired from the world, met together daily to sing this hymn. Who first composed it, adding the remaining part to the words sung by the angels, is uncertain. Some suppose it to be as ancient as the time of Lucian, about the beginning of the second century. Others take it for the "Gloria Patri;" which is a dispute as difficult to be determined, as it is to find out the first author and original of this hymn.

Both these doxologies have a place in the liturgy of the Church of England, the former being repeated after every psalm, the latter used in the communion service.

DRUIDS, the priests or ministers of religion

among the ancient Gauls, Britons, and Germans, who resembled, in many respects, the Bramins of India. They were chosen out of the best families; and the honours of their birth, joined with those of their function, procured them the highest veneration among the people. They were versed in astrology, geometry, natural philosophy, politics, and geography; they were the interpreters of religion, and the judges of all affairs indifferently. Whoever refused obedience to them was declared impious and accursed. We know but little as to their peculiar doctrines, only that they believed the immortality of the soul, and, as is generally also supposed, the transmigration of it to other bodies; though a late author makes it appear highly probable they did not believe this last, at least not in the sense of the Pythagoreans. The chief settlement of the Druids in Britain was in the isle of Anglesey, the ancient Mona, which they might choose for this purpose, as it is well stored with spacious groves of their favourite oak. They were divided into several classes or branches, such as the priests, the poets, the augurs, the civil judges and instructors of youth. Strabo, however, does not comprehend all these different orders under the denomination of Druids. He only distinguishes three kinds: Bardi, poets; the Vates, priests and naturalists; and the Druids, who, besides the study of nature, applied themselves likewise to morality.

Their garments were remarkably long, and when employed in religious ceremonies, they likewise wore a white surplice. They generally carried a wand in their hands, and wore a kind of ornament, encased with gold, about their necks, called the druid's egg. They had one chief, or arch-druid, in every nation, who acted as high priest, or pontifex maximus. He had absolute authority over the rest, and commanded, decreed, and punished at pleasure. They worshipped the Supreme Being under the name of Esus or Hesus, and the symbol of the oak; and had no other temple than a wood or a grove, where all their religious rites were performed. Nor was any person permitted to enter that sacred recess unless he carried with him a chain, in token of his absolute dependence on the Deity. Indeed their whole religion originally consisted in acknowledging that the Supreme Being, who made his abode in these sacred groves, governed the universe; and that every creature ought to obey his laws, and pay him divine homage. They considered the oak as the emblem, or rather the peculiar residence of the Almighty; and accordingly chaplets of it were worn, both by the Druids and people, in their religious ceremonies; the altars were strewed with its leaves, and encircled with its branches. The fruit of it, especially the mistletoe, was thought to contain a divine virtue, and to be the peculiar gift of Heaven. It was, therefore, sought for on the sixth day of the moon with the greatest earnestness and anxiety; and when found, was hailed with such rapture of joy, as almost exceeds imagination to conceive. As soon as the Druids were informed of the fortunate discovery, they prepared every thing ready for the sacrifice under the oak, to which they fastened two white bulls by the horns; then the Arch-druid, attended by a prodigious number of people, ascended the tree, dressed in white; and with a consecrated golden knife, or pruning hook, cropped the mistletoe, which he received in his robe, amidst the rapturous exclamations of the people. Having secured this sacred plant, he descended the tree, the bulls were sacrificed, and the Deity invoked to bless his own gift, and render it efficacious in those distempers in which it should be administered.

DRUSES, a remarkable people and sect, inhabiting different parts of Libanus and Anti-Libanus, and certain other regions of Syria and Palestine, but whose principal seat is Kes-roan, a district on Mount Lebanon, towards the Mediterranean sea. Till about the middle of last century they were subject to seven petty princes or emirs; but the numerous quarrels which obtained among these leaders, reduced them to such a degree, that in order to preserve their national liberty, they called an extraordinary assembly, in which it was determined that the supreme authority should be lodged in the hands of a superior or Great Emir, whose residence was fixed at Deir el Kamer, in the mountainous district to the north of Saïda. They are almost entirely independent of the Porte, being only obliged to pay an optional tribute. Some have traced them to the Drusæ of Herodotus; and others, especially French historians, to the brave Count de Dreux, who, with a handful of men, retreated into those parts from Jerusalem, about the year 1187; but unfortunately for this latter hypothesis, they are mentioned by Benjamin of Tudela, who visited them in 1173. Their true origin has been found in Elmacin's History of the Saracens. In the year 408 of the Hejira, (A.D. 1017), an impostor named Mohammed Ebu Ismal, or Al-drusi, appeared at the court of Hakem, khalif of Egypt, by whom he was well received, and whom he endeavoured to persuade the people was the only true God, the creator of the world. Having been killed by a Turk, his place was supplied by another impostor, named Hamah Ebu Ahmed Al-hadi, in consequence of whose efforts the Khalif, and in the course of a few years, not fewer than 16,000 people, enrolled their names as believers in the new doctrine, to the neglect of Islamism, and the actual establishment of a new sect. Expelled, however, in the course of time from Egypt, they settled along the coast of Syria, especially in the fastnesses of the mountains, where they have ever since been more or less able to defend themselves against their enemies. Many of their emirs are distinguished on the historic page for their bravery and general talent; and the present emir, Beshir, whose dynasty has been upwards of a hundred years in power, is described as an amiable man, and a great friend of the English.

The Druses are divided into two classes:—

1. The Djahals, ignorant or uninitiated, who compose the greater part, and even the emir himself, who is not permitted to interfere in any way in matters of religion. They appear to have no definite religion whatever, but conform to that which happens to predominate, in order to conceal the fact that they belong to any particular sect. They make no distinction of meats, drink wine, marry wives from among those who are not Druses, and wear a variegated dress. 2. The Akhals, "intelligent, initiated," form a sacred, or aristocratic order, who perform the ceremonies of their religion in their oratories, but under circumstances of such profound secrecy, that their character or nature has never been discovered. Should any of the uninitiated happen to witness any part of their religious service, he is instantly put to death. They are excessively rigid as it regards their religion; live temperately on food peculiar to themselves; eat not with strangers; marry wives of their own order; and never take an oath, but confirm their declarations by the words, "I have said it." From them the spiritual or ecclesiastical head, the Imam of the Druses, is chosen, whom both the initiated and uninitiated regard with profound veneration.

According to Malte Brun, the number of the Druses amounts to 120,000; but Mr. Connor, late a missionary in those parts, rates them at 70,000; of whom 10,000 compose the Akhals, or sacred order.

With respect to their religious belief, they profess themselves to be Muttevahedin, or Unitarians, who believe in Hakem, to whom they give the characters, "the creator of heaven and earth; the only adorable God in heaven, and the only Lord on earth; the one, the solitary, who is without wife and children; who begets not, and is not begotten; who acts according to his sovereign pleasure; who says to all things, be, and they are; the beginning and the end of all things; the powerful, the excellent, the victorious. I am, he says, the foundation of the new religion, the Lord, the way, the written book, the inhabited house; I am he who knows all things of himself; the Lord of the resurrection and the new life; I am he who animates the creatures, the water of life, the author of prosperity; I give laws and annul them; I cause men to die, and declare martyrdom to be nothing; I am a consuming fire that consumes the proud," &c. They acknowledge seven lawgivers: Adam, Noah, Abraham, Moses, Jesus, Mohammed, and Said. The first being that follows in rank to Hakem, is Hamsah, who appeared in the time of Adam, by the name of Shatnil; in that of Noah, by that of Fitagurus; in Abraham's time by that of David; under Moses he was called Shoab; in the time of Jesus his name was Lazarus; in that of Mohammed, Soliman; and in that of Said, Zalech. These seven lawgivers were inhabited by the same soul, which went from body to body, according to the rules of the metempsychosis. Though Hamsah might have prevented Jesus from carrying his plan into execution, he permitted him to establish his religion, partly in order that it might be the means of overthrowing the Jewish polity, and partly that there might be another predominant religion, under which he and his Unitarians might live concealed. He attempted to teach Christ; but on his rejecting the proffered tuition, he stirred up the Jews against him, and they killed him. Christ was the false, Hamsah the true Messiah. It is of Hamsah the four evangelists write, so that the Christians are completely deceived, and can only be delivered from error and all evil by becoming Unitarians.

Of Mohammed they entertain a worse opinion; maintaining that he was an evil demon, a son of whoredom, and accursed. The Mohammedans are the flood which has deluged the world. The Druses do not practise circumcision.

According to their catechism, Hakem first became visible in the year of the Hejrah 400, but did not reveal his divinity; in the year 408 his divine nature was manifested, and continued visible for eight years; in the ninth he disappeared, and will not again be revealed till the day of judgment, the time of which is unknown, but its sign is when the Christians have subdued the Mohammedans. Judgment will be held on the four classes of men: Christians, Jews, Apostates, and Unitarians. To the Jews are reckoned the Mohammedans, and the Apostates are those who desert the faith of Hakem. At the judgment the Unitarians shall be rewarded with empire and dominion, treasures of gold and silver, and shall be promoted to be emirs, pashas, and sultans. The torments of the Apostates shall be dreadfully severe; those of the Jews and Christians more lenient. They believe in ten incarnations of Hakem; and seven revelations of Hamsah.

The Druses receive the four Gospels, only apply what is said of Christ to Hamsah; and they profess to receive the Koran, but only as a cloak to screen them from the Mohammedans. Owing, most probably, to their living among the Maronites, several appear of late to have embraced the outward form of Christianity. The present Emir, Beshir Shchab, and a portion of his family, have embraced the doctrines of the Maronites.

DUALIST, a name given to those who held the two original and opposite principles of good and evil, from which all things have sprung.

DUCHOBORTZI, or "WRESTLERS WITH THE SPIRIT," a sect of Russian dissenters, inhabiting the right bank of the river Moloshnaia, near the sea of Azof. Their number, in the year 1818, amounted to 1153 souls. They have been called the Russian Quakers; and much as the more enlightened members of the Society of Friends would find to object to among them, it cannot be denied that in many points they resemble them. Their name indicates the strong bearing which their system has on mystical exercises, in which they place the whole of religion, to the exclusion of all external rites and ceremonies. All their knowledge, they pretend, is traditionary. They profess to have the Bible in their hearts; the light within is sufficient, they need nothing more. Every thing with them is mystical. They speak of Christ, and his death; but they explain both his person and sufferings mystically, and build their hopes entirely on themselves. They make no distinction of days or meats; and marriage, so far from being a sacrament with them, as in the Greek church, is scarcely viewed as a civil institution.

DULCINISTS, the followers of Dulcinus, a layman of Novara, in Lombardy, about the beginning of the fourteenth century. He taught that the law of the Father, which had continued till Moses, was a law of grace and wisdom; but that the law of the Holy Ghost, which began with himself, in 1307, was a law entirely of love, which would last to the end of the world.

DUNKERS, a denomination of Seventh-day Baptists, which took its rise in the year 1724. It was founded by Conrad Beissel, a German, who received a regular education at Halle, and took orders as a minister; but being persecuted for his opinions on some points in theology, he left Europe, and retired to an agreeable solitude within fifty miles of Philadelphia, for the more free exercise of religious contemplation. Curiosity attracted followers, and his simple and engaging manners made them proselytes. They soon settled a little colony, called Euphrate, in allusion to the Hebrews, who used to sing psalms on the borders of the river Euphrates. This denomination seem to have obtained their name from their baptizing their new converts by plunging. They are also called Tumblers, from the manner in which they performed baptism, which is by putting the person, while kneeling, head first under water, so as to resemble the motion of the body in the action of tumbling. They use the trine immersion, with laying on the hands and prayer, even when the person baptized is in the water.

Their habit seems to be peculiar to themselves, consisting of a long tunic, or coat, reaching down to their heels, with a sash or girdle round the waist, and a cap, or hood, hanging from the shoulders, like the dress of the Dominican friars. The men do not shave the head or beard. The men and women have separate habitations, and distinct governments. For these purposes, they have erected two large wooden buildings, one of which is occupied by the brethren, the other by the sisters of the society; and in each of them there is a banqueting-room, and an apartment for public worship; for the brethren and sisters do not meet together, even at their devotions. They used to live chiefly upon roots and other vegetables, the rules of their society not allowing them flesh, except on particular occasions, when they hold what they call a love feast; at which time the brethren and sisters dine together in a large apartment, and eat mutton, but no other meat. In each of their little cells they have a bench fixed, to serve the purpose of a bed, and a small block of wood for a pillow. They allow of marriage, and aid their poorer brethren who enter the matrimonial state; but they nevertheless consider celibacy as a virtue. The principal tenets of the Dunkers appear to be these: that future happiness is only to be attained by penance and outward mortification in this life; and that as Jesus Christ, by his meritorious sufferings, became the Redeemer of mankind in general, so each individual of the human race, by a life of abstinence and restraint, may work out his own salvation. Nay, they go so far as to admit of works of supererogation, and declare that a man may do much more than he is in justice or equity obliged to do, and that his superabundant works may therefore be applied to the salvation of others. This denomination deny the eternity of future punishments, and believe that the dead have the gospel preached to them by our Saviour, and that the souls of the just are employed to preach the gospel to those who have had no revelation in this life. They suppose the Jewish sabbath, sabbatical year and year of jubilee, are typical of certain periods, after the general judgment, in which the souls of those who are not then admitted into happiness are purified from their corruption. If any within those smaller periods are so far humbled as to acknowledge the perfections of God, and to own Christ as their only Saviour, they are received to felicity; while those who continue obstinate are reserved in torments until the grand period typified by the jubilee arrives, in which all shall be made happy in the endless fruition of the Deity. They also deny the imputation of Adam's sin to his posterity. They disclaim violence even in cases of self-defence, and suffer themselves to be defrauded or wronged rather than go to law.

Their church government and discipline are the same with the English Antipædobaptists, except that every brother is allowed to speak in the congregation; and their best speaker is usually ordained to be their minister. They have deacons and deaconesses from among their ancient widows and exhorters, who are all licensed to use their gifts stately. The members of the society are now much dispersed, and the members in the adjacent country differ in no respect from their neighbours in dress or manners; though they maintain the faith of their fathers, and are remarked for their exemplary lives and deportment.

DUTY, any action, or course of actions, which flow from the relations we stand in to God or man; that which a man is bound to perform by any natural or legal obligation. The various moral, relative, and spiritual duties are considered in their places in this work.

DWIGHT, TIMOTHY, D.D., president of Yale College, America, was born at Northampton, in the county of Hampshire, and state of Massachusetts, on the 4th of May, 1752. His father was a respectable and opulent merchant; a man of sincere and unaffected piety, of excellent understanding, and unexceptionable character. His mother was the third daughter of the celebrated Jonathan Edwards, president of Nassau Hall; and possessed a vigorous and discriminating mind, and a cultivated understanding. She early began to be the instructress of her son, and so great was his eagerness for knowledge, that he learned the alphabet at one lesson, and at the age of four read the Holy Scriptures with ease and correctness. "With his father's example before him, enforced and recommended by the precepts of his mother, he was sedulously instructed in the doctrines of religion, as well as in the whole circle of moral duties. She taught him, from the dawn of reason, to fear God and keep his commandments; to be conscientiously just, kind, and affectionate, charitable, and forgiving; to preserve on all occasions, and under all circumstances, the most sacred regard to truth; to relieve the distressed, and supply the wants of the poor and unfortunate. She also aimed, at a very early period, to enlighten his conscience, to make him afraid to sin, and to teach him to hope for pardon through Christ. The impressions thus made upon his mind in infancy were never erased." At the age of six years he was sent to school, where he diligently studied, and made such rapid and extraordinary advances in every kind of knowledge, that at a very early age he was well acquainted with the Greek and Roman classics, history, geography, and astronomy; and whilst he was greatly pleased with the beauties of Homer and Virgil, he entered into the abstract reasonings of Locke and Newton. His conduct and character were at this time highly consistent and moral. At the age of thirteen, he was admitted a member of Yale College. After far outstripping his rivals in the career of literature, he was called to become a tutor in Yale College, at the age of nineteen. This office he filled with advantage to the institution, and credit to himself. Soon after this appointment, his father, however, died, and he was compelled to resign the situation, and to take charge of his mother and a large family. Thus he passed five years of his life, during which he twice consented to serve the town, as their representative, in the state legislature. In May, 1795, he was elected president of Yale College. This was a situation eminently adapted to him, and one in which he was enabled to advance the interests of learning and religion. When Dr. Dwight entered upon his arduous duties, the students were infected with infidelity; but in consequence of the efforts of his wisdom, prudence, zeal, and learning, alike firm and well-principled, he succeeded to a great degree in exterminating opinions so inimical to the best interests of society. He soon afterwards became a preacher at Greenfield, and notwithstanding the variety of his college engagements, he found time regularly to compose two sermons every week. Afflicted by a disorder in his eyes, he was compelled in after years to employ an amanuensis to pen from his lips his sermons. As a preacher, he was distinguished by the originality and copiousness of his ideas; the simplicity, fulness, and force of his language, and the dignity, propriety, and seriousness of his manner. As a professor of theology, he was equally eminent. He was well read in the most eminent fathers and theologians, ancient and modern; he was a good biblical critic; and his sermons, consisting of five volumes, octavo, should be possessed by every student in divinity. He also wrote "Travels in New England and New York," four volumes, octavo; "The Conquest of Canaan," a poem, one vol. duodecimo; and a pamphlet on "The Dangers of the Infidel Philosophy." Dr. Dwight continued to discharge the duties of his station, both as a minister and president of the college, to the age of sixty-five; when, after a long and painful illness, he expired on January the 11th, 1817. He was endowed by nature with uncommon talents; and these, enriched by industry and research, and united to amiability and consistency in his private life, unquestionably entitle Dr. Dwight to a rank among the first men of this age. Two additional volumes of Dr. Dwight's sermons have recently been reprinted in London, octavo, 1828.

E.

EASTER, the ecclesiastical festival commemorative of the resurrection of Christ. The Greek πασχα, and the Latin pascha, from which come the French pâques, the Italian pasqua, and the name of the same festival in several other languages, originated in the circumstance that Christ was typified by the paschal lamb, ordained by Moses to be slain at the feast of the passover: the feast being considered as a continuation, in its fulfilment, of the Jewish festival. The English name Easter, and the German Ostern, are derived from the name of the Teutonic goddess Ostera (Anglo-Saxon Eostre), whose festival was celebrated by the ancient Saxons with peculiar solemnities, in the month of April, and for which, as in many other instances, the first missionaries in these parts substituted the paschal feast. As early as the second century there were keen disputes respecting the day on which this feast should be kept: the Eastern church persisting in observing it on the same day with the Jews; while the Western celebrated it on Sunday, as the day of Christ's resurrection. The dispute was finally settled at the council of Nice, in 325, which ordained that it should be kept always on a Sunday: only as it was a moveable feast, no small difficulty long continued to be felt as to its adjustment.

EBION, the reputed founder of the sect of the Ebionites, but with respect to whom it has often been disputed whether such a person ever really existed, or whether this sect did not derive its name from the Hebrew word עֲבִיּוֹן, signifying poor. It is certain that the Ebionites did take credit to themselves for being named after the first believers, who made themselves poor; and their opponents reproached them with this name as being expressive of the poverty of their doctrines, and of the mean opinion which they entertained of Christ. But, notwithstanding these verbal allusions, Dr. Burton is of opinion, that it is by no means improbable that there was such a person as Ebion; and that if not a disciple of Cerinthus, he was at least contemporary with him. Whether he published his doctrines in Rome and Cyprus, as is said by Epiphanius, may perhaps be doubted; but that he disseminated them in Asia, and in the neighbourhood of Ephesus, can hardly admit of a dispute. Though he and Cerinthus are named as the leaders of two distinct sects, it does not appear that there was any great difference of opinion between them.

EBIONITES, ancient heretics, forming a modification of the Gnostics, who rose in the very first age of the church, and formed themselves into a sect in the second century, denying the divinity of Jesus Christ. It has been supposed, with some plausibility, that this sect was originally formed among the Essenes; and indeed Epiphanius tells us that they resembled the Ossai in their doctrine. Now, according to this writer, the Ossai were the same as the Osseni (Esseni), whom he describes as a Jewish sect.

They altered and corrupted, in many things, the purity of the faith held among the first adherents to Christianity. For this reason, Origen distinguishes two kinds of Ebionites in his answer to Celsus; the one believed that Jesus Christ was born of a virgin; and the other that he was born after the manner of other men. The first were orthodox in every thing, except that to the Christian doctrine they joined the ceremonies of the Jewish law, as did the Jews, Samaritans, and Nazarenes; together with the traditions of the Pharisees. They differed from the Nazarenes in several things, chiefly as to what regards the authority of the sacred writings; for the Nazarenes received all for scripture contained in the Jewish canon; whereas the Ebionites rejected all the prophets, and held the very names of David, Solomon, Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel, in abhorrence. They also rejected all Paul's epistles, whom they treated with the utmost disrespect. They received nothing of the Old Testament but the Pentateuch. They agreed with the Nazarenes, in using the Hebrew Gospel of Matthew, otherwise called the Gospel of the twelve apostles; but they corrupted their copy in numerous places; and particularly left out the genealogy of our Saviour, which was preserved entire in that of the Nazarenes, and even in those used by the Cerinthians. Besides the Hebrew Gospel of Matthew, the Ebionites had adopted several other books under the titles of James, John, and the other apostles; they also made use of the travels of Peter, which are supposed to have been written by Clement; but had altered them so, that there was scarcely any thing of truth left in them. They even made that father tell a number of falsehoods, the better to authorize their own practices.

ECCLESIASTICAL, an appellation given to whatever belongs to the church: thus we say ecclesiastical polity, jurisdiction, history, &c.

ECCLESIASTICAL HISTORY, a narration of the transactions, revolutions, and events that relate to the church. As to the utility of church history, Dr. Jortin, who was an acute writer on this subject, shall here speak for us: he observes, 1. That it will show us the amazing progress of Christianity through the Roman empire, through the East and West, although the powers of the world cruelly opposed it. 2. Connected with Jewish and Pagan history, it will show us the total destruction of Jerusalem, the overthrow of the Jewish church and state; and the continuance of that unhappy nation for 1700 years, though dispersed over the face of the earth, and oppressed at different times by Pagans, Christians, and Mohammedans. 3. It shows us that the increase of Christianity produced, in the countries where it was received, the overthrow and extinction of paganism, which, after a feeble resistance, perished about the sixth century. 4. It shows us how Christianity hath been continued and delivered down from the apostolical to the present age. 5. It shows us the various opinions which prevailed at different times amongst the fathers and other Christians, and how they departed, more or less, from the simplicity of the Gospel. 6. It will enable us to form a true judgment of the merit of the fathers, and of the use which is to be made of them. 7. It will show us the evil of imposing unreasonable terms of communion, and requiring Christians to profess doctrines not propounded in Scriptural words, but inferred as consequences from passages of Scripture, which one may call systems of consequential divinity. 8. It will show us the origin and progress of popery; and, lastly, it will show us, 9. The origin and progress of the Reformation.

Ecclesiastical history is a very important branch of study, but one which is attended with many difficulties. The widely-spread and diversified circumstances of the Christian Church, even from the earliest period, render it difficult to arrive at satisfactory views of many events in which it was concerned. Those events were seldom recorded at the time, or by the persons who lived on the spot. The early writers who undertook to give the history of the church, were not well skilled in the laws of historic truth and evidence, nor always well fitted to apply those laws. Opinions and statements scattered over the pages of the fathers and their successors, are often vague, discordant, and unsatisfactory, presenting almost endless perplexity, or matter of debate. While these and other causes contribute to render ecclesiastical history very difficult, they who have devoted themselves to it in modern times, look at the subjects of their investigation through mediums which tend to colour or distort most of the facts passing under their review. Their associations and habits of thinking lead them unconsciously to attach modern ideas to ancient terms and usages. The word church, for instance, almost invariably suggests the idea of a body allied to the state, and holding the orthodox creed. The heretics of church history are generally regarded as men of erroneous principles and immoral lives. Councils are bodies representative, and clothed with something approaching to infallible authority. Bishops are not regarded as pastors of particular congregations, but ecclesiastical rulers of provinces. All these things tend greatly to bewilder and perplex an inquirer into the true state of the profession of Christianity during a long succession of ages; and from their distracting influence, even the strongest minds can scarcely be protected. Impartiality is commonly professed, and, in most instances, honestly intended, but very rarely exercised.

ECLECTICS, a name given to some ancient philosophers, who, without attaching themselves to any particular sect, took what they judged good and solid from each. One Ptolemy, of Alexandria, who lived under Augustus and Tiberius, and was weary of doubting of all things, with the Sceptics and Pyrrhonians, was the person who formed this sect.

ECLECTICS, or modern Platonics, a sect which arose in the Christian Church towards the close of the second century. They professed to make truth the only object of their inquiry, and to be ready to adopt from all the different systems and sects such tenets as they thought agreeable to it. They preferred Plato to the other philosophers, and looked upon his opinions concerning God, the human soul, and things invisible, as conformable to the spirit and genius of the Christian doctrine. One of the principal patrons of this system was Ammonius Saccas, who at this time laid the foundation of that sect, afterwards distinguished by the name of the New Platonics in the Alexandrian school.

ECSTASY, or EXTASY, a transport of the mind, which suspends the functions of the senses by the intense contemplation of some extraordinary object.

ECTHESIS, a confession of faith, the form of an edict, published in the year 639, by the Emperor Heraclius, with a view to pacify the troubles occasioned by the Eutychian heresy in the Eastern Church. However, the same prince revoked it, on being informed that Pope Severinus had condemned it, as favouring the Monothelites; declaring, at the same time, that Sergius, patriarch of Constantinople, was the author of it. See EUTYCHIANS.

EDIFICATION. This word signifies a building up. Hence we call a building an edifice. Applied to spiritual things, it signifies the improving, adorning, and comforting the mind; and a Christian may be said to be edified when he is encouraged and animated in the ways and works of the Lord. The means to promote our own edification are, prayer, self-examination, reading the Scriptures, hearing the Gospel, meditation, attendance on all appointed ordinances. To edify others, there should be love, spiritual conversation, forbearance, faithfulness, benevolent exertions, and uniformity of conduct.

EDWARDS, JONATHAN (usually styled PRE-SIDENT EDWARDS) was descended from an ancient family in North America. He was born at Windsor, in the province of Connecticut, on the 5th of October, 1703. His father was a pious and faithful minister at Windsor; and his mother was a daughter of the celebrated Rev. Solomon Stoddard, of Northampton, and as remarkable for her mental, as for her personal attractions. Jonathan was their only son, though they had a numerous family. At the age of twelve years he had developed great penetration and deep thought. He was then admitted into Yale College, and, at the age of seventeen, received the degree of Bachelor of Arts.

He remained at college seven years; and, at the expiration of that period, being duly prepared, entered into the important work of the ministry, and delivered his first sermon at New York, in 1722, where he continued for eight months. In 1723 he took his degree of Master of Arts, and was tutor of Yale College; but, in the course of two years, resigned his office for the purpose of assisting his aged grandfather, who much required his assistance; and, at the age of twenty-three, became the colleague with that revered relative at Northampton, where he continued for upwards of two years. While there, he generally spent between thirteen and fourteen hours of every day in his study. Shortly after leaving Northampton, he united himself to a female in every respect worthy of him, and by whom he had a large family. To the education of his children he was particularly attentive, and made the care of their souls his first consideration; instructed them himself in the first elements of Christianity, and rendered his instructions pleasing, by his happy method of communicating knowledge. Those instructions afterwards proved to them the value of being trained up in the ways of piety and religion. By many he might have been considered not to have paid sufficient attention to the spiritual interests of his congregation, as it was not his custom to visit them; but he considered visits of that kind to be unprofitable, both to himself and his friends; though, in consequence, he was, by strangers, considered reserved and haughty. But Edwards was humble and diffident. "He was," says his biographer, "a skillful guide to souls under spiritual difficulties, and was therefore applied to, not only by his own people, but by many who lived at a considerable distance. As a minister, he was exceedingly useful to hundreds, and was the instrument of turning many from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan unto God." In the year 1734, his ministrations were eminently useful, and an account of which has been written by him, entitled, "A Faithful Narrative of the surprising Work of God, in the conversion of many hundred souls in Northampton;" and which gave rise to other works "On the Distinguishing Marks of a Work of the Spirit of God;" his "Thoughts concerning the present Revival of Religion in New England;" and his "Treatise on Religious Affections." Seeds of discontent were, however, sown among his people; an evil which the best and most laborious of men have never been able to prevent.

On the 22nd of June, 1750, he received his dismissal from them, after having been their pastor for above twenty-four years. This was a severe trial to Mr. Edwards, thus to leave a people who had expressed so much attachment to him, and to whom he had been so permanently useful. He, however, bore the separation with calmness, meekness, and humility, and took up his cross with the spirit of a Christian. Mr. Edwards was not, however, long disengaged as a preacher. About that time, the Rev. Mr. Sergent died, and left vacant the Indian mission at Stockbridge, a town about sixty miles from Northampton: and, on the application of the commissioners for Indian affairs, he accepted the invitation, and there settled as missionary, on the 8th of August, 1751. Mr. Edwards was not so extensively useful at Stockbridge as was expected, though he benefited the world during the five years he remained there, more than the whole time he spent at Northampton, by publishing his celebrated treatises on "The Freedom of the Will," and on "Original Sin." These works induced the trustees of New Jersey College to request him to become their president, on the death of Mr. Burr. That honourable station, after many objections and doubts, as to his abilities for so dignified an office, he accepted; and when the corporation met, he was placed in the president's chair. He also at this time preached with great success, to large and attentive congregations. President Edwards, however, was not long to enjoy the honour thus conferred on him. The small-pox raged in the country; the good man was inoculated; he received it very favourably; but a fever succeeded, and was attended by pustules in the throat, and he expired, in the fifty-fifth year of his age, in 1758. As a minister, a husband, a father, an author, and a scholar, he was greatly distinguished, revered, and beloved. The name of President Edwards can never die. He was pious yet cheerful, frugal yet generous, and learned without being a pedant. In the pulpit and the parlour he was equally beloved and respected; and at his death thousands were ready to speak his praises, and eulogize a character so wise, so good, and so benevolent, as that of President Edwards. As a philosopher, as well as a divine, he has had few equals, and he had no superior among his contemporaries. His works, which have been collected and published in eight volumes, royal 8vo, by the Rev. Dr. Williams, and the Rev. Mr. Parsons, of Leeds, will live as long as powerful reasoning, genuine religion, and the science of the human mind continue to be objects of respect. Dr. Erskine, an excellent judge of men and books, who patronized both him and his writings, declared that he did not think our age had produced a divine of equal judgment or genius. "The History of Redemption" shows the author's intimate acquaintance with the plan of Heaven, and how well he could illustrate its progressive development. The "Treatise on Religious Affections" discovers his profound acquaintance with the nature of genuine religion, and with all the deceitful workings of the human heart. The "Inquiry into the Freedom of the Human Will," displays the talents of the author as a metaphysician, and his accurate knowledge of the Arminian and Calvinistic controversy. His Defence of the Doctrine of Original Sin, designed partly as an answer to a work on that subject by Dr. John Taylor, of Norwich, discovers the same high qualities which belong to his former works, with a greater portion of excellent critical interpretation of the Scriptures. His style, it is to be regretted, repels many from the examination of his writings; but a little perseverance and attention will render it familiar to a diligent student, and the effect of his close and convincing reasoning will prove eminently beneficial to the understanding.

EFFRONTES, a sect of heretics, in 1534, who scraped their forehead with a knife till it bled, and then poured oil into the wound. This ceremony served them instead of baptism.

They are likewise said to have denied the divinity of the Holy Spirit.

EICETÆ, a denomination in the year 680, who affirmed that, in order to make prayer acceptable to God, it should be performed dancing.

EICHORN, JOHN GODFREY, one of the most distinguished German scholars in Oriental literature, biblical criticism, and literary and general history. He was born at Dorrenzimmern, in 1752; in 1772 he was appointed professor at Jena; and, in 1788, he was made professor at Gottingen, where he remained till his death, in 1831. At Gottingen he devoted himself chiefly to biblical studies. The results of his inquiries were published in his Universal Library of Biblical Literature, his Repertory of Biblical and Oriental Literature, and his Introduction to the Old and New Testaments—works which contain much important and valuable information, and sound criticism, but also much of the grossest and most offensive specimens of German neology. His writings have had a great influence on the views of continental divines.

EJACULATION, a short prayer, in which the mind is directed to God, on any emergency. See PRAYER.

ELDER (πρεσβύτερος,) an overseer, ruler, leader.

Elders, or seniors, in ancient Jewish polity, were persons the most considerable for age, experience, and wisdom. Of this sort were the seventy men whom Moses associated with himself in the government: such likewise afterwards were those who held the first rank in the synagogue as presidents.—Elders, in church history, were originally those who held the first place in the assemblies of the primitive Christians. The word presbyter is often used in the New Testament in this signification, and as interchangeable with episcopos; hence the first meetings of Christian ministers were called Presbyteria, or assemblies of Elders.—Elders, in the Presbyterian discipline, are officers who, in conjunction with the ministers and deacons, compose the kirk sessions, who formerly used to take cognizance not only of all grosser immoralities, such as swearing, drunkenness, lewdness, fighting, scolding, disobedience to parents, absence from public worship, &c., but also what are termed the levities and amusements of life—as dancing, racing, card-playing, and the like. They were authorized, on some occasions, to carry their jurisdiction into the bosoms of families and individuals, to disarm private resentments, and to arbitrate in cases of domestic variance. Their principal business now is to take care of the poor's funds. They are chosen from among the people, and are received publicly with some degree of ceremony. In Scotland there is an indefinite number of elders in each parish, generally about twelve. See PRESBYTERIANS.

It has long been a matter of dispute, whether there are any such officers as lay elders mentioned in Scripture. On the one side, it is observed, that these officers are nowhere mentioned as being alone or single, but always as being many in every congregation. They are also mentioned separately from the brethren. Their office, more than once, is described as being distinct from that of preaching, not only in Rom. xii., where he that ruleth is expressly distinguished from him that exhorteth or teacheth, but also in that passage, 1 Tim. v. 17. On the other side it is said, that, from the above-mentioned passages, nothing can be collected with certainty to establish this opinion; neither can it be inferred from any other passage, that churches should be furnished with such officers, though, perhaps, prudence, in some circumstances, may make them expedient. "I incline to think," says Dr. Guyse, on the passage, 1 Tim. v. 17, "that the apostle intends only preaching elders, when he directs double honour to be paid to the elders that rule well, especially those who labour in the word and doctrine; and that the distinction lies not in the order of officers, but in the degree of their diligence, faithfulness, and eminence in laboriously fulfilling their ministerial work; and so the emphasis is to be laid on the word labour in the word and doctrine which has an especially annexed to it." Those who "ruled well" were such as remained at home, and diligently attended to the oversight of the flock, the conducting of discipline, &c., as well as teaching; those who "laboured in word and doctrine," such as in addition to their other pastoral duties, spent their time in laborious exertions to spread the gospel in the surrounding regions.

ELECTION. This word has different meanings. 1. It signifies God's taking a whole nation, community, or body of men, into external covenant with himself, by giving them the advantage of revelation as the rule of their belief and practice, when other nations are without it. Deut. vii. 6. 2. A temporary designation of some person or persons to the filling up of some particular station in the visible church, or office in civil life. John vi. 70; 1 Sam. x. 24. 3. The gracious and almighty act of the Divine Spirit, whereby God actually and visibly separates his people from the world by effectual calling. John xv. 19. 4. That eternal, sovereign, unconditional, particular, and immutable act of God, whereby he selected some from among all mankind, and of every nation under heaven, to be redeemed and everlastingly saved by Christ. Eph. i. 4; 2 Thess. ii. 13. See DECREE and PREDESTINATION.

With respect to this subject it is to be observed,—

1. That it is no part of the doctrine of Election, that God created a part of mankind merely to damn them. This is often said by those who wish to bring the doctrine into contempt; but it is not true. The ultimate object for which God created all men, is the advancement of his own glory. He will punish multitudes of the human race "with everlasting destruction from his presence;" but he did not bring them into being merely for the sake of punishing them. "God is love." There is not one malevolent emotion rankling in his bosom. It is one of the foulest stains that was ever cast upon his spotless character, to admit the thought that he brought creatures into being merely for the purpose of making them for ever miserable. In itself, he desires the salvation of every living man. We have his oath, "that he has no pleasure in the death of him that dieth." If he destroys the wicked, it is because their perdition is inseparable from the promotion of his own glory, and the highest good of his kingdom, and not because it is well pleasing to his benevolent mind, or the ultimate object of their creation.

2. It is no part of the doctrine of Election, that Christ died exclusively for the Elect. Such a representation is an unjustifiable perversion of the doctrine, and exposes it to unanswerable objections. Though there would have been no atonement but for God's design to save the elect, and though there could have been no designs of mercy toward the elect without an atonement; yet the doctrine of atonement and election are two distinct things. Much idle breath and illiberal crimination might have been spared, by giving them that place in the Christian system which they hold in the word of God. It has never yet been proved that Christ died exclusively for the elect. If language has any meaning, we are bound to believe that "he tasted death for every man." One would imagine that if the apostle had intended to put this question for ever at rest, he could not have said more than he has in these memorable words:—"and he is the propitiation for our sins; and not for our sins only, but also for the sins of the whole world."

3. It is no part of the doctrine of Election, that the Elect shall be saved let them do what they will. The immutable law of the divine kingdom has made personal holiness essential to eternal life. It is not less certain that "no man will see the Lord without holiness,"—than that no man will see the Lord unless he be of the "election of grace." The elect cannot be saved unless they possess supreme love to God, sincere contrition for all their sins, and faith unfeigned in the Lord Jesus Christ. The elect can no more enter heaven without being prepared for it than the non-elect. If a man continues stupid and secure,—if he never reads the Scriptures,—if he never attends upon the word and ordinances,—if he is never anxious for the salvation of his soul,—if he never repents and believes the gospel,—if he never becomes a follower of the meek and lowly Jesus; he may rest assured there is nothing in the doctrine of election that will save him. "Except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish."

4. It is no part of Election, that the non-elect will not be saved if they do as well as they can. If they would "repent and believe the gospel," there is nothing in the doctrine of election that would destroy them. If they would become reconciled to God, he would regard them with favour. If they would "come to Christ," they should "in nowise be cast out." Let the non-elect do their duty, and they will be saved. Nay, let them possess one holy desire, and they will be saved. And if they will not do this, it does not become them to wrest the doctrine of election, and say it is an essential part of it, that, do what they will, they must be lost. Not one of the non-elect will be lost, unless he persist in impenitence, reject the offers of mercy to the last, and die in his sins.

5. It is no part of the doctrine of Election, that the non-elect cannot comply with the terms of the gospel. The efforts to vindicate the doctrine of election without separating it from this unscriptural notion, have not only proved futile, but done harm. There is but one thing that prevents the non-elect from accepting the offers of mercy, and that is their cherished enmity against God. We are well aware that the Scriptures represent it to be impossible for men to do what they are unwilling to do. Hence says our Saviour,—"No man can come to me, except the Father which hath sent me draw him." His idea doubtless is, that men cannot come to him because they are unwilling to come; for he had just said, in the course of the same address, "and ye will not come unto me, that ye might have life." He supposes that mere unwillingness renders it impossible for them to come. This mode of speaking not only runs through the Bible, but is agreeable to the plainest dictates of reason and common sense. All the inability of the non-elect, therefore, to comply with the terms of the gospel, arises from their unwillingness to comply. Their inability is of a moral, and not a physical nature. It is a criminal impotence. It consists in nothing but their own voluntary wickedness. While, therefore, it is proper to say, that men cannot do what they are unwilling to do,—it is also proper to say, that they can do what they are willing to do. It is no perversion of language to say that a knave can be honest, or that a drunkard can be temperate; for every one knows that they could be if they would. Hence it is no perversion to say, that a sinful man can become holy, or that the non-elect can comply with the terms of the gospel. Their unwillingness lays them under no natural inability, and may at any time be removed by their being willing. The non-elect are just as able to repent and believe the gospel as the elect, if they were but disposed to do so. They are as capable of doing right as of doing wrong. The doctrine of election leaves them in full possession of all their powers as moral agents, and all possible liberty to choose or refuse the offers of mercy. But for his voluntary wickedness, Judas was as able to accept the gospel as Paul. The non-elect are able to comply with the terms of the gospel, if they choose to do it. It is therefore their own choice, and not the decree of election, that shuts them out of the kingdom of heaven. All representations of the doctrine of election, therefore, that deny the non-elect natural power to comply with the overtures of mercy, form no part of that doctrine as it is exhibited in the Bible.

But if none of these things belong to the doctrine of election, what is it? For the sake of a clear understanding of the subject, several things must be particularly observed.

1. All mankind are by nature in a state of sin and condemnation. They are "estranged from the womb." The "imagination of man's heart is evil from his youth." By the apostasy of their first parents, sin and the curse are the birth-right of all their natural descendants, from generation to generation; so that by their offence, all their posterity come into the world with a corrupt nature, and under the wrath of God.

2. Notwithstanding the native corruption of the human heart, and the lost condition of all mankind by nature, God has provided a full and complete atonement for all their sins. The atonement was made, not for the elect or non-elect, as such, but all men as sinners. "God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth on him might not perish, but have everlasting life." The atonement of Christ is sufficient for all, adapted to all, offered to all, and irrespective of the divine purpose as to its effectual application, made as much for one man as another.

3. Notwithstanding the unlimited provision of the gospel, all with one consent, reject the overtures of mercy, and will not come unto Christ that they might have life. Left to himself, every individual of the human race will reject the Saviour, and plunge into perdition. No sense of guilt and danger, no consciousness of obligation and duty, no pressure of motives, will constrain a living man to lay down the arms of rebellion and be reconciled to God. If the Spirit of God does not appear in the glory of his grace to wrest the weapons of revolt from his hands, and make the sinner willing in the day of his power, all are lost, and Christ is dead in vain.

4. This sad result God has determined to prevent. It is not his will that all mankind shall finally perish. He does not intend that they shall rob him of his glory, nor his Son of the reward of his death. Some he saves.

There is a part he rescues from themselves and from perdition. This number is definite. His eye is upon them. When in the gall of bitterness and bonds of iniquity, he sends his Spirit to convince them of their lost condition—to show them their need of mercy—to make his word quick and powerful—to create them anew in Christ Jesus, and to make them meet for the inheritance of the saints in light. He begins, carries on, and completes the work, and receives them at last to “the glory which is to be revealed.”

5. God does this from design. Who are saved and who lost, is not with him a matter of indifference. He has not committed the destiny of souls to the obscure omnipotency of chance. He formed a purpose to renew, and sanctify, and justify, and glorify a certain part of our fallen race. He formed this purpose from eternity. This design is an eternal design; this determination an eternal, irrevocable decree.

6. In doing this, it is important to remark that God is governed by a wise regard to his own good pleasure. He does not sanctify and save one part of mankind rather than another, because one part is better than another. The elect are no more worthy of being made the objects of regenerating and redeeming grace, than the non-elect. When the design of saving them was formed, they were not in being, and “had done neither good nor evil.” During the whole of their unregenerate state, they were opposing God and condemning the Son of his love. The moment before their regeneration, they were his determined enemies. It could not, therefore, have been from regard to any thing in them, that they were taken and others left, but from a regard to the mere good pleasure of God. It was a sovereign purpose. It was that all the glory might redound to God’s great and holy name.

7. Nor is it less important to subjoin, that this sovereign and eternal purpose was formed in view of the atonement of Christ. In its practical influence, it regarded men as already fallen by their iniquity, and beyond the possibility of deliverance, except by atonement. When God determined to save a part of mankind, he had it in prospect to provide such an expiation for the sins of the world, as to justify him in the unlimited offer of pardon, and in the full and complete justification of all who accept it. He owed it to himself, in forming the purpose to save, to devise a consistent method of salvation. It would have been a violation of the rights of moral government, to have received rebels into favour “without the shedding of blood.” Hence the elect are said to be “chosen in Christ.” In other places they are said to be “Christ’s seed.” In others, they are represented “as given to him” by his Father. When, in the covenant of peace, he engaged to lay down his life for the sins of the world, a stipulated number was “given him” as his reward. In view of mankind, as already plunged in guilt and ruin, and of Christ as making an adequate atonement, God “chose them to salvation, through sanctification of the Spirit, and belief of the truth.”

This is what we suppose the Scriptures mean by the doctrine of election. The apostle represents himself and the Christians at Ephesus to be “chosen”—“chosen in Christ”—“chosen in him before the foundation of the world;” and that not upon condition they would be holy, not because of any foreseen holiness, but “that they should be holy and without blame before him in love, having predestinated them unto the adoption of children by Jesus Christ unto himself, according to the good pleasure of his will.”

The truth of this doctrine may be evinced,—

1. From the divine immutability.

God is unchangeable. “He is in one mind, and who can turn him?” But if God is unchangeable, then every thing that has been, or will be, was unalterably fixed and determined in the divine mind from eternity. Hence it is written, “the counsel of the Lord standeth for ever,—the thoughts of his heart to all generations.” Hence God himself claims this exalted character: “I am God, and there is none else; I am God, and there is none like me; declaring the end from the beginning, and from ancient times, the things that are not yet done; saying, My counsel shall stand, and I will do all my pleasure.” If we could suppose the Deity to be wiser, and better, and mightier at some times than at others, we might suppose, that with every accession of knowledge, goodness, and power, he would form some new design. But he is always the same. And as his character never alters, so his purposes never alter. Hence the divine immutability secures the doctrine of election. If the divine mind has formed any new purpose with regard to the salvation of men, then he has altered his plans and is mutable; but if he has always been of the same mind, then, unless he actually saves the whole, he must have formed the purpose of saving a certain part. Every individual he saves, he must have “always meant to save,”—he must have always chosen and determined to save. But this is nothing more nor less than the doctrine of election. All the objections, therefore, that are made against the doctrine of election, are levelled equally against the divine immutability.

2. The doctrine of election may be conclusively argued from the Divine foreknowledge.

The mere light of nature is enough to teach us, that God knows all things, present, past, and to come. It is impossible that a Being of infinite wisdom should commence a system of operations without knowing what he is about to do. If God does not know all events before they actually take place, then his knowledge may increase, and he may be wiser to-morrow than he is to-day. In short, if he does not foreknow all things, he may not only from day to day discover things that are new, but he may deduce new results from them, may misjudge in his arrangements, and be frustrated in his purposes. But the Bible puts this question beyond a doubt. "Known unto God are all his works from the beginning of the world." It is a settled point, then, that God knew from all eternity every thing that would take place.

God, therefore, knows who will at last be saved. In the ages of eternity, he beheld the long tract of time from the fall of Adam to the general judgment, and fixed his eye on every individual of the human family that would at last enter into his kingdom. He knew the exact number, and he knew with absolute certainty. I say he knew with certainty; for there is nothing else that deserves the name of knowledge except that which is certain. God did not know how many, and who would probably be saved, but how many would certainly be saved. Absolutely to foreknow a mere contingency, is impossible. To know who might be saved, and who might not be saved, is to know nothing about it. Certainly to know that a thing will be, and yet certainly to know that it may not be, is the same thing as certainly to know and not certainly to know at the same time; which is palpable contradiction. It must be conceded, therefore, that God must have known with absolute certainty the exact number of those who would be saved. But how could this be known unless it were a determined event? If it were undetermined, it was uncertain; and if uncertain, it could not certainly be known. Let any man but an atheist look at this with an unprejudiced mind, and he must receive the doctrine of election. How could God know from eternity how many would be saved, unless he had from eternity determined to save precisely this number? In eternity, there was no being but God himself. There was no heavens and no earth, no angels and no men. God existed alone. And when he existed alone, he certainly knew how many intelligent beings would exist, and how many would be saved. But where did he obtain this knowledge? Not from any other being beside himself, for there was no other; and not from himself, unless he had formed the determination to save them; for if he had not formed the determination to save them, he could not have known that they would be saved. It is just as certain, therefore, that God determined from eternity who would be saved, as that he knew from eternity who would be saved. "For whom he did foreknow, he also did predestinate." But this is nothing more nor less than the doctrine of election. All the objections which lie against the doctrine of election, lie with equal force against the Divine prescience.

3. In proof of this doctrine, we shall make our appeal to the holy Scriptures. We consider the doctrine unanswerably demonstrated from the preceding considerations; but "to the law and the testimony." The Scriptures are the word of God, and the infallible rule of faith and practice. Here we have a standard to which every thing must bow. From this oracle there is no appeal. Let us go, then, to the Bible; and let us go—not to alter, not to expunge, not to supply, not to wrest from its plain and obvious meaning a single word; but simply to inquire what the Lord hath spoken, and to yield our preconceived opinions to the paramount authority of eternal truth. Here, if we are not deceived, we find the doctrine of election revealed as plainly as language can reveal it.

Let the reader carefully consult the following passages, and interpret them according to just and fair principles of exegesis, and we leave it to his own judgment to determine whether they do not teach the doctrine of a special election of particular persons to eternal life: Matt. xxiv. 22, 24; Acts xiii. 48; Rom. viii. 28—30; ix. 23; xi. 5, 7; Eph. i. 4, 5; 1 Thess. i. 4; v. 9; 2 Thess. ii. 13; 2 Tim. i. 9; ii. 10; 1 Pet. i. 2. The construction which some would force upon these passages, agreeably to which they understand merely the election or designation of nations or bodies of people to external religious privileges, cannot be maintained without unsettling the whole of the New Testament scheme of personal and individual salvation; and, however favourable such an idea may be to certain dogmas relative to the efficacy of a standing in what has been called the visible church, and the opus operatum of its sacraments, it cannot but prove highly prejudicial to the interests of genuine piety, and is, indeed, found to flourish only in regions where that piety has little or no influence.

ELLERIAN, or RONSODORFIANS. This sect arose, about the year 1726, in the duchy of Berg, and spread through the neighbourhood. Its founder was Elias Eller, who was born about 1690, near Elberfeld, at Ronsdorf, which, at that time, was little more than a farm. Eller, who claimed descent from Judah, married successively three wives; the first, on account of her piety; the second, for her youth; the third, for her money. The latter, Ann of Buchel, was the daughter of a pastry-cook of Elberfeld. These two consorts asserted that they were the two witnesses mentioned in the eleventh chapter of Revelation. Eller, the "Father of Sion," conversed familiarly with God, as a friend with his friend, the church having fallen into decay. God, who resided in him, sent him to form a new church, in which work his wife, the "Mother of Sion," was to co-operate, and to her all the secrets of predestination were revealed. He published his reveries in a German work, entitled, "The Shepherd's Bag," in allusion to that of David, which contained five stones to attack Goliath.

Eller collected his adherents from among the reformists of Elberfeld, who had become enthusiasts. With them he quitted that town in 1728, predicting that it would be destroyed by fire, like Sodom. The day on which this catastrophe was to happen being fixed, they all departed early in the morning to ascend Mount Ronsdorf, whence they expected to see the conflagration which was to consume the town, and they waited in vain till evening the fulfilment of the prediction. This miscalculation deadened their zeal, without undeceiving them. They erected houses at Ronsdorf, which were so situated that they could all be seen from that of their patron. Eller, first the despot, and then the tyrant of this little kingdom, was a cunning ambitious man, who employed spies in the government of his little sect; for espionage is inseparable from despotism. He loved long repasts and orgies, perhaps less from a taste for scenes of debauchery, than to gain the secrets which might be uttered in seasons of intoxication; for he had sufficient precaution to confide his doctrine to adepts only, one of its chief articles being to deny every thing in case of necessity.

In 1750, a synod of reformers, held at Waldeck, condemned Eller and his followers, who were also condemned by the theological faculty at Marburg, and afterwards excommunicated in another synod of reformers. The death of Eller, in 1750, cooled the enthusiasm, and undeceived the credulity of a multitude of people whom he had seduced. The reveries of this sect are amply described by Knevels.

Ronsdorf is now a pretty, populous, and industrious town.

ELOQUENCE, PULPIT. "The chief characteristics of the eloquence suited to the pulpit are these two,—gravity and warmth. The serious nature of the subjects belonging to the pulpit requires gravity; their importance to mankind requires warmth. It is far from being either easy or common to unite these characters of eloquence. The grave, when it is predominant, is apt to run into a dull uniform solemnity. The warm, when it wants gravity, borders on the theatrical and light. The union of the two must be studied by all preachers, as of the utmost consequence, both in the composition of their discourses, and in their manner of delivery. Gravity and warmth united, form that character of preaching which the French call onction; the affecting, penetrating, interesting manner, flowing from a strong sensibility of heart in the preacher, the importance of those truths which he delivers, and an earnest desire that they may make full impression on the hearts of his hearers." See DECLAMATION, SERMONS.

ELXAITES, ancient heretics, who made their appearance in the reign of the emperor Trajan, and took their name from their leader, Elxai. They kept a mean between the Jews, Christians, and Pagans: they worshipped but one God, observed the Jewish sabbath, circumcision, and the other ceremonies of the law; yet they rejected the Pentateuch and the prophets; nor had they any more respect for the writings of the apostles. Some are of opinion that Elxai ultimately joined the sect of the Ebionites.

EMANATION, (from the Latin emarare, to issue, flow out,) a term used in reference to the theosophical doctrine of the East, according to which, all created things emanated from the Supreme Being by an eternal efflux, and not by a spontaneous creation. It is found in the Indian mythology, as it is in the old Persian, or Bactro-Median system of Zoroaster. It had a powerful influence on the Greek philosophy, as may be seen in Pythagoras.

EMULATION, a generous ardour kindled by the praiseworthy examples of others; which impels us to imitate, to rival, and, if possible, to excel them. This passion involves in it esteem of the person whose attainments or conduct we emulate, of the qualities and actions in which we emulate him, and a desire of resemblance, together with a joy springing from the hope of success. The word comes originally from the Greek αμύλλα, contest; whence the Latin amulus, and thence our emulation. Plato makes emulation the daughter of envy; if so, there is a great difference between the mother and the offspring; the one being a virtue, and the other a vice. Emulation admires great actions, and strives to imitate them; envy refuses them the praises that are their due; emulation is generous, and only thinks of equalling or surpassing a rival; envy is low, and only seeks to lessen him. It would, therefore, be more proper to suppose emulation the daughter of admiration; admiration being a principal ingredient in the composition of it.

ENCRATITES, a sect in the second century, who abstained from marriage, wine, and animal food.

ENDOWMENT, ECCLESIASTICAL, a term used to denote the settlement of a pension upon a minister, or the building of a church, or the severing a sufficient portion of tithes for a vicar, when the benefice is appropriated.

Among the Dissenters, endowments are benefactions left to their place or congregation, for the support of their ministers. Where the congregation is poor or small, these have been found beneficial; but in many cases they have been detrimental. Too often has it tended to relax the exertions of the people; and when such a fund has fallen into the hands of an unsuitable minister, it has prevented his removal; when, had he derived no support from the people, necessity would have caused him to depart, and make room for one more worthy. Scarcely has it been found that any congregation has turned Arian or Socinian, but such as enjoyed such endowments.

ENERGICI, a denomination in the sixteenth century; so called because they held that the eucharist was the energy and virtue of Jesus Christ; not his body, nor a representation thereof.

ENERGUMENS, persons supposed to be possessed with the devil, concerning whom there were many regulations among the primitive Christians. They were denied baptism and the eucharist; at least this was the practice of some churches; and though they were under the care of exorcists, yet it was thought a becoming act of charity to let them have the public prayers of the church, at which they were permitted to be present.

ENTHUSIASM. To obtain just definitions of words which are promiscuously used, it must be confessed, is no small difficulty. This word, it seems, is used both in a good and a bad sense. In its best sense it signifies a divine affluus or inspiration. It is also taken for that noble ardour of mind which leads us to imagine any thing sublime, grand, or surprising. In its worst sense it signifies any impression on the fancy, or agitation of the passions, of which a man can give no rational account. It is generally applied to religious characters, and is said to be derived (απο των εν θυσιας μαυομενων) from the wild gestures and speeches of ancient religionists, pretending to more than ordinary and more than true communications with the gods, and particularly εν θυσιας, in the act or at the time of sacrificing. In this sense, then, it signifies that impulse of the mind which leads a man to suppose he has some remarkable intercourse with the Deity, while at the same time it is nothing more than the effects of a heated imagination, or a sanguine constitution.

That the Divine Being permits his people to enjoy fellowship with him, and that he can work upon the minds of his creatures when and how he pleases, cannot be denied. But, then, what is the criterion by which we are to judge, in order to distinguish it from enthusiasm? It is necessary there should be some rule, for without it the greatest extravagances would be committed, the most notorious impostors countenanced, and the most enormous evils ensue. Now, this criterion is the word of God; from which we learn, that we are to expect no new revelations, no extraordinary gifts, as in the apostles' time; that whatever opinions, feelings, views, or impressions we may have, if they are inconsistent with reason, if they do not tend to humble us, if they do not influence our temper, regulate our lives, and make us just, pious, honest, and uniform, they cannot come from God, but are evidently the effusions of an enthusiastic brain. On the other hand, if the mind be enlightened, if the will which was perverse be renovated, detached from evil and inclined to good; if the powers be roused to exertion for the promotion of the Divine glory, and the good of men; if the natural corruptions of the heart be suppressed; if peace and joy arise from a view of the goodness of God, attended with a spiritual frame of mind, a heart devoted to God, and a holy, useful life,—however this may be branded with the name of enthusiasm, it certainly is from God, because bare human efforts, unassisted by him, could never produce such effects as these. Theol. Misc., vol. ii. p. 43; Locke on Underst., vol. ii. ch. 19; Spect., No. 201, vol. iii.; Wesley's Sermon on Enthusiasm; Mrs. H. More's Hints towards forming the Character of a young Princess, vol. ii. p. 246; Natural History of Enthusiasm, by Taylor.

ENVY, a sensation of uneasiness and disquiet, arising from the advantages which others are supposed to possess above us, accompanied with malignity towards those who possess them. "This," says a good writer, "is universally admitted to be one of the blackest passions in the human heart. No one, indeed, is to be condemned for defending his rights, and showing displeasure against a malicious enemy; but to conceive ill-will at one who has attacked none of our rights, nor done us any injury, solely because he is more prosperous than we are, is a disposition altogether unnatural. Hence the character of an envious man is universally odious. All disclaim it, and they who feel themselves under the influence of this passion, carefully conceal it. The chief grounds of envy may be reduced to three: accomplishments of mind; advantages of birth, rank, and fortune; and superior success in worldly pursuits. To subdue this odious disposition, let us consider its sinful and criminal nature; the mischiefs it occasions to the world, the unhappiness it produces to him who possesses it; the evil causes that nourish it, such as pride and indolence: let us, moreover, bring often into view those religious considerations which regard us as Christians; how unworthy we are in the sight of God; how much the blessings we enjoy are above what we deserve. Let us learn reverence and submission to that Divine government which has appointed to every one such a condition as is fittest for him to possess: let us consider how opposite the Christian spirit is to envy; above all, let us offer up our prayers to the Almighty, that he would purify our hearts from a passion which is so base and so criminal."

EONIANS, the followers of Eon, a wild fanatic, of the province of Bretagne, in the twelfth century; he concluded, from the resemblance between eum, in the form for exorcising malignant spirits, viz. "per eum qui venturus est judicare vivos et mortuos," and his own name Eon, that he was the Son of God, and ordained to judge the quick and dead. Eon was, however, solemnly condemned by the council at Rheims, in 1148, and ended his days in a prison. He left behind him a number of followers, whom persecution and death, so weakly and cruelly employed, could not persuade to abandon his cause, or to renounce an absurdity which, says Mosheim, one would think could never have gained credit but in such a place as Bedlam.

EOQUINIANS, a denomination in the sixteenth century; so called from one Eoquinus, their master, who taught that Christ did not die for the wicked, but for the faithful only.

EPARCHY, in the Greek Church, the jurisdiction of a bishop, or other high ecclesiastical ruler.

EPICUREANS, the disciples of Epicurus, a Greek philosopher, who flourished about A.M. 3700. This sect maintained that the world was formed not by God, nor with any design, but by the fortuitous concourse of atoms. They denied that God governs the world, or in the least condescends to interfere with creatures below; they denied the immortality of the soul, and the existence of angels; they maintained that happiness consisted in pleasure; but some of them placed this pleasure in the tranquillity and joy of the mind arising from the practice of moral virtue, and which is thought by some to have been the true principle of Epicurus; others understood him in the gross sense, and placed all their happiness in corporeal pleasure. His system found many followers in Rome, among whom Celsus, Pliny the elder, and Lucretius, were the most eminent. When Paul was at Athens, he had conferences with the Epicurean philosophers, Acts xvii. 18. The word Epicurean is used at present for an indolent, effeminate, and voluptuous person, who only consults his private and particular pleasure, and particularly one who is devoted to the enjoyments of the table. See ACADEMICS.

EPIPHANY, a festival, otherwise called the manifestation of Christ to the Gentiles, observed on the 6th of January, in honour of the appearance of our Saviour to the three magi, or wise men, who came to adore and bring him presents. In Germany, this feast is called the day of the holy three kings. The Greeks term it Theophany, or appearance of God.

EPISCOPACY, that form of church government in which diocesan bishops are established as distinct from and superior to priests or presbyters.

The controversy respecting Episcopacy commenced soon after the Reformation, and has been agitated with great warmth, between the Episcopalians on the one side, and the Presbyterians and Independents on the other. Among the Protestant churches abroad, those which were reformed by Luther and his associates are in general episcopal; whilst such as follow the doctrines of Calvin, have for the most part thrown off the order of bishops, as one of the corruptions of popery. In England, however, the controversy has been considered as of greater importance than on the continent. It has been strenuously maintained by one party, that the episcopal order is essential to the constitution of the church; and by others, that it is a pernicious encroachment on the rights of men, for which there is no authority in Scripture. We will just briefly state their arguments.

I. Episcopacy, arguments for. 1. Some argue that the nature of the office which the apostles bore was such, that the edification of the church would require they should have some successors in those ministrations which are not common to gospel ministers.—2. That Timothy and Titus were bishops of Ephesus and Crete, whose business it was to exercise such extraordinary acts of jurisdiction as are now claimed by diocesan bishops, 1 Tim. i. 3; 1 Tim. iii. 19, 22; 2 Tim. ii. 2; Tit. i. 5, &c.; Tit. iii. 10.—3. Some have argued from the mention of angels, i. e. as they understand it, of diocesan bishops, in the seven churches of Asia, particularly the angel of Ephesus, though there were many ministers employed in it long before the date of that epistle, Acts xx. 17, 18.—4. It is urged, that some of the churches which were formed in large cities during the lives of the apostles, and especially that of Jerusalem, consisted of such vast numbers as could not possibly assemble at one place.—5. That in the writers who succeeded the inspired penmen, there is a multiplied and concurring evidence to prove the apostolic institution of episcopacy.

II. Episcopacy, arguments against. 1. To the above it is answered, that as the office of the apostles was such as to require extraordinary and miraculous endowments for the discharge of many parts of it, it is impossible that they can have any successors in those services, who are not empowered for the execution of them as the apostles themselves were; and it is maintained, that so far as ordination, confirmation, and excommunication, may be performed without miraculous gifts, there is nothing in them but what seems to suit the pastoral office in general.

2. That Timothy and Titus had not a stated residence in these churches, but only visited them for a time, 2 Tim. iv. 9, 13; Tit. iii. 12. It also appears from other places in which the journeys of Timothy and Titus are mentioned, that they were a kind of itinerant officers, called evangelists, who were assistants to the apostles; for there is great reason to believe the first epistle to Timothy was written prior to those from Rome in the time of Paul's imprisonment, as some think the second was also. To which we may add, that it seems probable at least that they had very extraordinary gifts to furnish them for their superior offices, 1 Tim. iv. 14; Eph. iv. 11; 2 Tim. iv. 5. And though Timothy was with Paul when he took his leave of the elders of Ephesus, (Acts xx.) the apostle gives not the least hint of any extraordinary power with which he was invested, nor says one word to engage their obedience to him; which is a very strong presumption that no such relation did subsist, or was to take place.

3. As to the angels of the seven churches in Asia, it is certain that, for any thing which appears in our Lord's epistles to them (Rev. ii. and iii.), they might be no more than the pastors of single congregations with their proper assistants.

4. To the fourth argument it is answered.

1. That the word μυρίαδες may only signify great numbers, and may not be intended to express that there were several times ten thousand, in an exact and literal sense: compare Luke, ch. xii. ver. 1. (Greek.)—2. That no sufficient proof is brought from Scripture of there being such numbers of people in any particular place as this supposes; for the myriads of believing Jews spoken of in the preceding text, as well as the numbers mentioned, Acts ii. 41; Acts iv. 4, might very probably be those who were gathered together at those great feasts from distant places, of which few might have their stated residence in that city. See Acts, ch. vii. ver. 1—3.—3. If the number were so great as the objection supposes, there might be, for any thing which appears in Scripture, several bishops in the same city, as there are, among those who do not allow of diocesan episcopacy, several co-ordinate pastors, overseers, or bishops: and though Eusebius does indeed pretend to give us a catalogue of the bishops of Jerusalem, it is to be remembered how the Christians had been dispersed from thence for a considerable time, at and after the Roman war, and removed into other parts, which must necessarily very much increase the uncertainty which Eusebius himself owns there was, as to the succession of bishops in most of the ancient sees.

5. As to the ancient writers, it is observed, that though Clemens Romanus recommends to the Corinthians the example of the Jewish church, where the high priest, ordinary priest, and Levites, knew and observed their respective offices, yet he never mentions presbyters and bishops as distinct, nor refers the contending Corinthians to any one ecclesiastical head as the centre of unity, which he would probably have done if there had been any diocesan bishops among them; nay, he seems evidently to speak of presbyters as exercising the episcopal office. See sec. xxxix. of his epistle.—2. As for Irenæus, it does not appear that he made any distinction between bishops and presbyters. He does indeed mention the succession of bishops from the apostles, which is reconcileable with the supposition of their being parochial, nor altogether irreconcilable with the supposition of joint pastors in those churches.—3. It is allowed that Ignatius, in many places, distinguishes between bishops and presbyters, and requires obedience to bishops from the whole church; but as he often supposes each of the churches to which he wrote to meet in one place, and represents them as breaking one loaf, and surrounding one altar, and charges the bishop to know all his flock by name, it is most evident that he must speak of a parochial, and not a diocesan bishop.—4. Polycarp exhorts the Christians at Philippi to be subject to the presbyters and deacons, but says not one word about any bishop.—5. Justin Martyr speaks of the president, but then he represents him as being present at every administration of the eucharist, which he also mentions as always making a part of their public worship; so that the bishop here must have only been the pastor of one congregation.—6. Tertullian speaks of approved elders; but there is nothing said of them that proves a diocesan, since all he says might be applied to a parochial bishop.—7. Though Clemens Alexandrinus speaks of bishops, priests, and deacons, yet it cannot be inferred from hence that the bishops of whom he speaks were any thing more than parochial.—8. Origen speaks distinctly of bishops and presbyters, but unites them both, as it seems, under the common name of priests, saying nothing of the power of bishops as extending beyond one congregation, and rather insinuates the contrary, when he speaks of offenders as brought before the whole church to be judged by it.—9. The Apostolic Constitutions frequently distinguish between bishops and presbyters; but these Constitutions cannot be depended on, as they are supposed to be a forgery of the fourth century.—10. It is allowed that, in succeeding ages, the difference between bishops and presbyters came to be more and more magnified, and various churches came under the care of the same bishop: nevertheless, Jerome does expressly speak of bishops and presbyters as of the same order; and Gregory Nazianzen speaks of the great and affecting distinction made between ministers in prerogative of place, and other tyrannical privileges (as he calls them) as a lamentable and destructive thing.

III. Episcopacy, how introduced. It is easy to apprehend how Episcopacy, as it was in the primitive church, with those alterations which it afterwards received, might be gradually introduced. The apostles seem to have taught chiefly in large cities; they settled ministers there, who, preaching in country villages, or smaller towns, increased the number of converts: it would have been most reasonable that those new converts, which lay at a considerable distance from the large towns, should, when they grew numerous, have formed themselves into distinct churches, under the care of their proper pastors or bishops, independently of any of their neighbours; but the reverence which would naturally be paid to men who had conversed with the apostles, and perhaps some desire of influence and dominion, from which the hearts of very good men might not be entirely free, and which early began to work, (3 John 9; 2 Thess. ii. 7,) might easily lay a foundation for such a subordination in the ministers of new erected churches to those which were more ancient; and much more easily might the superiority of a pastor to his assistant presbyters increase, till it at length came to that great difference which we own was early made, and probably soon carried to an excess. And if there were that degree of degeneracy in the church, and defection from the purity and vigour of religion, which the learned Vitringa supposes to have happened between the time of Nero and Trajan, it would be less surprising that those evil principles, which occasioned episcopal, and at length the papal usurpation, should before that time exert some considerable influence.

IV. Episcopacy reduced, plan of. Archbishop Usher projected a plan for the reduction of Episcopacy, by which he would have moderated it in such a manner as to have brought it very near the Presbyterian government of the Scotch church,—the weekly parochial vestry answering to their church session; the monthly synod to be held by the Chorepiscopi, answering to their presbyteries; the diocesan synod to their provincial, and the national to their general assembly. The meeting of the dean and chapter, practised in the Church of England, is but a faint shadow of the second, the ecclesiastical court of the third, and the convocation of the fourth. *Bingham's Origines Ecclesiasticæ; Stillingfleet's Origines Sacra; Boyse and Howe on Epis.; Benson's Dissertation concerning the first Set. of the Christ. EQUITY is that exact rule of righteousness or justice which is to be observed between man and man. Our Lord beautifully and comprehensively expresses it in these words: "All things whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you, do ye even so to them, for this is the law and the prophets." Matt. vii. 12. This golden rule, says Dr. Watts, has many excellent properties in it. 1. It is a rule that is easy to be understood, and easy to be applied by the meanest and weakest understanding, Isa. xxxv. 8.—2. It is a very short rule, and easy to be remembered: the weakest memory can retain it; and the meanest of mankind may carry this about with them, and have it ready upon all occasions.—3. This excellent precept carries greater evidence to the conscience, and a stronger degree of conviction in it, than any other rule of moral virtue.—4. It is particularly fitted for practice, because it includes in it a powerful motive to stir us up to do what it enjoins.—5. It is such a rule as, if well applied, will almost always secure our neighbour from injury, and secure us from guilt if we should chance to hurt him.—6. It is a rule as much fitted to awaken us to sincere repentance, upon the transgression of it, as it is to direct us to our present duty.—7. It is a most extensive rule, with regard to all the stations, ranks, and characters of mankind, for it is perfectly suited to them all.—8. It is a most comprehensive rule with regard to all the actions and duties that concern our neighbours. It teaches us to regulate our temper and behaviour, and promote tenderness, benevolence, gentleness, &c.—9. It is also a rule of the highest prudence with regard to ourselves, and promotes our own interest in the best manner.—10. This rule is fitted to make the whole world as happy as the present state of things will admit. EQUIVOCATION, the using a term or expression that has a double meaning. Equivocations are said to be expedients to save telling the truth, and yet without telling a falsity; but if an intention to deceive constitute the essence of a lie, which in general it does, I cannot conceive how it can be done without incurring guilt, as it is certainly an intention to deceive.

ERASMUS, (DESIDERIUS), was born at Rotterdam, October 28th, 1467. His father's name was Gerard. At the age of four he was sent to school; and as he excelled in singing, he was chosen chorister of Utrecht cathedral. At the age of nine he was placed under the tuition of Alexander Hegius of Deventer. Erasmus developed in his youth great capacities, and excited the notice of men of eminence. In 1480 he was deprived, by death, of both his father and mother; the former placing him, together with his brother, under the care of three guardians. Those guardians were all of them, however, unworthy men; and, determining to spoliates the property of these children, they agreed to devote them to a religious life. Erasmus they sent to a convent of friars at Bolduc, where he wasted three years of his life; and he was next sent to that of Sion, near Delft; and in 1486, when wearied with that seclusion, they sent him to a third, Stein, near Tergou.

From the last of those houses he however got discharged; and discarding the name of Gerard, went by that of Erasmus. In 1490 he lived with Henry a Bergis, archbishop of Cambray. His knowledge was at this time very considerable. He was a scholar and a divine, and determined on rendering himself useful in his day and generation. In 1492 he was ordained priest by the Bishop of Utrecht, and continued to cultivate his mind, and to collect stores of useful knowledge. In 1493 he wrote his celebrated tract "De Scribendis Epistolis." In 1495 he removed to Paris, and kept a seminary for the education of young noblemen of England and France. Lord William Mountjoy was among their number. He now wrote his book "De Ratione conscribendi Epistolas, de Copia Verborum," &c.; and in the year 1497 he left Paris, and resided in the Low Countries, in the castle of Tornenheus; visited London and Oxford, and became acquainted with many English prelates of distinguished piety and learning. At Oxford he continued to reside: studied in St. Mary's College; and formed many connexions and acquaintanceships, which were afterwards of great use to him. From England Erasmus returned to Paris, where he again supported himself by pupils. In 1498 he prepared his "Adages," and applied himself very sedulously to the study of Greek; and he again visited England, but soon returned to Paris, where he reprinted his "De Ratione," &c. Erasmus wrote a jesting letter, this year, to the poet laureat of France, which did not, however, tend to raise his reputation. Towards the end of the year Erasmus visited Orleans, and was in great danger, during that journey, of robbery and murder. In 1500 he studied the works of St. Jerome; of most of the fathers; and printed his "Adages," for the first time. In 1503, the last year of the Pope Alexander, Erasmus published several of his works, and afterwards went to Paris. In 1504 his mind was deeply fixed on religious studies, to which he intended to devote the remainder of his days. In the same year he published his "Enchiridion," which is a book of devotion, and designed to expose the follies of the church of Rome. In 1506 he was in England; dedicated the Translation of Lucian's Timon to Dr. Ruthall; published a Translation of other Dialogues of Lucian; visited Cambridge, and excited the universal attention of the learned. In 1508 he took his Doctor's degree at Turin, resided at Florence, and published a third edition of his "Adages." He was also at this time tutor to the Archbishop of St. Andrew's. In 1509 he received a letter from the Prince of Wales, visited Italy, and was well received by the Cardinal of St. George. At Rome he wrote his "Querela Pacis," of which, when Julius II. was informed, he sent for Erasmus to dispute with him; but though that pontiff was imperious and violent, he merely reprimanded him for meddling with the affairs of princes. Towards the close of this year, Erasmus journeyed to England. There he translated the Hecuba of Euripides into Latin verse, and adding to it some other poems, published the volume, and dedicated it to Warham. He at this time resided with the celebrated Thomas More; and there wrote, in a week, his "Praise of Folly." Erasmus at this time was very poor; and the academies at Cambridge, where he resided, were as poor as himself. In 1511 he sent the Saturnalia of Lucian, translated into Latin also, to Warham. Warham was a great canonist, an able statesman, a dexterous courtier, a favourite of the learned, and a hater of Cardinal Wolsey. In 1513 he wrote an elegant letter to the Abbot of St. Bertin, against the rage of going to war, which then possessed the French and English. Erasmus had been long engaged in translating a new edition of the New Testament, and which, when completed, he presented to the almoner of Henry VIII. On that work he bestowed great pains, and it reflects great honour on his name. Warham now presented him with the rectory of Aldington, Kent, and an annuity of 20*l*. In 1514 Erasmus travelled to Flanders; wrote there the Abridgment of his Life, and the celebrated Letter to Father Serrarius. In that letter he exposed the evils which existed in the religious houses; and yet, at the same time, boldly stood forward in defence of true Christianity. In 1515 he was engaged in reprinting or revising his various works. In 1516 he received an invitation to France, from Francis I. In that year, the New Testament, Greek and Latin, with his notes, was published by him at Basle, and the works of Saint Jerome, which he dedicated to Warham.

This edition of the entire New Testament in the original Greek, is the first that was printed and published separately. The New Testament had been printed in the Complutensian Polyglott, in 1514, but it was not published till 1522. Both in this and the second edition, the disputed passage, 1 John v. 7, is omitted; but he introduced it into the three following, on the authority of only one manuscript, the Montfortian, which has been ascertained to be of recent date. His Latin translation is better than the Vulgate, and more conformable to the Greek text. He retains, however, more of the old ecclesiastical words and phrases than the Protestant translators. His annotations, in the opinion of Ernesti, prepared the way, and laid the foundation for all who have since excelled in interpreting the Scriptures, though he often errs through his ignorance of Hebrew.

Erasmus had now attained to wondrous eminence. His correspondents were the most learned men of all countries. His opinions were canvassed as those of an oracle, and his epistles and correspondence were published. Faber, at this time, however, wrote against his Commentary on Paul's epistles; and Edward Lee wrote generally against his theological sentiments. The first edition of his "New Testament" had so rapid a sale, that in the autumn of this year he was busy in revising it. In the struggles which took place between the Reformed and the Romanists in 1518, Erasmus took a great deal of interest. The indulgences of Pope Leo X. he opposed; Luther he respected for his magnanimous opposition to their sale; and for such conduct he was hated by those who had formerly esteemed him. It was now that the opposition to his New Testament became more violent; but whilst Erasmus was kind and amiable, he was firm and decided. In 1519 Erasmus received from Melancthon a letter, expressing his approbation of his New Testament and Paraphrases, and the good wishes of Luther. To it he kindly replied, and said of Luther, "All the world agree in commending his moral character, but of his doctrines there are various sentiments. I have not as yet read his works; he hath given us good advice on certain points; and God grant that his success may be equal to the liberty he hath taken!" In this year Latomus attacked the sentiments of Erasmus, and stated, "that a great part of true theology consists in a pious disposition of heart;" but Erasmus soon vanquished his opponent. He also at this time received a letter from Luther, and replied to it, thanking him for his services, exhorting him to moderation, and wishing him success. The religious tenets of Erasmus were, in 1529, again attacked, but with no success; and his piety, faith in Christ, and holiness of life, best proved to the candid and considerate, that his religion could not but be right. With the celebrated Budæus and Vives he was at this time intimately acquainted. In the same year he dedicated to Cardinal Pucci an edition of "Cyprian;" and to Jacobus Tutor, "Cicero's Offices," "Old Age," "Friendship," and "Paradoxes." He also published "The Life of Jerome." In 1520, he published his "Paraphrase of the Epistle to the Ephesians," which is held by the learned and critical in high estimation. He was also engaged in endeavouring to promote the peace of Christendom; and for this purpose wrote to Campegius, Wolsey, and Henry VIII. For Luther he felt a greater regard in proportion as his persecution increased; but he ever advised moderation, which Luther well knew would be unsuccessful; but Erasmus was afraid that Luther's attempted reformation would have ill success, and therefore, for himself, thought it improper to engage in it. It must, indeed, be admitted that Erasmus was not sufficiently decided; and therefore it was that the Reformed could not rely on him, and the Romanists hated him.

In 1521 the celebrated Diet of Worms was held, and Luther confined in prison. Erasmus sympathised with him, and for such conduct he incurred the anger of the monks, who hated him as sincerely as they did Luther. In 1521 he published the works of St. Hilary, and also his celebrated Colloquies in Latin, which he wrote partly that young persons might have a book to teach them the Latin tongue, and religion and morals at the same time: and partly to cure the bigoted world, if he could, of that superstitious devotion, which the monks inculcated more sedulously than true Christian piety. On them the Faculty of Theology, at Paris, passed a general censure; and a provincial council at Cologne, in 1549, also condemned them. In this year Adrian VI. invited Erasmus to Rome, but he declined to attend, though, at his request, he suggested the best means of suppressing Lutheranism. It appears to be generally admitted, as well by Erasmus as his friends, and by all historians, that he differed with Luther in his opinions as to free will, and at the same time perceived the errors of the Catholic Church. Conciliating, and even timid, he desired that such errors should be only attacked by argument, and did not therefore encourage Luther, and yet he wished him success so far as his sentiments were independent of his notions on free will. Thus hampered and perplexed, his conduct in this matter was not consistent; for while at one time he was in theory a Lutheran, he at other times took great pains to undeceive the public, and satisfy his friends that he was not. Erasmus had stated the necessity of reformation, and had proposed it; but he hesitated whether it was not better to suffer such reformation to be retarded than to disturb Christendom by such a zeal and spirit as were manifested by Luther. In 1523, Adrian dying, was succeeded by Clement II. who invited Erasmus to Rome; but the invitation he declined, since the object intended was evidently to detain him at Rome, because he had taken too decided a part in favour of the Reformation. In 1524 Luther wrote to Erasmus on the subject of an opposition which he expected him to make in the cause of the Reformation, which was spirited and nervous; to it Erasmus replied, but the letter is not extant. In 1525 he published his "Diatriba de libero Arbitrio," against Luther, and to which the latter wrote a spirited reply. Erasmus also wrote a letter to Ecolampadius. He received this year from Beda, some notes on his Paraphrase on St. Luke, for which he thanked him, and requested the same on the other paraphrases; but Beda having attacked him with too much acrimony, these compliments were afterwards exchanged into warm reproaches, and Beda represented as a cobbler who went beyond his last. At this time he published his "Lingua," on the good and bad uses of the tongue, and dedicated it to the Chancellor of Poland. Œcolampadius replied to his attack on him, but Erasmus never undertook to confute him. In 1526 his attention, however, was greatly occupied by that controversy, in which Vives and other celebrated men interfered. In this year he published some tracts of Chrysostom, with a dedication to John Claymond, which is not among his Epistles. In 1527 he wrote to Polydore Virgil, on the subject of the difference which existed between them, and the endeavours of Virgil to reconcile them. His New Testament and Colloquies were this year attacked in London, and he defended them in a long epistle to Aldridge; he also published the works of St. Ambrose. His second Hyperaspistes against Luther made its appearance soon afterwards. In this year he was greatly opposed by the Spanish monks, though such opposition he did not regard. Thus the Catholic divines were as little favourable to Erasmus as to the Reformers; and had the votes of both parties been collected concerning him, he would have been judged not greatly attached to the Romish faith. This was the effect of his pacific scheme of reformation which ended in offending the papists, without obtaining from them even the smallest change, or the shadow of a compliance.

In 1528 Erasmus received a polite letter from Melancthon, who confessed that he did not approve Luther's violent measures, but yet reprobated Erasmus for his great antipathies. He now published two treatises in dialogue: one "On the Pronunciation of the Greek and Latin Languages," and another, entitled "The Cicero Nianus;" in the latter of which he rallied some Italian papists, who scrupled to use any word or phrase not to be found in Cicero. This work created him some enemies. In 1529 Erasmus departed from Basle, and went to Friburg. He published some pieces of Chrysostom in Greek, a treatise of Georgius Agricola, and a book of Lactantius. He dedicated to the Duke of Cleves two treatises of St. Ambrose, which had not before been published; and he also published St. Augustine, for which the Dominicans censured him. In this year the reformed in Germany obtained the name of Protestants. In 1530 he was busied in translating various treatises of St. Chrysostom; in writing his life; in superintending the publication of a work of Algerus, a Benedictine monk, who wrote on the sacrament; and in publishing his "Christian Widow," which he dedicated to the Queen dowager of Hungary. In 1531 he printed the works of Aristotle, and dedicated them to Sir Thomas More. He also published his useful and entertaining collection of Apophthegms, addressed to the divines of Louvaine; a defence of his Colloquies against the charge of false doctrine; and sent Hervaginus a collection of his Epistles. In 1532 he published St.

Basil, in Greek; and dedicated Terence to two young gentlemen of Poland. In 1533 he dedicated to Feticchius the Geography of Ptolomy; and to Emstedius, a commentary on the Psalms, written by Haimon. He also published an Exposition of the Apostles' Creed; of the Decalogue; and of the Lord's Prayer, in the form of a catechism. In 1535 he returned to Basle, to try if he could recover his health, where he continued till the time of his death. In 1536 he published his Commentary on Psalm the fourteenth, which has been much praised. His health now progressively declined; and on July the 12th, in the 69th year of his age, after the illness of a month, he expired, and was buried in the cathedral church of Basle. In Erasmus we behold a man who, in his youth lying under no small disadvantages of birth and education, depressed by poverty, friendless, and ill supported, overcame all these obstacles, and became not only one of the most considerable scholars of his age, but acquired the favour and protection of princes, nobles, and prelates of the greatest names in church and state. He has been accused of Arminianism; but when living he denied the charge, and his works generally support such denial. His style of writing was unaffected, easy, copious, fluent, and clear, but not always classical. It is to be feared, however, that his fame rests more on his literary attainments and labours, than upon the decision or propriety of his religious character.

ERASTIANS, so called from Erastus, a German divine of the sixteenth century. The pastoral office, according to him, was only persuasive, like a professor of science over his students, without any power of the keys annexed. The Lord's Supper, and other ordinances of the gospel, were to be free and open to all. The minister might dissuade the vicious and unqualified from the communion; but might not refuse it, or inflict any kind of censure; the punishment of all offences, either of a civil or religious nature, being referred to the civil magistrate.

ERROR, a mistake of our judgment, giving assent to that which is not true. Mr. Locke reduces the causes of error to four. 1. Want of proofs. 2. Want of ability to use them. 3. Want of will to use them. 4. Wrong measures of probability. In a moral and scriptural sense, it signifies sin. See SIN.

ESSENES, a very ancient sect, that was spread abroad through Syria, Egypt, and the neighbouring countries. They maintained that religion consisted wholly in contemplation and silence. Some of them passed their lives in a state of celibacy; others embraced the state of matrimony, which they considered as lawful, when entered into with the sole design of propagating the species, and not to satisfy the demand of lust. Some of them held the possibility of appeasing the Deity by sacrifices, though different from that of the Jews; and others maintained that no offering was acceptable to God but that of a serene and composed mind, addicted to the contemplation of divine things. They looked upon the law of Moses as an allegorical system of spiritual and mysterious truths, and renounced, in its explication, all regard to the outward letter. The principal ancient writers who give an account of this sect, are Josephus, Philo, and Pliny.

ESTABLISHMENTS, RELIGIOUS. By a religious establishment is generally understood such an intimate connexion between religion and civil government as is supposed to secure the best interests, and great end of both. This article, like many others, has afforded matter of considerable dispute. In order that the reader may judge for himself, we shall take a view of both sides of the question.

The partisans for religious establishments observe, that they have prevailed universally in every age and nation. The ancient patriarchs formed no extensive nor permanent associations, but such as arose from the relationships of nature. Every father governed his own family, and their offspring submitted to his jurisdiction. He presided in their education and discipline, in their religious worship, and in their general government. His knowledge and experience handed down to them their laws and their customs, both civil and religious; and his authority enforced them. The offices of prophet, priest, and king, were thus united in the same patriarch. Gen. xviii. 19; xvii. and xxi.; xiv. 18. The Jews enjoyed a religious establishment dictated and ordained by God. In turning our attention to the heathen nations, we shall find the same incorporation of religious with civil government. Gen. xlvii. 22; 2 Kings xvii. 27, 29. Every one who is at all acquainted with the history of Greece and Rome, knows that religion was altogether blended with the policy of the state. The Koran may be considered as the religious creed and civil code of all the Mohammedan tribes. Among the Celts, or the original inhabitants of Europe, the druids were both their priests and their judges, and their judgment was final. Among the Hindoos, the priests and sovereigns are of different tribes or castes, but the priests are superior in rank; and in China, the emperor is sovereign pontiff, and presides in all public acts of religion.

Again, it is said, that, although there is no form of church government absolutely prescribed in the New Testament, yet from the associating law, on which the gospel lays so much stress, by the respect for civil government it so earnestly enjoins, and by the practice which followed, and finally prevailed, Christians cannot be said to disapprove, but to favour religious establishments.

Religious establishments, also, it is observed, are founded in the nature of man, and interwoven with all the constituent principles of human society; the knowledge and profession of Christianity cannot be upheld without a clergy; a clergy cannot be supported without a legal provision; and a legal provision for the clergy cannot be constituted without the preference of one sect of Christians to the rest. An established church is most likely to maintain clerical respectability and usefulness, by holding out a suitable encouragement to young men to devote themselves early to the service of the church; and likewise enables them to obtain such knowledge as shall qualify them for the important work.

They who reason on the contrary side observe, that the patriarchs sustaining civil as well as religious offices, is no proof at all that religion was incorporated with the civil government, in the sense above referred to; nor is there the least hint of it in the sacred Scriptures. That the case of the Jews can never be considered in point, as they were under a theocracy, and a ceremonial dispensation that was to pass away, and consequently not designed to be a model for Christian nations. That whatever was the practice of heathens in this respect, this forms no argument in favour of that system, which is the very opposite to paganism. The church of Christ is of a spiritual nature, and ought not, yea, cannot, in fact, be incorporated with the state without sustaining material injury. In the three first and purest ages of Christianity, the church was a stranger to any alliance with temporal powers; and, so far from needing their aid, religion never flourished so much as while they were combined to suppress it. As to the support which Christianity, when united to civil government, yields to the peace and good order of society, it is observed, that this benefit will be derived from it, at least, in as great a degree without an establishment as with it. Religion, if it have any power, operates on the conscience of men; and, resting solely on the belief of invisible realities, it can derive no weight or solemnity from human sanctions. Human establishments, it is said, have been, and are, productive of the greatest evils; for in this case it is requisite to give the preference to some particular system; and, as the magistrate is no better judge of religion than others, the chances are as great of his lending his sanction to the false as the true. The thousands that have been persecuted and suffered in consequence of establishments, will always form an argument against them. Under establishments also, it is said, corruption cannot be avoided. Emolument must be attached to the national church, which may be a strong inducement to its ministers to defend it, be it ever so remote from the truth. Thus, also, error becomes permanent; and that set of opinions which happens to prevail when the establishment is formed, continues, in spite of superior light and improvement, to be handed down without alteration from age to age. Hence the disagreement between the public creed of the church and the private sentiments of its ministers. As to the provision made for the clergy, this may be done without an establishment, as matter of fact shows in hundreds of instances. Dissenting ministers, or those who do not hold in establishments, it is observed, are not without means of obtaining knowledge; but, on the contrary, many of them are equal to their brethren in the establishment for erudition and sound learning. It is not to be dissembled neither, that among those who, in general, cannot agree with human establishments, there are as pious and as useful members of society as others. Finally, though all Christians should pay respect to civil magistrates as such, and all magistrates ought to encourage the church, yet no civil magistrates have any power to establish any particular form of religion binding upon the consciences of the subject; nor are magistrates even represented in Scripture as officers or rulers of the church. As Mr. Coleridge states, the Christian church is not a kingdom, realm, or state of the world; nor is it an estate of any such kingdom, realm, or state; but it is the appointed opposite to them all collectively:—the sustaining, correcting, befriending opposite of the world!—the compensating counterforce to the inherent and inevitable evils and defects of the state as a state, and without reference to its better or worse construction as a particular state: while, whatever is beneficent and humanizing in the aims, tendencies, and proper objects of the state, it collects in itself as in a focus, to radiate them back in a higher quality; or, to change the metaphor, it completes and strengthens the edifice of the state, without interference or commixture, in the mere act of laying and securing its own foundations. And for these services the church of Christ asks of the state neither wages nor dignities; she asks only protection, and to be let alone. These, indeed, she demands; but even these only on the ground that there is nothing in her constitution, nor in her discipline, inconsistent with the interests of the state; nothing resistant or impedimental to the state in the exercise of its rightful powers, in the fulfilment of its appropriate duties, or in the effectuation of its legitimate objects.

ETERNITY, with respect to God, is a duration without beginning or end. As it is the attribute of human nature, it is a duration that has a beginning, but will never have an end. "It is a duration," says a lively writer, "that excludes all number and computation; days, and months, and years, yea, and ages, are lost in it, like drops in the ocean! Millions of millions of years; as many years as there are sands on the sea-shore, or particles of dust in the globe of the earth, and those multiplied to the highest reach of number—all these are nothing to eternity. They do not bear the least imaginable proportion to it, for these will come to an end as certainly as a day; but eternity will never, never, never, come to an end! It is a line without an end! it is an ocean without a shore! Alas! what shall I say of it? it is an infinite, unknown something, that neither human thought can grasp, nor human language describe!" Orton on Eternity; Shower on ditto; Davies's Sermons, ser. 11; Saurin's Sermons, vol. iii. p. 370.

ETERNITY OF GOD is the perpetual continuance of his being, without beginning, end, or succession. That he is without beginning, says Dr. Gill, may be proved from, 1. His necessary self-existence, Exod. iii. 14. 2. From his attributes, several of which are said to be eternal, Rom. i. 20. Acts xv. 18. Psal. ciii. 17. Jer. xxxi. 3. 3. From his purposes, which are also said to be from eternity, Isa. xxv. 1. Eph. iii. 11. Rom. ix. 11. Eph. i. 4. 4. From the covenant of grace, which is eternal, 2 Sam. xxiii. 5. Mic. v. 2.

That he is without end, may be proved from, 1. His spirituality and simplicity, Rom. i. 23. 2. From his independency, Rom. ix. 5. 3. From his immutability, 2 Pet. i. 24, 25. Mal. iii. 6. Psal. iii. 26, 27. 4. From his dominion and government, said never to end, Jer. x. 10. Psal. x. 16. Dan. iv. 3.

That he is without succession, or any distinctions of time succeeding one to another, as moments, minutes, &c. may be proved from, 1. His existence before such were in being, Isa. xliii. 13. 2. The distinctions and differences of time are together ascribed to him, and not as succeeding one another: he is the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever, Heb. xiii. 8. Rev. i. 4. 3. If his duration were successive, or proceeded by moments, days, and years, then there must have been some first moment, day, and year, when he began to exist, which is incompatible with the idea of his eternity; and, besides, one day would be but one day with him, and not a thousand, contrary to the express language of Scripture, 2 Pet. iii. 8. 4. He would not be immense, immutable, and perfect, if this were the case; for he would be older one minute than he was before, which cannot be said of him. 5. His knowledge proves him without successive duration, for he knows all things, past, present, and to come: "he sees the present without a medium, the past without recollection, and the future without foresight. To him all truths are but one idea, all places but one point, and all times but one moment." Gill's Body of Divinity; Paley's Nat. Theol. p. 480; Charnock on the Divine Perfections; Clarke on ditto; Watts's Ontology, chap. 4.

ETERNITY OF THE WORLD. It was the opinion of Aristotle and others that the world was eternal. But that the present system of things had a beginning, seems evident, if we consider the following things:—1. We may not only conceive of many possible alterations which might be made in the form of it, but we see it incessantly changing; whereas an eternal being, forasmuch as it is self-existent, is always the same. 2. We have no credible history of transactions more remote than six thousand years from the present time; for as to the pretence that some nations have made to histories of greater antiquity, as the Egyptians, Chaldeans, Phœnicians, Chinese, &c. they are evidently convicted of falsehood in the works referred to at the bottom of this article. 3. We can trace the invention of the most useful arts and sciences; which had probably been carried farther, and invented sooner, had the world been eternal. 4. The origin of the most considerable nations of the earth may be traced, i. e. the time when they first inhabited the countries where they now dwell; and it appears that most of the western nations came from the east. 5. If the world be eternal, it is hard to account for the tradition of its beginning, which has almost everywhere prevailed, though under different forms, among both polite and barbarous nations. 6. We have a most ancient and credible history of the beginning of the world—I mean the history of Moses, with which no book in the world, in point of antiquity, can contend. Stillingfleet's Orig. Sacra, p. 15, 106; Winder's Hist. of Knowledge, vol. ii. passim; Pearson on the Creed, p. 58; Doddridge's Lectures, i. 24; Tillotson's Sermons, ser. 1; Clarke at Boyle's Lectures, pp. 22, 23; Dr. Collyer's Scripture Facts, ser. 2.

ETHICS, the doctrine of manners, or the science of moral philosophy. The word is formed from ἠθός, mores, "manners," by reason the scope or object thereof is to form the manners. See MORALS.

ETHNOPHONES, a sect of heretics in the seventh century, who made a profession of Christianity, but joined thereto all the ceremonies and follies of paganism, as judicial astrology, sortileges, auguries, and other divinations.

EUCARIST, the name frequently given to the Lord's Supper. The Greek εὐχαριστία, properly signifies giving thanks. As to the manner of celebrating the eucharist among the ancient Christians, after the customary oblations were made, the deacon brought water to the bishops or presbyters standing round the table, to wash their hands; according to that passage of the Psalmist, "I will wash my hands in innocence, and so will I compass thy altar, O Lord." Then the deacon cried out aloud, "Mutually embrace and kiss each other;" which being done, the whole congregation prayed for the universal peace and welfare of the church, for the tranquillity and repose of the world, for the prosperity of the age, for wholesome weather, and for all ranks and degrees of men. After this followed mutual salutations of the minister and people; and then the bishop or presbyter, having sanctified the elements by a solemn benediction, broke the bread, and delivered it to the deacon, who distributed it to the communicants, and after that the cup. The sacramental wine was usually diluted or mixed with water. During the time of administration, they sang hymns and psalms; and having concluded with prayer and thanksgiving, the people saluted each other with a kiss of peace, and so the assembly broke up.

EUCHITES, or EUCHITÆ, a sect of ancient heretics, who were first formed into a religious body towards the end of the fourth century, though their doctrine and discipline subsisted in Syria, Egypt, and other eastern countries, before the birth of Christ. They were thus called, because they prayed without ceasing, imagining that prayer alone was sufficient to save them. They were a sort of mystics, who believed, according to the oriental notion, that two souls resided in man—the one good, and the other evil; and who were zealous in expelling the evil soul or demon, and hastening the return of the good Spirit of God, by contemplation, prayer, and singing of hymns. They also embraced opinions nearly resembling the Manichean doctrine, and which they derived from the tenets of the oriental philosophy. The same denomination was used in the twelfth century to denote certain fanatics who infested the Greek and Eastern churches, and who were charged with believing a double trinity, rejecting wedlock, abstaining from flesh, treating with contempt the sacraments of Baptism and the Lord's Supper, and the various branches of external worship, and placing the essence of religion solely in external prayer; and maintaining the efficacy of perpetual supplications to the Supreme Being for expelling an evil being or genius, which dwelt in the breast of every mortal. This sect is said to have been founded by a person called Leucopetrus, whose chief disciple was named Tychicus. By degrees, it became a general and invidious appellation for persons of eminent piety and zeal for genuine Christianity, who opposed the vicious practices and insolent tyranny of the priesthood, much in the same manner as the Latins comprehended all the adversaries of the Roman Pontiff, under the general terms of Albigenses and Waldenses.

EUDOXIANS, a sect in the fourth century; so called from their leader, Eudoxius, patriarch of Antioch and Constantinople, a great defender of the Arian doctrine. The Eudoxians believed that the Son was created out of nothing; that he had a will distinct and different from that of the Father, &c. They held many other tenets of the Arians and Eunomians.

EULOGY, eulogia, a term made use of in reference to the consecrated bread. When the Greeks have cut a loaf or piece of bread, to consecrate it, they break the rest into little bits, and distribute it among the persons who have not yet communicated, or send it to persons that are absent; and these pieces of bread are what they call eulogies. The word is Greek, ευλογία, formed of ευ, bene, "well," and λεγω, dico, "I say, speak;" q. d. benefdictum, "blessed."

The Latin Church has had something like eulogies for a great many ages; and thence arose the use of their holy bread. The name eulogy was likewise given to loaves or cakes brought to church by the faithful, to have them blessed. Lastly, the use of the term passed hence to mere presents made to a person without any benediction.

EUNOMIANS, a sect in the fourth century. They were a branch of Arians, and took their name from Eunomius, bishop of Cyzicus. Cave, in his "Historia Literaria," vol. i. p. 223, gives the following account of their faith:—"There is one God, uncreated and without beginning; who has nothing existing before him, for nothing can exist before what is uncreated; nor with him, for what is uncreated must be one; nor in him, for God is a simple and uncompounded being. This one simple and eternal being is God, the creator and ordainer of all things; first, indeed, and principally, of his only begotten Son; and then through him of all other things. For God begat, created, and made the Son only by his direct operation and power, before all things, and every other creature; not producing, however, any being like himself, or imparting any of his own proper substance to the Son; for God is immortal, uniform, indivisible, and therefore cannot communicate any part of his own proper substance to another. He alone is unbegotten; and it is impossible that any other being should be formed of an unbegotten substance. He did not use his own substance in begetting the Son, but his will only; nor did he beget him in the likeness of his substance, but according to his own good pleasure; he then created the Holy Spirit, the first and greatest of all spirits, by his own power, in deed and operation mediately; yet by the immediate power and operation of the Son. After the Holy Spirit, he created all other things, in heaven and in earth, visible and invisible, corporeal and incorporeal, mediately by himself, by the power and operation of the Son," &c. The reader will evidently see how near these tenets are to those of Arianism. See ARIANS.

EUNUCHS, in a religious sense, persons who, from mistaken views of human nature, imagine, that by submitting to the revolting sacrifice of castration, they shall eradicate their impure propensities, and qualify themselves for performing, in a more holy and acceptable manner, the duties of religion

The celebrated Origen was the subject of this miserable delusion; and individuals have been found, in most ages of the church, who, for want of better instruction, have been duped by the idea; but it is at the present day most prevalent in Russia, where there are many hundreds of eunuchs, especially in the army and navy. In St. Petersburg, there is a row of silversmiths' shops, the occupiers of which belong to this denomination. They are so far connived at, as to be allowed to hold their own religious assemblies; but every prudent measure is adopted by government to prevent their increase.

EUSEBIANS, a denomination given to the Arians, on account of the favour and countenance which Eusebius, bishop of Cæsarea, showed and procured for them at their first rise.

EUSEBIUS, surnamed Pamphilus, the father of ecclesiastical history, born at Cæsarea, in Palestine, about A. D. 270, and died about 340, was the most learned man of his time. He was a presbyter, and in 314 was appointed bishop in his native city. He was at first opposed to the Arians, but afterwards became their advocate, and with them condemned the doctrines of Athanasius. His Ecclesiastical History, written, like his other works, in Greek, is contained in ten books, and extends from the birth of Christ to the year 324. Of his Chronicon, with the exception of some fragments of the original, we have only an Armenian version and the Latin version of Jerome. Besides these, there are still extant fifteen books of his Preparatio Evangelica, which is particularly valuable for the extracts which it contains from lost philosophical works. Of the twenty books of his Demonstratio Evangelica, in which he shows the superiority of Christianity to Judaism, we have only ten imperfectly preserved: and finally a life, or rather eulogium, of Constantine.

EUSTATHIANS, a name given to the Catholics of Antioch, in the fourth century, on occasion of their refusing to acknowledge any other bishop beside St. Eustathius, deposed by the Arians.

EUSTATHIANS, a sect in the fourth century, so denominated from their founder, Eustathius, a monk so foolishly fond of his own profession, that he condemned all other conditions of life. Whether this Eustathius were the same with the bishop of Sebastia, and chief of the Semi-arians, is not easy to determine. He excluded married people from salvation, prohibited his followers from praying in their houses, and obliged them to quit all they had, as incompatible with the hopes of heaven. He drew them out of the other assemblies of Christians, to hold secret ones with him, and made them wear a particular habit: he appointed them to fast on Sundays, and taught them that the ordinary fasts of the church were needless after they had attained to a certain degree of purity which he pretended to. He showed great horror for chapels built in honour of martyrs, and the assemblies held therein. He was condemned at the council of Gangra, in Paphlagonia, held between the years 326 and 341.

EUTYCHITES, a denomination in the third century; so called from the Greek εὐτυχιστής, which signifies, to live without pain, or in pleasure. Among other sentiments, they held that our souls are placed in our bodies only to honour the angels who created them; and that we ought to rejoice equally in all events, because to grieve would be to dishonour the angels, their creators.

EUTYCHIANS, ancient heretics, who denied the duplicity of natures in Christ; thus denominated from Eutyches, the archimandrite, or abbot of a monastery at Constantinople, who began to propagate his opinions about A. D. 448. He did not, however, seem quite steady and consistent in his sentiments; for he appeared to allow of two natures, even before the union, which was apparently a consequence he drew from the principles of the Platonic philosophy, which supposes a pre-existence of souls: accordingly, he believed that the soul of Jesus Christ had been united to the Divinity before the incarnation; but then he allowed no distinction of natures in Jesus Christ since his incarnation. This heresy was first condemned in a synod held at Constantinople, by Flavian, in 448; approved by the council of Ephesus, called conventus latronum, in 449; and re-examined and fulminated in the general council of Chalcedon, in 451. The Eutychians were divided into several branches, as the Agnoetæ, Theodosians, Severians, &c. &c. &c. Eutychians was also the name of a sect, half Arian and half Eunomian, which arose at Constantinople in the fourth century.

EVANGELICAL, agreeable to the doctrines of the gospel. The term is frequently applied to those who do not rely upon moral duties as to their acceptance with God; but are influenced to action from a sense of the love of God, and depend upon the merits of Christ for their everlasting salvation.

In the public documents in Prussia, the word evangelical is now substituted in the room of Lutheran and Calvinist; it having been the aim of the king for some time past to unite the two denominations into one body. There is, in fact, little difference in the religious belief of the two parties: many of the Calvinists, or the Reformed, not holding predestination and other Calvinistic points, and many of the Lutherans do not adhere to the doctrine of consubstantiation.

EVANGELIST, one who publishes glad tidings; a messenger, or preacher of good news. The persons denominated evangelists were next in order to the apostles, and were sent by them, not to settle in any particular place, but to travel among the infant churches, and ordain ordinary officers, and finish what the apostles had begun. Of this kind were Philip the deacon, Mark, Silas, &c. Acts xxi. 8. The office of a modern missionary, in some respects, answers to that of a primitive evangelist. The title is more particularly given to the four inspired writers of our Saviour's life.

EVIDENCE is that perception of truth which arises either from the testimony of the senses, or from an induction of reason. The evidences of revelation, both as it respects the authenticity and the credibility, are divided into internal and external. That is called internal evidence which is drawn from the consideration of those declarations and doctrines which are contained in it: and that is called external which arises from some other circumstances referring to it—such as predictions concerning it, miracles wrought by those who teach it, its success in the world, &c. See Evidences of Christ, art. CHRISTIANITY.

Moral evidence is that which, though it does not exclude a mere abstract possibility of things being otherwise, yet shuts out every reasonable ground of suspecting that they are so.

Evidences of grace are those dispositions and acts which prove a person to be in a converted state; such as an enlightened understanding; love to God and his people; a delight in God's word; worship and dependence on him; spirituality of mind; devotedness of life to the service of God, &c. See Seed's Post. Ser., ser. 2; Ditton on the Resurrection; Belamy on Religion, p. 184; Gambear's Introduction to the Study of Moral Evidence, 163.

EVIL is distinguished into natural or moral. Natural evil is whatever destroys or any way disturbs the perfection of natural beings; such as blindness, diseases, death, &c. Moral evil is the disagreement between the actions of a moral agent, and the rule of those actions, whatever it is. Applied to a choice, or acting contrary to the moral or revealed laws of the Deity, it is termed wickedness or sin. Applied to acting contrary to the mere rule of fitness, a fault. See article SIN.

EVIL SPEAKING, the using language either reproachful or untrue respecting others, and thereby injuring them. It is an express command of Scripture, "to speak evil of no man." Titus iii. 2; James iv. 11. By which, however, we are not to understand that there are no occasions on which we are at liberty to speak of others that which may be considered as evil. 1. Persons in the administration of justice may speak words which in private intercourse would be reproachful. 2. God's ministers may inveigh against vice with sharpness and severity, both privately and publicly. Is. lviii. 1. Tit. i. 13. 3. Private persons may reprove others when they commit sin. Lev. xix. 17. 4. Some vehemence of speech may be used in defence of truth, and impugning errors of bad consequence. Jude 3. 5. It may be necessary, upon some emergent occasions, with some heat of language, to express disapprobation of notorious wickedness. Acts viii. 23. Yet, in all these, the greatest equity, moderation, and candour should be used; and we should take care, 1. Never to speak in severe terms without reasonable warrant or apparent just cause. 2. Nor beyond measure. 3. Nor out of bad principles or wrong ends; from ill will, contempt, revenge, envy, to compass our own ends; from wantonness or negligence, but from pure charity for the good of those to whom or of whom we speak.

This is an evil, however, which greatly abounds, and which is not sufficiently watched against; for it is not when we openly speak evil of others only that we are guilty, but even in speaking what is true, we are in danger of speaking evil of others. There is sometimes a malignant pleasure manifested; a studious recollection of every thing that can be brought forward; a delight in hearing any thing spoken against others; a secret rejoicing in knowing that another's fall will be an occasion of our rise. All this is base to an extreme.

The impropriety and sinfulness of evil speaking will appear, if we consider, 1. That it is entirely opposite to the whole tenor of the Christian religion. 2. Expressly condemned and prohibited as evil. Ps. lxiv. 3. James iv. 11. 3. No practice bath more severe punishments denounced against it. 1 Cor. v. 11; vi. 10. 4. It is an evidence of a weak and distempered mind. 5. It is even indicative of ill breeding and bad manners. 6. It is the abhorrence of all wise and good men. Ps. xv. 2. 7. It is exceedingly injurious to society, and inconsistent with the relation we bear to each other as Christians. James iii. 6. 8. It is branded with the epithet of folly. Prov. xviii. 6, 7. 9. It is perverting the design of speech. 10. It is opposite to the example of Christ, whom we profess to follow. See SLANDER. Barrow's Works, vol. i. ser. 16; Tillotson's Ser. ser. 42; Juck's Ser. on Evil Speaking.

EXALTATION OF CHRIST consisted in his rising again from the dead on the third day, in ascending up into heaven; in sitting at the right hand of God the Father, and in coming to judge the world at the last day. See ARTICLES ASCENSION, INTERCESSION, JUDGMENT-DAY, and RESURRECTION.

EXAMINATION, SELF. See SELF-EXAMINATION.

EXAMPLE, a copy or pattern. In a moral sense, is either taken for a type, instance, or precedent for our admonition, that we may be cautioned against the faults or crimes which others have committed, by the bad consequences which have ensued from them; or example is taken for a pattern for our imitation, or a model for us to copy after.

That good examples have a peculiar power above naked precepts to dispose us to the practice of virtue and holiness, may appear by considering, "1. That they most clearly express to us the nature of our duties in their subjects and sensible effects. General precepts form abstract ideas of virtue, but in examples, virtues are most visible in all their circumstances.—2. Precepts instruct us in what things are our duty, but examples assure us that they are possible.—3. Examples, by secret and lively incentive, urge us to imitation. We are touched in another manner by the visible practice of good men, which reproaches our defects, and obliges us to the same zeal, which laws, though wise and good, will not effect."

The life of Jesus Christ forms the most beautiful example the Christian can imitate. Unlike all others, it was absolutely perfect and uniform, and every way accommodated to our present state. In him we behold all light without a shade, all beauty without a spot, all the purity of the law, and the excellency of the gospel. Here we see piety without superstition, and morality without ostentation; humility without meanness, and fortitude without temerity; patience without apathy, and compassion without weakness; zeal without rashness, and beneficence without prodigality. The obligation we are under to imitate this example, arises from duty, relationship, engagement, interest, and gratitude. See article JESUS CHRIST.

Those who set bad examples, should consider, 1. That they are the ministers of the devil's designs to destroy souls. 2. That they are acting in direct opposition to Christ, who came to save, and not to destroy. 3. That they are adding to the misery and calamities which are already in the world. 4. That the effects of their example may be incalculable on society to the end of time, and perhaps in eternity; for who can tell what may be the consequence of one sin on a family, a nation, or posterity? 5. They are acting contrary to the Divine command, and thus exposing themselves to final ruin. Massillon's Ser., vol. ii. ser. 9, Eng. Trans.; Clarke's Looking-glass, ch. 48; Tillotson's Ser., ser. 189, 190; Barrow's Works, vol. iii. ser. 2 and 3; Flavel's Works, vol. i. pp. 29, 30; Mason's Ser., vol. ii. ser. 17.

EXARCH, an officer in the Greek Church, whose business it is to visit the provinces allotted to him, in order to inform himself of the lives and manners of the clergy; take cognizance of ecclesiastical causes; the manner of celebrating divine service; the administration of the sacraments, particularly confession; the observance of the canons; monastic discipline; affairs of marriages, divorces, &c.; but, above all, to take an account of the several revenues which the patriarch receives from several churches, and particularly as to what regards collecting the same. The exarch, after having enriched himself in his post, frequently rises to the patriarchate himself. Exarch is also used, in the Eastern church antiquity, for a general or superior over several monasteries, the same that we call archimandrite; being exempted by the patriarch of Constantinople from the jurisdiction of the bishop.

EXCISION, the cutting off a person from fellowship with the community to which he belongs, by way of punishment for some sin committed. The Jews, Selden informs us, reckon up thirty-six crimes, to which they pretend this punishment is due. The rabbins reckon three kinds of excision; one, which destroys only the body; another, which destroys the soul only; and a third, which destroys both body and soul. The first kind of excision they pretend is untimely death; the second is an utter extinction of the soul; and the third a compound of the two former: thus making the soul mortal or immortal, says Selden, according to the degree of misbehaviour and wickedness of the people. See EXCOMMUNICATION.

EXCLUSION, BILL OF, a bill proposed about the close of the reign of Charles II., for excluding the Duke of York, the King's brother, from the throne, on account of his being a papist.

EXCOMMUNICATION, a penalty, or censure, whereby persons who are guilty of any notorious crime or offence are separated from the communion of the church, and deprived of all spiritual advantages.

Excommunication is founded upon a natural right which all societies have of excluding out of their body such as violate the laws thereof, and it was originally instituted for preserving the purity of the church; but ambitious ecclesiastics converted it by degrees into an engine for promoting their own power, and inflicted it on the most frivolous occasions.

The power of excommunication was lodged in the hands of the clergy, who distinguished it into the greater and less. The less consisted in excluding persons from the participation of the eucharist and the prayers of the faithful; but they were not expelled the church. The greater excommunication consisted in absolute and entire seclusion from the church, and the participation of all its rights; notice of which was given by circular letter to the most eminent churches all over the world, that they might all confirm this act of discipline, by refusing to admit the delinquent to their communion. The consequences were very terrible. The person so excommunicated was avoided in all civil commerce and outward conversation. No one was to receive him into his house, nor eat at the same table with him; and, when dead, he was denied the solemn rites of burial.

The Jews expelled from their synagogue such as had committed any grievous crime. See John ix. 22; xii. 42; xvi. 2; and Joseph. Antiq. Jud. lib. ix. cap. 22, and lib. xvi. cap. 2. Godwyn, in his "Moses and Aaron," distinguishes three degrees or kinds of excommunication among the Jews. The first he finds intimated in John ix. 22; the second in 1 Cor. v. 5; and the third in 1 Cor. xvi. 22.

The Romish pontifical takes notice of three kinds of excommunication. 1. The minor, incurred by those who have any correspondence with an excommunicated person. 2. The major, which falls upon those who disobey the commands of the holy see, or refuse to submit to certain points of discipline; in consequence of which they are excommunicated from the church militant and triumphant, and delivered over to the devil and his angels. 3. Anathema, which is properly that pronounced by the Pope against heretical princes and countries. In former ages, these papal fulminations were most terrible things; but latterly they were formidable to none but a few petty states of Italy. The latest instance of the excommunication of a sovereign was that of Napoleon, by Pius VII., in 1809.

Excommunication, in the Greek church, cuts off the offender from all communion with the three hundred and eighteen fathers of the first council of Nice, and with the saints; consigns him over to the devil and the traitor Judas, and condemns his body to remain after death as hard as a flint or piece of steel, unless he humble himself, and make atonement for his sins by a sincere repentance. The form abounds with dreadful imprecations; and the Greeks assert, that if a person dies excommunicated, the devil enters into the lifeless corpse; and therefore, in order to prevent it, the relations of the deceased cut his body in pieces, and boil them in wine. It is a custom with the patriarch of Jerusalem annually to excommunicate the Pope and the Church of Rome; on which occasion, together with a great deal of idle ceremony, he drives a nail into the ground with a hammer, as a mark of malediction.

The form of excommunication in the Church of England anciently ran thus: "By the authority of God the Father Almighty, the Son, and Holy Ghost, and of Mary, the blessed mother of God, we excommunicate, anathematize, and sequester from the holy mother church," &c. The causes of excommunication in England are, contempt of the bishops' court, heresy, neglect of public worship and the sacraments, incontinency, adultery, simony, &c. It is described to be twofold: the less is an ecclesiastical censure, excluding the party from the participation of the sacrament; the greater proceeds farther, and excludes him not only from these, but from the company of all Christians; but if the judge of any spiritual court excommunicates a man for a cause of which he has not the legal cognizance, the party may have an action against him at common law, and he is also liable to be indicted at the suit of the king.

Excommunication in the Church of Scotland consists only in an exclusion of openly profane and immoral persons from Baptism and the Lord's Supper; but is seldom publicly denounced, as, indeed, such persons generally exclude themselves from the latter ordinance at least; but it is attended with no civil incapacity whatever.

Among the Independents and Baptists, the persons who are or should be excommunicated, are such as are quarrelsome and litigious, Gal. v. 12; such as desert their privileges, withdraw themselves from the ordinances of God, and forsake his people, Jude 19; such as are irregular and immoral in their lives, railers, drunkards, extortioners, fornicators, and covetous, Eph. v. 5; 1 Cor. v. 11.

"The exclusion of a person from any Christian church does not affect his temporal estate and civil affairs; it does not subject him to fines or imprisonments; it interferes not with the business of a civil magistrate; it makes no change in the natural and civil relations between husbands and wives, parents and children, masters and servants; neither does it deprive a man of the liberty of attending public worship; it removes him, however, from the communion of the church, and the privileges dependent on it; this is done that he may be ashamed of his sin, and be brought to repentance; that the honour of Christ may be vindicated, and that stumbling blocks may be removed out of the way."

Though the act of exclusion be not performed exactly in the same manner in every church, yet (according to the congregational plan) the power of excision lies in the church itself. The officers take the sense of the members assembled together; and after the matter has been properly investigated, and all necessary steps taken to reclaim the offender, the church proceeds to the actual exclusion of the person from among them, by signifying their judgment or opinion that the person is unworthy of a place in God's house. In the conclusion of this article, however, we must add, that too great caution cannot be observed in procedures of this kind; every thing should be done with the greatest meekness, deliberation, prayer, and a deep sense of our own unworthiness; with a compassion for the offender, and a fixed design of embracing every opportunity of doing him good, by reproving, instructing, and, if possible, restoring him to the enjoyment of the privileges he has forfeited by his conduct. See CHURCH.

EXCUSATI, a term formerly used to denote slaves, who, flying to any church for sanctuary, were excused and pardoned by their masters.

EXEGESIS, the practical part of the science of Hermeneutics, or the art of carrying its principles and rules into execution. See HERMENEUTICS.

EXHORTATION, the act of laying such motives before a person as may excite him to the performance of any duty; it differs only from suasion in that the latter principally endeavours to convince the understanding, and the former to work on the affections. It is considered as a great branch of preaching, though not confined to that, as a man may exhort, though he do not preach; though a man can hardly be said to preach if he do not exhort. There are some, who, believing the inability of man to do any thing good, cannot reconcile the idea of exhorting men to duty, it being, as they suppose, a contradiction to address men who have no power to act of themselves. But they forget—1. That the Great Author of our being has appointed this as a means for inclining the will to himself. Isa. lv. 6, 7; Luke xiv. 17, 23. 2. That they who thus address men, do not suppose that there is any virtue in the exhortation itself, but that its energy depends on God alone, 1 Cor. xv. 10. 3. That the Scripture enjoins ministers to exhort men, that is, to rouse them to duty, by proposing suitable motives, Isa. lviii. 1; 1 Tim. vi. 2; Heb. iii. 13; Rom. xii. 8. 4. That it was the constant practice of prophets, apostles, and Christ himself, Isa. i. 17; Jer. iv. 14; Ezek. xxxvii; Luke xiii. 3; Luke iii. 18; Acts xi. 23. "The express words," says a good divine, "of scriptural invitations, exhortations, and promises, prove more effectual to encourage those who are ready to give up their hopes, than all the consolatory topics that can possibly be substituted in their place. It is, therefore, much to be lamented that pious men, by adhering to a supposed systematical exactness of expression, should clog their addresses to sinners with exceptions and limitations, which the Spirit of God did not see good to insert. They will not say that the omission was an oversight in the inspired writers; or admit the thought for a moment, that they can improve on their plan; why then cannot they be satisfied to 'speak according to the oracles of God,' without affecting a more entire consistency? Great mischief has thus been done by very different descriptions of men, who undesignedly concur in giving Satan an occasion of suggesting to the trembling inquirer, that perhaps he may persevere in asking, seeking, and knocking, with the greatest earnestness and importunity, and yet finally be cast away."

EXISTENCE OF GOD. The methods usually followed in proving the existence of God are two: the first called argumentum à priori, which beginning with the cause descends to the effect; the other argumentum à posteriori, which from a consideration of the effect, ascends to the cause. The former of these hath been particularly laboured by Dr. Samuel Clarke; but after all he has said, the possibility of any one's being convinced by it hath been questioned. The most general proofs are the following:—1. "All nations, Heathens, Jews, Mohammedans, and Christians, harmoniously consent that there is a God who created, preserves, and governs all things. To this it has been objected, that there have been, at different times and places, men who were atheists, and deniers of a God. But these have been so few, and by their opinions have shown that they rather denied the particular providence than the existence of God, that it can hardly be said to be an exception to the argument stated. And even if men were bold enough to assert it, it would not be an absolute proof that they really believed what they said, since it might proceed from a wish that there were no God to whom they must be accountable for their sin, rather than a belief of it, Ps. xiv. 1. It has also been objected, that whole nations have been found in Africa and America that have no notion of a Deity: but this is what has never been proved; on the contrary, upon accurate inspection, even the most stupid Hottentots, Saldanians, Greenlanders, Kamtschatkans, and savage Americans, are found to have some idea of a God.

2. "It is argued from the law and light of nature, or from the general impression of Deity on the mind of every man, i. e. an indistinct idea of a Being of infinite perfection, and a readiness to acquiesce in the truth of his existence, whenever they understand the terms in which it is expressed. Whence could this proceed, even in the minds of such whose affections and carnal interests dispose them to believe the contrary, if there were no impression naturally in their hearts? It has been observed by some writers, that there are no innate ideas in the minds of men, and particularly concerning God; but this is not so easily proved, since an inspired apostle assures us that even the Gentiles, destitute of the law of Moses, have the 'work of the law written in their hearts,' Rom. ii. 15.

3. "The works of creation plainly demonstrate the existence of a God. The innumerable alterations and manifest dependence, every where observable in the world, prove that the things which exist in it neither are, nor could be, from eternity. It is self-evident that they never could form themselves out of nothing, or in any of their respective forms; and that chance, being nothing but the want of design, never did nor could form or put into order any thing; far less such a marvellous and well connected system as our world is. Though we should absurdly fancy matter to be eternal, yet it could not change its own form, or produce life or reason. Moreover, when we consider the diversified and wonderful forms of creatures in the world, and how exactly those forms and stations correspond with their respective ends and uses; when we consider the marvellous and exact machinery, form and motions of our own bodies; and especially when we consider the powers of our soul, its desires after an infinite good, and its close union with, and incomprehensible operations on our bodies, we are obliged to admit a Creator of infinite wisdom, power, and goodness.

4. "It is argued from the support and government of the world. Who can consider the motions of the heavenly luminaries, exactly calculated for the greatest advantage to our earth and its inhabitants; the exact balancing and regulating of the meteors, winds, rain, snow, hail, vapour, thunder, and the like; the regular and never-failing return of summer and winter, seed-time and harvest, day and night; the astonishing and diversified formation of vegetables; the propagation of herbs, almost every where, that are most effectual to heal the distempers of animal bodies in that place; the almost infinite diversification of animals and vegetables, and their pertinents, that notwithstanding an amazing similarity, not any two are exactly alike, but every form, member, or even feather or hair of animals, and every pile of grass, stalk of corn, herb, leaf, tree, berry, or other fruit, hath something peculiar to itself; the making of animals so sagaciously to prepare their lodgings, defend themselves, provide for their health, produce, protect, and procure food for their young; the direction of fishes and fowls to and in such marvellous and long peregrinations at such seasons, and to such places, as best correspond with their own preservation and the benefit of mankind; the stationing of brute animals by sea or land, at less or greater distances, as are most suited to the safety, subsistence, or comfort of mankind, and preventing the increase of prolific animals, and making the less fruitful ones, which are used, exceedingly to abound; the so diversifying the countenances, voices, and hand-writings of men, as best secures and promotes their social advantages; the holding of so equal a balance between males and females, while the number of males, whose lives are peculiarly endangered in war, navigation, &c., are generally greatest; the prolonging of men's lives, when the world needed to be peopled, and now shortening them when that necessity hath ceased to exist; the almost universal provision of food, raiment, medicine, fuel, &c., answerable to the nature of particular places, cold or hot, moist or dry; the management of human affairs relative to societies, government, peace, war, trade, &c., in a manner different from, and contrary to, the carnal policy of those concerned; and especially the strangely similar but diversified erection, preservation, and government of the Jewish and Christian churches; who, I say, can consider all these things, and not acknowledge the existence of a wise, merciful, and good God, who governs the world, and every thing in it?

5. "It is proved from the miraculous events which have happened in the world; such as the overflowing of the earth by a flood; the confusion of languages; the burning of Sodom and the cities about by fire from heaven; the plagues of Egypt; the dividing of the Red Sea; raining manna from heaven, and bringing streams of water from flinty rocks; the stopping of the course of the sun, &c. &c.

6. "His existence no less clearly appears from the exact fulfilment of so many and so particularly circumstantiated predictions, published long before the event took place. It is impossible that these predictions, which were so exactly fulfilled in their respective periods, and of the fulfilment of which there are at present thousands of demonstrative and sensible documents in the world, could proceed from any but an all-seeing and infinitely wise God.

7. "The existence of God further appears from the fearful punishments which have been inflicted upon persons, and especially upon nations, when their immoralities became excessive, and that by very unexpected means and instruments; as in the drowning of the old world; destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah; plagues of Pharaoh and his servants; overthrow of Sennacherib and his army; miseries and ruin of the Canaanites, Jews, Syrians, Assyrians, Chaldeans, Persians, Egyptians, Greeks, Romans, Saracens, Tartars, and others.

8. "Lastly, the existence of God may be argued from the terror and dread which wound the consciences of men, when guilty of crimes which other men do not know, or are not able to punish or restrain, as in the case of Caligula, Nero, and Domitian, the Roman emperors; and this while they earnestly labour to persuade themselves or others that there is no God. Hence their being afraid of thunder, or to be left alone in the dark," &c.

Moses began his writings by supposing the being of a God; he did not attempt to explain it. Although many of the inspired writers asserted his existence, and, to discountenance idolatry, pleaded for his perfections, yet no one of them ever pretended to explain the manner of his being. Our duty is clear. We are not commanded nor expected to understand it. All that is required is this:—"He that cometh to God must believe that he is, and that he is a rewarder of them that diligently seek him." Heb. xi. 6. EXORCISM, the expelling of devils from persons possessed, by means of conjurations and prayers. The Jews made great pretences to this power. Josephus tells several wonderful tales of the great success of several exorcists. One Eleazer, a Jew, cured many demoniacs, he says, by means of a root set in a ring. This root, with the ring, was held under the patient's nose, and the devil was forthwith evacuated. The most part of conjurers of this class were impostors, each pretending to a secret nostrum or charm which was an overmatch for the devil. Our Saviour communicated to his disciples a real power over demons, or at least over the diseases said to be occasioned by demons. See DEMONIAIC.

Exorcism makes a considerable part of the superstition of the Church of Rome, the ritual of which forbids the exorcising any person without the bishop's leave. The ceremony is performed at the lower end of the church, towards the door. The exorcist first signs the possessed person with the sign of the cross, makes him kneel, and sprinkles him with holy water. Then follow the litanies, psalms, and prayer; after which the exorcist asks the devil his name, and adjures him, by the mysteries of the Christian religion, not to afflict the person any more; then, laying his right hand on the demoniac's head, he repeats the form of exorcism, which is this: "I exorcise thee, unclean spirit, in the name of Jesus Christ; tremble, O Satan, thou enemy of the faith, thou foe of mankind, who hast brought death into the world; who hast deprived men of life, and hast rebelled against justice; thou seducer of mankind, thou root of all evil, thou source of avarice, discord, and envy." The Romanists likewise exorcise houses and other places supposed to be haunted by unclean spirits; and the ceremony is much the same with that for a person possessed.

EXPEDIENCY, the fitness or propriety of a mean to the attainment of an end. See OBLIGATION.

EXPERIENCE, knowledge acquired by long use without a teacher. It consists in the ideas of things we have seen or read, which the judgment has reflected on, to form for itself a rule or method.

Christian experience is that religious knowledge which is acquired by any exercises, enjoyments, or sufferings, either of body or mind. Nothing is more common than to ridicule and despise what is called religious experience as mere enthusiasm. But if religion consist in feeling, we would ask how it can possibly exist without experience? We are convinced of, and admit the propriety of the term, when applied to those branches of science which are not founded on speculation or conjecture, but on sensible trial. Why, then, should it be rejected when applied to religion? It is evident, that however beautiful religion may be in name, its excellency and energy are only truly known and displayed as experienced. A system believed, or a mind merely informed, will produce little good except the heart be affected, and we feel its influence. To experience, then, the religion of Christ, we must not only be acquainted with its theory, but enjoy its power; subduing our corruptions, animating our affections, and exciting us to duty. Hence the Scripture calls experience tasting, Ps. xxxiv. 8, feeling, &c., 1 Thess. ii. 13, &c. That our experience is always absolutely pure in the present state cannot be expected. "The best experience," says a good writer, "may be mixed with natural affections and passions, impressions on the imagination, self-righteousness, or spiritual pride; but this is no reason that all experience is to be rejected; for, upon this ground, nothing could be received, since nothing is absolutely perfect. It is, however, to be lamented, that while the best of men have a mixture in their experience, there are others whose experience (so called) is entirely counterfeit. They have been alarmed, have changed the ground of their confidence, have had their imaginations heated and delighted by impressions and visionary representations; they have recollected the promises of the gospel, as if spoken to them with peculiar appropriation, to certify them that their sins were forgiven; and having seen and heard such wonderful things, they think they must doubt no more of their adoption into the family of God. They have also frequently heard all experience profanely ridiculed as enthusiasm; and this betrays them into the opposite extreme, so that they are emboldened to despise every caution as the result of enmity to internal religion, and to act as if there were no delusive or counterfeit experience. But the event too plainly shows their awful mistake, and that they grounded their expectations upon the account given of the extraordinary operations of the Holy Spirit on the mind of prophets, rather than on the promises of his renewing influences in the hearts of believers. When, therefore, they lose the impressions with which they once were elated, they relapse nearly into their old course of life, their creed and confidence alone excepted."

Christian experience may be considered as genuine—1. When it accords with the revelation of God's mind and will, or what he has revealed in his word. Any thing contrary to this, however pleasing, cannot be sound, or produced by divine agency. 2. When its tendency is to promote humility in us: that experience by which we learn our own weakness, and subdues pride, must be good. 3. When it teaches us to bear with others, and to do them good. 4. When it operates so as to excite us to be ardent in our devotion, and sincere in our regard to God. A powerful experience of the divine favour will lead us to acknowledge the same, and to manifest our gratitude both by constant praise and genuine piety.

Christian experience, however, may be abused. There are some good people who certainly have felt and enjoyed the power of religion, and yet have not always acted with prudence as to their experience. 1. Some boast of their experiences, or talk of them as if they were very extraordinary; whereas, were they acquainted with others, they would find it not so. That a man may make mention of his experience is no way improper, but often useful; but to hear persons always talking of themselves seems to indicate a spirit of pride, and that their experience cannot be very deep. 2. Another abuse of experience is, dependence on it. We ought certainly to take encouragement from past circumstances, if we can; but if we are so dependent on past experience as to preclude present exertions, or always expect to have exactly the same assistance in every state, trial, or ordinance, we shall be disappointed. God has wisely ordered it, that though he never will leave his people, yet he will suspend or bestow comfort in his own time; for this very reason, that we may rely on him, and not on the circumstance or ordinance. 3. It is an abuse of experience, when introduced at improper times, and before improper persons. It is true, we ought never to be ashamed of our profession; but to be always talking to irreligious people respecting experience, which they know nothing of, is, as our Saviour says, casting pearls before swine. Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress; Buck's Treatise on Experience; Gurnall's Christian Armour; Dr. Owen on Psalm cxxx.; Edwards on the Affections, and his Thoughts on the Revival of Religion in New England; Dorney's Contemplations.

EXPERIENCE MEETINGS are assemblies of religious persons who meet for the purpose of relating their experience to each other. It has been doubted by some, whether these meetings are of any great utility; and whether they do not, in some measure, force people to say more than is true, and puff up those with pride who are able to communicate their ideas with facility; but to this it has been answered, 1. That the abuse of a thing is no proof of the evil of it. 2. That the most eminent saints of old did not neglect this practice, Ps. lxxvi. 16; Mal. iii. 16. 3. That by a wise and prudent relation of experience, the Christian is led to see that others have participated in the same joys and sorrows with himself; he is excited to love and serve

God; and animated to perseverance in duty, by finding that others, of like passions with himself, are zealous, active, and diligent. 4. That the Scriptures seem to enjoin the frequent intercourse of Christians for the purpose of strengthening each other in religious services, Heb. x. 24, 25; Col. iii. 16; Matt. xviii. 20. See CONFERENCE.

EXPIATION, a religious act by which satisfaction or atonement is made for some crime, the guilt removed, and the obligation to punishment cancelled, Lev. xvi. See PROPITIATION.

EXPOSITION, the opening up and interpreting larger portions of Scripture in public discourses. In Scotland, where the practice has long obtained, and still extensively prevails, it is called lecturing. While the selection of striking and insulated texts, which furnish abundant matter for sermons, are calculated, when judiciously treated, to rouse and fix attention, and the discourses founded on them may be more useful to general hearers, especially the careless and unconverted, expository discourses furnish peculiar advantages as it regards the enlargement of the Christian's views of divine truth, and his consequent advancement in the ways of God. By judiciously expounding the Scriptures, a minister may hope to give a clearer exhibition of the great principles of religion in their mutual connexions and diversified bearings, than could otherwise be done. He will have a better opportunity of unfolding the true meaning of those parts of the Bible which are difficult—of bringing a vast variety of topics before his hearers which may be of the utmost importance to them, but which he could not so conveniently have treated in preaching from detached texts—of exhibiting the doctrines and duties of Christianity in their relative positions—of successfully counteracting and arresting the progress of dangerous errors—and of storing the minds of his people with correct and influential views of divine things.

Such a mode of public instruction cannot but prove of great use to a minister's own mind, by rousing his energies, habituating him to close and accurate research, and saving him much of that indecision in the choice of texts which is so much lamented. Unfortunately there exists a strong prejudice against the introduction of expository discourses into the pulpit; but where it has been effected with judgment and prudence, it has almost invariably been found that the great bulk of hearers have soon become decidedly favourable to it.

EXTORTION, the act or practice of gaining or acquiring any thing by force. Extortioners are included in the list of those who are excluded from the kingdom of heaven. 1 Cor. x. 6.

EXTREME UNCTION, one of the sacraments of the Romish Church, the fifth in order, administered to people dangerously sick, by anointing them with holy oil, and praying over them.

F.

FAITH is credit given to a declaration or assertion on the authority of the person who makes it, whether that assertion be directly expressed, or only implied. When our Lord said to the nobleman of Capernaum, "Thy son liveth; the man believed the word that Jesus had spoken, and went his way," confident that he would find his son alive and well, John iv. 50. When Jesus said to the blind man, "Go, wash in the pool of Siloam," the man believed the assurance implied in our Lord's injunction, that he would by this means receive his sight; "therefore he went his way and washed, and came again seeing," John ix. 7. The term faith is used in the same sense in common language. Inquiring the road, I am told that the right hand path is the safest and easiest. On the faith of this information, that is, giving credit to my informant, I take the road recommended to me. A friend sends me a message, requesting me to meet him at a certain place; on the faith of his implied promise that he will meet me there, I repair to the place appointed. A known impostor assures me that, by following his direction, and paying him well for his advice, I shall enjoy long life and prosperity; I have no faith in such assurances; that is, I give no credit to such declarations, therefore I pay no regard to them.

The greater part of our knowledge is derived from the information of others, and depends on the credit we give to their testimony. Hence, to believe and to know are sometimes used indiscriminately (see John iii. 36—compare with John xvii. 3,) not as though knowledge and faith were synonymous terms, but because knowledge founded on testimony supposes credit given to testimony.

Faith is distinguished from sight or observation. It is one way in which we become acquainted with things "not seen," Heb. xi. 1. The testimony of another, received and credited, is the means by which we obtain the knowledge of things which are not the subject of our own observation. Hence believers are said to "walk by faith, not by sight."

Faith is distinguished from presumption, which is confidence without sufficient warrant. When the Israelites travelled through the channel of the Red Sea, they believed the divine promise, that they would obtain a safe passage, Exod. xiv. 16. But the Egyptians had no such promise given them: they had no declaration to credit, therefore it was not faith, but presumption that influenced them in adventuring to follow the Israelites through the same route, Heb. xi. 9. While the Israelites believed the divine promise of protection and success, they went boldly on against their enemies. But when they ceased to believe the Lord (Numb. xiv. 11) their courage failed them, Numb. xiv. 3. And when the divine promise was withdrawn, on account of their unbelief and disobedience, (Numb. xiv. 42,) it was no longer faith, for they had now no declaration to credit, but presumption, that induced them to go against their enemies, Numb. xiv. 44.

Faith in God is the belief of God's declaration. This may refer to any thing revealed or asserted on divine authority; whether relating to the past, Heb. xi. 3, to the present, Heb. xi. 6, or to the future, Heb. xi. 7. Faith in those divine declarations which contain a promise of future good, is the same with trust in God.

Faith in Jesus Christ is the belief of those declarations of Scripture, which respect the person, offices, and promises of Christ as the Saviour of sinners.

Any thing declared or asserted, becomes the object of faith, when it is believed on the authority of the declarant. An assertion, though false, becomes the object of faith, if it be credited. Men, through ignorance, or perverseness, or "strong delusion," may "believe a lie." So the false assertion of the father of lies, "Ye shall not surely die," became an object of faith to our first parents. The objects of saving faith, are the divine declarations contained in Scripture, concerning the way of salvation through Jesus Christ as the Redeemer of sinners.

If the thing declared and proposed to our faith be a matter of no importance, and fitted to excite no interest, the belief of it will produce no sensible effect, and will admit of no direct evidence. An observer cannot discover whether the thing reported meets with credit or not. But if the matter asserted appear to be of importance, it will, when believed, excite emotion, and perhaps prompt to action. If not believed, whatever be its importance, it will produce neither action nor emotion. The unequivocal expression of the emotions, accompanying the belief of an interesting declaration, or the action prompted by such belief, is the outward evidence of faith. An example of faith, accompanied by corresponding emotion, and that emotion expressed in appropriate language, occurs in Acts ii. 36, 37. Peter had protested to the people of Jerusalem, "Let all the house of Israel know assuredly, that God hath made that same Jesus, whom ye have crucified, both Lord and Christ." When the multitude heard this declaration, believing its truth, they were "pricked in their heart." This was the emotion that accompanied their belief, and they cried out, "Men and brethren, what shall we do?" Here was the expression of their emotion, and the evidence of their faith. Again, Heb. xi. 7, Noah being warned by God of his determination to punish the wickedness of mankind, and instructed to build an ark, which God assured him would prove the means of preserving himself and his family, believed these divine declarations, and, "being moved with fear" of God's judgments,—here was the emotion accompanying his faith,—he prepared an ark, &c. Here was the action consequent upon his faith; and both the emotion and the action corresponded to the object of his belief, and evidenced the reality of his faith. A similar instance of faith, and its evidence, we have in the case of the Ninevites, Jonah iii. 5, &c.

The want of faith, or unbelief, is proved by the want of the emotion or action corresponding to the object which is proposed to our belief. Thus, Gen. xix. 14, when Lot warned his sons-in-law of the impending destruction of their city, and urged them to consult their safety by a timely departure, they believed him not; therefore they felt no fear of the approaching calamity, nor used any means to escape it. We have a striking example, both of faith and of unbelief, in the same circumstances, evidenced by corresponding, but opposite consequences, in the conduct of the Egyptians, Exod. ix. 20, 21. When Moses had told them that the Lord would send a grievous storm of hail, which would destroy every creature on whom it should fall, and warned them to gather in their servants and cattle from the field, we read that "he that feared the word of the Lord," because he believed Moses's declaration, "made his cattle and servants flee into the houses;" whereas, he that did not credit Moses's declaration, and, therefore, "regarded not the word of the Lord, left his servants and cattle in the field."

As God's word is true, and his promises sure, whoever believes his word, and trusts his promises, will not be disappointed. Hence there is a constant connexion between faith and success. Of many instances of this kind referred to in Heb. xi. 32—34, we shall notice only one. Gideon was encouraged by an assurance of success against the enemies of his country: "Go in this thy might, and thou shalt save Israel from the hand of the Midianites; have not I sent thee?" And afterwards by a more special promise: "By the three hundred men that lapped, will I save you, and deliver the Midianites into your hand." Gideon, confiding in the divine promise, attacked and discomfited his enemies. He believed God, and, according to his faith, he acted, and he succeeded, Judges vi. and vii.

A similar connexion subsists between unbelief and failure. The Israelites had a divine promise of conquering and possessing the land of Canaan. Had they uniformly believed this promise, and advanced boldly against the inhabitants, as Joshua and Caleb urged them, (Numb. xiv.) they would infallibly have prospered. But when they doubted the word of the Lord, and kept back through fear, the consequence was, that they did not attack or expel the Canaanites, nor get possession of their territory. Thus the apostle accounts for their failure: "So we see that they could not enter in, because of unbelief," Heb. iii. 19.

They who believed God's promise of temporal blessings, and ventured on it, obtained their object, Heb. xi. 33, 34. So they who believe the doctrines and promises of the gospel, and trust their souls in the Redeemer's hands, shall obtain eternal life, John iii. 14—16.

Faith in Christ, in respect of its reality and efficacy, may be called living faith; whereas its counterfeit, which can have no efficacy, is properly called dead faith, James ii. 17. This dead or unproductive faith is not a different kind of faith from the true; it is, strictly speaking, not faith at all, even as a counterfeit piece of money is not money, or as a dead man is no man. Faith in Christ, in respect of the blessings connected with it, is called justifying, or saving faith, Rom. v. 1; Eph. ii. 8. In respect of its effects on the heart and dispositions, it is purifying or sanctifying faith, Acts xv. 9. In respect of its object, it is "the faith of the Son of God," or, "the faith of Christ," Gal. ii. 16, 20. In respect of its author, "it is the gift of God," Eph. ii. 8. To "live by faith," or "walk by faith," is to have the life regulated by an habitual prevailing regard to those doctrines, and invisible realities which are revealed to us in Scripture. A person may be said to live a life of faith, when the influence of spiritual invisible objects prevails in regulating his judgment, his affections, and his conduct.

There cannot be a more direct proof of the inveterate blindness and hardness of the human heart than this,—that we do not believe many things which God declares, even when we are convinced that it is He that speaks. Yet that this is the fact, we are assured by Him who knows what is in man, and who cannot lie, 1 Cor. ii. 14; John iii. 11, 12; Eph. ii. 8; iv. 18. One cannot conceive more audacious impiety than thus to discredit the God of truth, and, in effect, to "make him a liar," 1 John v. 10.

Though there is much guilt and depravity in unbelief, it does not follow that there is merit in faith. A man cannot claim reward for simply believing that to be true which he knows God has affirmed. So that when our justification is made to depend on our believing the truth, nothing can more expressly preclude every plea of merit on our part, Rom. iv. 16.

FAITH, FATHERS OF THE, an ecclesiastical order founded by Paccanari, a Tyrolese enthusiast, and formerly a soldier of the Pope, under the patronage of the Archduchess Mariana. It was composed mostly of Jesuits, and put in operation at Rome, as a new form of the Society of Jesus; but they were never recognised by the secret superiors of the ancient Jesuits as their brethren.

FAITH, IMPLICIT. See IMPLICIT FAITH.

FAITHFULNESS. See FIDELITY.

FAITHFULNESS, MINISTERIAL. See PASTOR.

FAITHFULNESS OF GOD, is that perfection of his nature whereby he infallibly fulfils his designs, or performs his word. It appears, says Dr. Gill, in the performance of what he has said with respect to the world in general, that it shall not be destroyed by a flood, as it once was, and for a token of it has set his bow in the clouds; that the ordinances of heaven should keep their due course, which they have done for almost 6000 years, exactly and punctually; that all his creatures should be supported and provided for, and the elements all made subservient to that end, which we find to do so according to his sovereign pleasure, Gen. ix.; Isa. liv. 9; Ps. cxlv.; Deut. xi. 14, 15; 2 Pet. iii.

2. It appears in the fulfilment of what he has said with respect to Christ. Whoever will take the pains to compare the predictions of the birth, poverty, life, sufferings, death, resurrection, and ascension of Christ, with the accomplishment of the same, will find a striking demonstration of the faithfulness of God.

3. It appears in the performance of the promises which he has made to his people. In respect to temporal blessings, 1 Tim. iv. 8; Ps. lxxxiv. 11; Is. xxxiii. 16. 2. To spiritual, 1 Cor. i. 9. In supporting them in temptation, 1 Cor. x. 13. Encouraging them under persecution, 1 Pet. iv. 12, 13; Isa. xli. 10. Sanctifying afflictions, Heb. xii. 4 to 12. Directing them in difficulties, 1 Thes. v. 24. Enabling them to persevere, Jer. xxxi. 40. Bringing them to glory, 1 John ii. 25.

4. It appears in the fulfilling of his threatenings. The curse came upon Adam according as it was threatened. He fulfilled his threatening to the old world in destroying it. He declared that the Israelites should be subject to his awful displeasure, if they walked not in his ways; it was accordingly fulfilled, Deut. xxviii. See IMMUTABILITY.

FALASHAS, an independent government of Jews, which has long existed in the west of Abyssinia. The name signifies exiles, and the state is called Falasian. They have their own government, which is allowed by the N-gush of Abyssinia, on condition of their paying a certain tribute. Bruce found there a Jewish king, Gideon,—and a queen, Judith, and about 100,000 effective men. They have lost all knowledge of the Hebrew, and use the Old Testament as furnished them in the Gheez language.

FALL OF MAN, the loss of those perfections and that happiness which his Maker bestowed on him at his creation, through transgression of a positive command, given for a trial of man's obedience, and as a token of his holding every thing of God as Lord paramount of the creation, with the use of every thing in it, exclusive of the fruit of one tree. This positive law he broke by eating the forbidden fruit; first the woman, then the man. The woman was enticed by Satan, under the semblance of a serpent, as appears from its reasoning the woman into the transgression of the law, of which a brute beast is incapable. Hence he is called a murderer and a liar from the beginning, John viii. 44; Rom. v. 12: the old serpent, Rev. xii. 9; xx. 2. Moses relates this history from what appeared externally to sense; both, therefore, are to be conjoined,—the serpent as the instrument, and the devil as the primary cause. Man suffered himself to be seduced by perverse and confused notions of good and evil, prompted by a desire of a greater degree of perfection, and swayed by his sensual appetite, in contradiction to his reason, Gen. iii. 6. And thus it appears possible, how, notwithstanding the divine image with which man is adorned, he might fall; for, though including in it knowledge, it did not exclude from it confused notions, which are those arising from sense and imagination, especially when off our guard and inattentive, blindly following the present impression. From this one sin arose another, and then another, from the connexion of causes and effects, till this repetition brought on a habit of sin, consequently a state of moral slavery, called by divines a death in sin, a spiritual death, a defect of moral power to act according to the law, and from the motive of the divine perfections, as death in general is a defect of power of action; and this defect or inability, with all its consequences, man entailed on his posterity, remaining upon them, till one greater man remove this, and reinstate them in all they forfeited in Adam.

In the fall of man we may observe—1. The greatest infidelity. 2. Prodigious pride. 3. Horrid ingratitude. 4. Visible contempt of God's majesty and justice. 5. Unaccountable folly. 6. A cruelty to himself and to all his posterity. Infidels, however, have treated the account of the fall and its effects with contempt, and considered the whole as absurd; but their objections to the manner have been ably answered by a variety of authors; and as to the effects, one would hardly think any body could deny. For that man is a fallen creature, is evident, if we consider his misery as an inhabitant of the natural world; the disorders of the globe we inhabit, and the dreadful scourges with which it is visited; the deplorable and shocking circumstances of our birth; the painful and dangerous travail of women; our natural uncleanness, helplessness, ignorance, and nakedness; the gross darkness in which we naturally are, both with respect to God and a future state; the general rebellion of the brute creation against us; the various poisons that lurk in the animal, vegetable, and mineral world, ready to destroy us; the heavy curse of toil and sweat to which we are liable; the innumerable calamities of life, and the pangs of death. Again, it is evident, if we consider him as a citizen of the moral world,—his commission of sin, his omission of duty, the triumph of sensual appetites over his intellectual faculties, the corruption of his mental powers, the understanding, imagination, memory, and reason; the depravity of the moral powers, the will, conscience, and affections; his manifest alienation from God; his amazing disregard even of his nearest relatives; his unaccountable unconcern about himself; his detestable tempers; the general outbreaking of human corruption in all individuals; the universal overflowing of it in all nations. Some striking proofs of this depravity may be seen in the general propensity of mankind to vain, irrational, or cruel diversions; in the universality of the most ridiculous, impious, inhuman, and diabolical sins; in the aggravating circumstances attending the display of this corruption; in the many ineffectual endeavours to stem its torrent; in the obstinate resistance it makes to divine grace in the unconverted; the amazing struggles of good men with it; the testimony of the heathens concerning it; and the preposterous conceit which the unconverted have of their own goodness. Dict. of the Bible; Fletcher's Appeal to Matters of Fact; Berry Street Lectures, vol. i. 180, 189; South's Sermons, vol. i. 124, 150; *Bates's Harmony of Div. FAMILIARS OF THE INQUISITION, persons who assist in apprehending such as are accused, and carrying them to prison. They are assistants to the inquisitor, and called familiars, because they belong to his family. In some provinces of Italy they are called cross-bearers; and in others the scholars of St. Peter the Martyr; and wear a cross before them on the outside garment. They are properly bailiffs of the inquisition; and the vile office is esteemed so honourable, that noblemen in the kingdom of Portugal have been ambitious of belonging to it. Nor is this surprising, when it is considered that Innocent III. granted very large indulgences and privileges to these familials; and that the same plenary indulgence is granted by the pope to every single exercise of this office, as was granted by the Lateran council to those who succoured the Holy Land. When several persons are to be taken up at the same time, these familials are commanded to order matters that they may know nothing of one another's being apprehended; and it is related, that a father and his three sons and three daughters, who lived together in the same house, were carried prisoners to the inquisition, without knowing any thing of one another's being there till seven years afterwards, when they that were alive were released by an act of faith. See art. ACT OF FAITH.

FAMILY OF LOVE, or FAMILISTS. See LOVE.

FANATICS, wild enthusiasts, visionary persons, who pretend to revelation and inspiration. The ancients called those fanatici who passed their time in temples (fana), and being often seized with a kind of enthusiasm, as if inspired by the divinity, showed wild and antic gestures, cutting and slashing their arms with knives, shaking the head, &c. Hence the word was applied among us to the Anabaptists, Quakers, &c. at their first rise, and is now an epithet given to modern prophets, enthusiasts, &c.; but unjustly to those who possess a considerable degree of zeal and fervency of devotion.

FARNOVIANS, a sect of Socinians, so called from Stanislaus Farnovius, who separated from the other Unitarians in the year 1568. He asserted that Christ had been engendered or produced out of nothing by the Supreme Being, before the creation of this terrestrial globe, and warned his disciples against paying religious worship to the Divine Spirit. This sect did not last long; for having lost their chief, who died in 1615, it was scattered and reduced to nothing.

FASTING, abstinence from food, more particularly that abstinence which is used on a religious account.

The Jews had every year a stated and solemn fast on the 10th day of the month Tisri, which generally answered to the close of our September. The solemnity was a day of strict rest and fasting to the Israelites. Many of them spent the day before in prayer, and such like penitential exercises. On the day itself, at least in later times, they made a tenfold confession of their sins, and were careful to end all their mutual broils. See Lev. xvi.; Numb. xxix. 7, 12; Lev. xxiii. 23, 32. Individuals also fasted on any extraordinary distress. Thus David fasted during the sickness of his adulterous child, 2 Sam. xii. 21. Ahab, when he was threatened with ruin, 1 Kings xii. 27. Daniel, when he understood that the Jewish captivity drew to an end; 9th and 10th chapters of Nehemiah, &c.

However lightly some think of religious fasting, it seems it has been practised by most nations from the remotest antiquity. The Egyptians, Phœnicians, and Assyrians, had their fasts as well as the Jews. Porphyry affirms that the Egyptians, before their stated sacrifices, always fasted a great many days; sometimes for six weeks. The Greeks observed their fasts much in the same manner. At Rome, kings and emperors themselves fasted. Numa Pompilius, Julius Cæsar, Augustus, Vespasian, and others, we are told, had their stated fast days; and Julian the apostate was so exact in this observation, that he outdid the priests themselves. The Pythagoreans frequently fasted rigidly for a long time; and Pythagoras, their master, continued his fast, it is said, for forty days together. The Brahmins, and the Chinese, have also their stated fasts.

Every one knows how much fasting has been considered an important rite in the Church of Rome, and the extremes they have run into in this respect. The Church of England also has particular seasons for fasting, especially that of Lent, which is to be observed as a time of humiliation before Easter, the general festival of our Saviour's resurrection. Fast days are also appointed by the legislature upon any extraordinary occasions of calamity, war, &c. See art. LENT, ROGATION.

Religious fasting consists, 1. "In abstinence from every animal indulgence, and from food, as far as health and circumstances will admit.—2. In the humble confession of our sins to God, with contrition or sorrow for them.—3. An earnest deprecation of God's displeasure, and humble supplication that he would avert his judgments.—4. An intercession with God for such spiritual and temporal blessings upon ourselves and others as are needful." It does not appear that our Saviour instituted any particular fast, but left it optional. Any state of calamity and sorrow, however, naturally suggests this. The propriety of it may appear, 1. From many examples recorded in Scripture.—2. By plain and undeniable inferences from Scripture. Matt. vi. 16.—3. From divine commands given on some occasions, though there are no commands which prescribe it as a constant duty.—4. It may be argued from its utility. The end or uses of it, are these:—1. A natural expression of our sorrow.—2. A help to devotional exercises.—3. Keeping the body in subjection.—4. It may be rendered subservient to charity. How far or how long a person should abstain from food, depends on circumstances. The great end to be kept in view is, humiliation for, and abstinence from sin. "If," says Marshall, "abstinence divert our minds, by reason of a gnawing appetite, then you had better eat sparingly, as Daniel in his greatest fast." Dan. x. 2, 3. They, however, who in times of public distress, when the judgments of God are in the earth, and when his providence seems to call for humiliation, will not relinquish any of their sensual enjoyments, nor deny themselves in the least, cannot be justified; since good men in all ages, more or less, have humbled themselves on such occasions; and reason as well as Scripture evidently prove it to be our duty. It appears manifest from Acts xiv. 21, that it ought to be observed at the ordination of ministers. Matt. ix. 15. 1 Cor. vii. 5. Bennett's Christ. Orat., vol. ii. pp. 18, 25; Tillotson's Sermons, ser. 39; Simpson's Essay on Fasting; Marshall on Sanc., pp. 273, 274.

FATE (fatum) denotes an inevitable necessity depending upon a superior cause. The word is formed à fondo, "from speaking," and primarily implies the same with effatum, viz. a word or decree pronounced by God, or a fixed sentence whereby the Deity has prescribed the order of things, and allotted to every person what shall befall him. The Greeks called it τιμωμενη, as it were a chain or necessary series of things indissolubly linked together. It is also used to express a certain unavoidable designation of things, by which all agents, both necessary and voluntary, are swayed and directed to their ends. Fate is divided into physical and divine.

1. Physical fate is an order and series of natural causes appropriated to their effects; as, that fire warms; bodies communicate motion to each other, &c.; and the effects of it are all the events and phenomena of nature.—2. Divine fate is what is more usually called providence. See PROVIDENCE, NECESSITY.

FATHERS, a term applied to ancient authors, who have preserved in their writings traditions of the church. Thus, St. Chrysostom, St. Basil, &c., are called Greek fathers, and St. Augustine and St. Ambrose, Latin fathers. No author who wrote later than the twelfth century is dignified with the title of father.

Some suppose that the study of the fathers is barren and unimproving; that though there are some excellent things interspersed in their writings, yet the instruction to be derived from them will hardly repay the toil of breaking up the ground; that a lifetime would hardly suffice to read them with care, and digest them completely. Others have such a high opinion of the fathers, as to be almost afraid of interpreting Scripture against their decision. They suppose, that as some of them were companions, disciples, or successively followers of the apostles, it is highly probable that they must have been well informed, that their sentiments must be strongly illustrative of the doctrines of the New Testament; and that as controversies have increased, and dogmas received since their time, they must be much less entangled with decisions merely human than more recent commentators. Perhaps it is best to steer between these two opinions.

If a person have ability, inclination, and opportunity to wade through them, let him; but if not, referring to them occasionally may suffice. One caution, however, is necessary, which is this; that the judgment of antiquity in some disputable points certainly may be useful, yet we ought never to put them on the same footing as the Scriptures. In many cases they may be considered as competent witnesses; but we must not confide in their verdict as judges. Jortin's Works, vol. vii. chap. 2; Kett's Sermon at Bampton Lecture, ser. 1; Warburton's Julian; Simpson's Strictures on Religious Opinions, latter end; Daille's Use of the Fathers, p. 167; Law's Theory; Dr. Clarke's View of the Succession of Sacred Literature, p. 312; Isaac Taylor on the Fathers.

FAVOUR OF GOD. See GRACE.

FEAR, is that uneasiness of mind which arises from an apprehension of danger, attended with a desire of avoiding it. "Fear," says Dr. Watts, "shows itself by paleness of the cheek, sinking of the spirits, trembling of the limbs, hurry and confusion of the mind and thoughts, agonies of nature, and fainting. Many a person has died with fear. Sometimes it rouses all nature to exert itself in speedy flight, or other methods to avoid the approaching evil; sudden terror has performed some things of this kind almost incredible."

Fear is of different kinds: 1. There is an idolatrous and superstitious fear, which is called δεισιδαιμονια, a fear of demons, which the city of Athens was greatly addicted to. "I perceive," says the Apostle Paul, "that in all things ye are too superstitious," or given to the fear and worship of false deities. 2. There is an external fear of God, an outward show and profession of it, which is taught by the precepts of men: as in the men of Samaria, who pretended to fear the Lord, as the priest instructed them, and yet served their own gods: and such an external fear of God, Job's friends supposed was all that he had, and that even he had cast that off. 3. There is an hypocritical fear, when men make a profession of religion; but only serve him for some sinister end and selfish view, which Satan insinuated was Job's case. "Doth Job fear God for nought?" Job i. 9. 4. There is a servile fear which they possess who serve God from fear of punishment, and not from love to him. 5. There is a filial fear, such as that of a son to his father.

Fear is sinful when—1. It proceeds from unbelief or distrust of God. 2. When it ascribes more to the creature than is due; or when we fear our enemies without considering they are under God. 3. When we fear that in God that is not in him, or that he will break his promise, &c. 4. When our fear is immoderate, so as to distract us in our duty. See next article.

FEAR OF GOD, is that holy disposition or gracious habit formed in the soul by the Holy Spirit, whereby we are inclined to obey all God's commands; and evidences itself—1. By a dread of his displeasure. 2. Desire of his favour. 3. Regard for his excellences. 4. Submission to his will. 5. Gratitude for his benefits. 6. Sincerity in his worship. 7. Conscientious obedience to his commands, Prov. viii. 13. FEAR OF DEATH. See DEATH.

FEAST, in a religious sense, is a ceremony of feasting and thanksgiving.

The principal feasts of the Jews were the feasts of trumpets, of expiation, of tabernacles, of the dedication, of the passover, of Pentecost, and that of purification. Feasts, and the ceremonies thereof, have made great part of the religion of almost all nations and sects; hence the Greeks, the Romans, Mohammedans, and professing Christians, have not been without them.

Feasts are either immovable or moveable. Immovable feasts are those constantly celebrated on the same day of the year. The principal of these are Christmas-day, Circumcision, Epiphany, Candlemas, or Purification; Lady-day, or the Annunciation, called also the incarnation or conception; All Saints and All Souls; besides the days of the several apostles, as St. Thomas, St. Paul. Moveable feasts are those which are not confined to the same day of the year. Of these the principal is Easter, which gives law to all the rest, all of them following and keeping their proper distances from it. Such are Palm Sunday, Good Friday, Ash Wednesday, Sexagesima, Ascension-day, Pentecost, and Trinity Sunday.

Besides these feasts, which are general, and enjoined by the church, there are others local and occasional, enjoined by the magistrate, or voluntarily set on foot by the people; such are the days of thanksgiving for delivery from war, plagues, &c. such also are the vigils or wakes in commemoration of the dedication of particular churches.

The prodigious increase of feast days commenced towards the close of the fourth century, occasioned by the discovery that was made of the remains of martyrs, and other holy men, for the commemoration of whom they were established. These, instead of being set apart for pious exercises, were abused in indolence, voluptuousness, and criminal practices. Many of them were instituted on a pagan model, and perverted to similar purposes. See HOLY DAY.

FEAST OF ASSES. This was a festival in the Romish church, and was celebrated at Beauvais. They chose a young woman, the handsomest in the town; made her ride on an ass richly harnessed, and placed in her arms a pretty infant. In this state, followed by the bishop and clergy, she marched in procession from the cathedral to the church of St. Stephen; entered into the sanctuary, placed herself near the altar, and then celebrated mass; not forgetting to explain the fine qualities of the animal, and exhorting him to make a devout genuflection, with a variety of other fooleries.

FEELINGS, RELIGIOUS, are those sensations or emotions of the mind produced by the views we have of religion. While some enthusiasts boast of, depend on, and talk much of their feelings, there are others who are led to discard the term, and almost to abandon the idea of religious feeling; but it is evident, that however many have been misguided and deceived by their feelings, yet there is no such thing as religion without them. For instance, religion consists in contrition, repentance, and devotion; now what is contrition but a feeling of sorrow for sin; what is repentance but a feeling of hatred to it, with a relinquishing of it? what is devotion but a feeling of love to God and his ways? Who can separate the idea of feeling from any of these acts? The fact is this, religious feelings, like every thing else, have been abused; and men, to avoid the imputation of fanaticism, have run into the opposite evil of lukewarmness, and been content with a system without feeling its energy. See AFFECTION, ENTHUSIASM, EXPERIENCE.

FELLOWSHIP, joint interest, or the having one common stock. The fellowship of the saints is twofold:—1. With God. 1 John i. 3. 1 Cor. i. 9; xiii. 14.—2. With one another. 1 John i. 7.

Fellowship with God consists in knowledge of his will. Job xxii. 21. John xvii. 3. Agreement. Amos iii. 2. Strength of affection. Rom. viii. 38, 39. Enjoyment of his presence. Ps. iv. 6. Conformity to his image. 1 John ii. 6; i. 6.

Fellowship of the Saints may be considered as a fellowship of duties. Rom. xii. 6. 1 Cor. xii. 1. 1 Thess. v. 17, 18. James v. 16. Of ordinances. Heb. x. 24. Acts ii. 46. Of graces, love, joy, &c. Heb. x. 24. Mal. iii. 16. 2 Cor. viii. 4. Of interest spiritual, and sometimes temporal. Rom. xii. 4, 13. Heb. xiii. 16. Of sufferings. Rom. xv. 1, 2. Gal. vi. 1, 2. Rom. xii. 15. Of eternal glory. Rev. vii. 9. See COMMUNION.

FENCING TABLES, the designation of a sacramental rite among the Scotch Presbyterians, which takes place almost immediately before the distribution of the elements, and consists in the minister's pointing out the character of those who have, and of those who have not a right to sit down at the table. This address is followed up by the reading of several passages of Scripture, descriptive of the character of saints and sinners.

FETISH, an idol. This word, now frequently met with in the French and German languages, was first brought into use by De Brosses, in his work Du Culte des Dieux Fetiches (1760), and is derived either from the Portuguese fetisso, a block adored as an idol, or, according to Winterbottom, from feticzeira, an enchantress. The Portuguese gave this name to the idols of the negroes, on the Senegal, and afterwards the word received a more extensive meaning. The general signification now given to fetish seems to be an object worshipped, not representing any living figure. Hence stones, arms, vessels, &c. are fetishes. The negroes of Guinea suppose a fetish to preside over every canton or district, and one also over every family, and each individual, which the individual worships on the anniversary of his birth-day. Those of the better sort have, besides this, weekly festivals, on which they kill a cock or sheep. They believe the material substances which they worship, to be endowed with intelligence, and the power of doing them good or evil; and also that the fetishere, or priest, being of their council, is privy to all that those divinities know, and thence acquainted with the most secret thoughts and actions of men. The household, or family fetish, narrowly inspects the conduct of every individual in the house, and rewards or punishes each according to his deserts. The rewards consist in the multiplication of the slaves and wives of the worshipper, and the punishment in their diminution; but the most terrible punishment is death. At Cape Coast there is a public guardian fetish, supreme in power and dignity. This is a rock which projects into the sea from the bottom of the cliff on which the castle is built. To this rock annual sacrifices are presented, and the responses given through the priests are rewarded by the blinded devotees.

FEUILLANTINES, a reformed order of Cistercian monks, who went barefoot, lived only on herbs, and practised astonishing austerities. Their congregation was afterwards divided into two by Pope Urban VIII. in 1630, who separated the French from the Italians, and gave them two generals.

FIFTH MONARCHY MEN, were a set of enthusiasts, in the time of Cromwell, who expected the sudden appearance of Christ to establish on earth a new monarchy or kingdom. In consequence of this illusion, some of them aimed at the subversion of all human government. In ancient history, we read of four great monarchies, the Assyrian, Persian, Grecian, and the Roman; and these men, believing that this new spiritual kingdom of Christ was to be the fifth, came to bear the name by which they were called. Their leader was Thomas Venner, a wine-cooper, who, in his little conventicle in Coleman-street, warmed his admirers with passionate expectations of a fifth universal monarchy, under the personal reign of King Jesus upon earth, and that the saints were to take the kingdom to themselves. To introduce this imaginary kingdom, they marched out of their meeting-house, towards St. Paul's Church-yard, on Sunday, Jan. 6th, 1660, to the number of about fifty men, well armed, and with a resolution to subvert the present government, or to die in the attempt. They published a declaration of the design of their rising, and placed sentinels at proper places. The lord mayor sent the trained bands to disperse them, whom they quickly routed, but in the evening retired to Caen Wood, between Highgate and Hampstead. On Wednesday morning they returned, and dispersed a party of the king's soldiers in Threadneedle-street. In Wood-street they repelled the trained bands, and some of the horse guards; but Venner himself was knocked down, and some of his company slain; from hence the remainder retreated to Cripple-gate, and took possession of a house, which they threatened to defend with a desperate resolution; but nobody appearing to countenance their frenzy, they surrendered after they had lost about half their number. Venner and one of his officers were hanged before their meeting-house door in Coleman-street, Jan. 19th; and a few days after nine more were executed in divers parts of the city.

FILIAL PIETY, is the affectionate attachment of children to their parents, including in it love, reverence, obedience, and relief. Justly has it been observed, that these great duties are prompted equally by nature and by gratitude, independent of the injunctions of religion; for where shall we find the person who hath received from any one benefits so great, or so many, as children from their parents? And it may be truly said, that if persons are undutiful to their parents, they seldom prove good in any other relation. See article CHILDREN.

FILIATION OF THE SON OF GOD. See SON OF GOD.

FILIOQUE, a term signifying "and from the Son," which the Greeks accuse the Latin church of introducing into the ancient creed relative to the procession of the Holy Spirit: the former maintaining that his procession is from the Father only. At what time this introduction took place cannot be ascertained, but Augustine has the expression, procedere ab utroque; and the synod of Toledo, in 589, declares every one to be a heretic, who does not believe, a patre filioque procedere Spiritum Sanctum. Every attempt to reconcile the two churches, with respect to this point, has proved abortive, so that it continues to be a mark of distinction between them.

FIRE PHILOSOPHERS. See THEOSOPHISTS.

FIRST FRUITS, among the Hebrews, were oblations of part of the fruits of the harvest, offered to God as an acknowledgment of his sovereign dominion. There was another sort of first fruits which was paid to God. When bread was kneaded in a family, a portion of it was set apart, and given to the priest or Levite who dwelt in the place. If there were no priest or Levite there, it was cast into the oven, and consumed by the fire. These offerings made a considerable part of the revenues of the priesthood. Lev. xxiii.; Exod. xxii. 29; Chron. xxiii. 19; Numb. xv. 19, 20.

The first fruits of the Spirit are such communications of his grace on earth, as fully assure us of the full enjoyment of God in heaven. Rom. viii. 23. Christ is called the first fruits of them that slept; for as the first fruits were earnest to the Jews of the succeeding harvest, so Christ is the first fruits of the resurrection, or the earnest of a future resurrection; that as he rose, so shall believers also rise to happiness and life. 1 Cor. xv. 20.

First fruits are mentioned in ancient writers as one part of the church revenue.

First fruits, in the Church of England, are the profits of every spiritual benefice for the first year, according to the valuation thereof in the king's book.

FIVE POINTS, are the five doctrines controverted between the Arminians and Calvinists. See CALVINISTS.

FLACIANS, the followers of Matthias Flacius Illyricus, who flourished in the sixteenth century. He taught that original sin is the very substance of human nature; and that the fall of man was an event which extinguished in the human mind every virtuous tendency, every noble faculty, and left nothing behind it but universal darkness and corruption.

FLAGELLANTS, (from the Latin flagellare, to beat,) the name of a sect in the thirteenth century, who thought that they could best expiate their sins by the severe discipline of the scourge. Rainer, a hermit of Perugia, is said to have been its founder, in 1260. He soon found followers in nearly all parts of Italy. Old and young, great and small, ran through the cities, scourging themselves, and exhorting to repentance. Their number soon amounted to 10,000, who went about, led by priests, bearing banners and crosses. They went in thousands from country to country, begging alms. In 1261, they broke over the Alps in crowds into Germany, showed themselves in Alsatia, Bavaria, Bohemia, and Poland; and found there many imitators. In 1296, a small band of Flagellants appeared in Strasburg, who, with covered faces, whipped themselves through the city, and at every church. The princes and higher clergy were little pleased with this new fraternity, although it was favoured by the people. The shameful public exposure of the person by the Flagellants offended good manners; their travelling in such numbers afforded opportunity for seditious commotions, and irregularities of all sorts; and their extortion of alms was a tax upon the peaceful citizen. On this account, both in Germany and in Italy, several princes forbade these expedients of the Flagellants. The kings of Poland and Bohemia expelled them with violence from their states, and the bishops strenuously opposed them. In spite of this, the society continued under another form in the fraternities of the Beghards, in Germany and France, and in the beginning of the fifteenth century, among the Brothers of the Cross, so numerous in Thuringia, (so called from wearing on their clothes a cross on the breast and on the back,) of whom ninety-one were burnt at once at Sangershausen, in 1414. The council assembled at Constance, between 1414 and 1418, was obliged to take decisive measures against them. Since this time nothing more has been heard of a fraternity of this sort.

FLAGELLATION has almost always been used for the punishment of crimes. Its application as a means of religious penance is an old oriental custom admitted into corrupt churches, partly because self-torment was considered salutary as the mortifying of the flesh, and partly because both Christ and the apostles underwent scourging. From the first century of Christianity, religious persons sought to atone for their sins, and to move an impartial Judge to compassion and pardon, by voluntary bodily torture. Like the Abbot Regino, at Prum, in the tenth century, many chose to share in the sufferings of Christ, in order to make themselves the more certain of forgiveness through him. It became general in the eleventh century, when Peter Damiani of Ravenna, abbot of the Benedictine monastery near Gubbio, afterwards cardinal bishop of Ostia, zealously recommended scourging as an atonement for sin, to Christians generally, and in particular to the monks. His own example, and the fame of his sanctity, rendered his exhortations effective. Clergy and laity, men and women, began to torture themselves with rods and thongs and chains. They fixed certain times for the infliction of this discipline upon themselves. Princes caused themselves to be scourged naked by their father confessors. Louis IX. constantly carried with him, for this purpose, an ivory box, containing five small iron chains, and exhorted his father confessor to scourge him severely. He likewise gave similar boxes to the princes and princesses of his house, and to other pious friends, as marks of his peculiar favour. The wild expectation of being purified from sin by flagellation prevailed throughout Europe in the last half of the thirteenth century. But these penances soon degenerated into noisy fanaticism, and a sort of trade. After the council of Constance (1414—18), both clergy and laity by degrees became disgusted with the scourge. The Cordeliers observed the practice longest. It was considered as equivalent to every sort of expiation for past sins.

3000 strokes, and the chanting of thirty penitential psalms, were deemed sufficient to cancel the sins of a year; 30,000 strokes the sins of ten years, &c. An Italian widow, in the eleventh century, boasted that she had made expiation by voluntary scourging for 100 years, for which, as the requisite number, she had inflicted on herself no fewer than 300,000 stripes. The opinion was prevalent, likewise, that, however great the guilt, hell might be escaped by self-inflicted pain, and the honour of peculiar holiness acquired. By this means, flagellation obtained a charm in the sight of the guilty and ambitious, which raised them above the dread both of sinning and suffering, till the vain deceits of hypocrisy vanished before the clearer light of civilization and knowledge.

FLAMINES, an order or class of priests among the ancient Romans, instituted, according to Plutarch, by Romulus, and according to Livy, by Numa. They were chosen by the people, and their inauguration was performed by the sovereign pontiff. Their number was originally three, but was afterwards increased to fifteen, the three first of whom, being taken from the senate, were called Flamines Majores; and the twelve others, taken from the people, Flamines Minores. When the emperors were deified, they also had flamens, as flamen Augusti. Their ordinary duties were to see that the ancient and customary honours were paid to the publicly acknowledged deities, and that all due respect was paid to the religion of the state; but, in the opinion of the superstitious, they were invested with interest and influence with the gods, which enabled them to maintain and exercise a powerful dominion over the minds of the vulgar.

FLATTERY, a servile and fawning behaviour, attended with servile compliances and obsequiousness, in order to gain a person's favour.

FLEMINGIANS, or FLANDRIANS, a sect of rigid Anabaptists, who acquired this name in the sixteenth century, because most of them were natives of Flanders, by way of distinction from the Waterlandians. See WATERLANDIANS.

FO, FÖE, FOHI, is revered in China as the founder of a religion, which was introduced into China in the first century of the Christian era. According to tradition he was born in Cashmere, about the year B. C. 1027. While his mother was in travail, the stars were darkened, and nine dragons descended from heaven. He was born from her right side, and immediately after the birth she died. At the moment of his entrance into the world, he stood upright on his feet, stepped forward seven paces, and pointing one hand to heaven, and the other to the earth, spoke distinctly these words:—"None in heaven or earth deserves adoration besides me." In his seventeenth year he married three wives, and became the father of a son; but in his nineteenth year he left his family, and went with four wise men into the wilderness. When thirty, he was deified; and, confirming his doctrines by pretended miracles, collected an immense number of disciples round him, and spread his doctrines throughout the East. His priests and disciples were called in China Seng, in Tartary Lamas, in Siam Talapoins, and in Europe Bonzes. In the 79th year of his age, perceiving that his end was approaching, Fo declared to his disciples, "That hitherto he had spoken only in enigmatical and figurative language; but that now being about to take leave of them, he would unveil to them the mysteries of his doctrine. Know, then," said he, "that there is no other principle of all things but the void and nothing; that from nothing all things have sprung, and to nothing all must return; and there all our hopes must end." This final declaration of Fo divided his disciples into three sects. Some founded on it an atheistical sect; the greater part adhered to his ancient doctrines; while others made a distinction between an exoteric and an esoteric doctrine, which they endeavoured to bring into harmony. The exoteric doctrine of Fo contains his system of morality. It distinguishes between good and evil: he who has done good during his life will be rewarded after death; and he who has done evil will be punished. He gave his followers only these five precepts:—Not to kill any living creature; not to take the property of another; to avoid impurity and unchastity; not to speak falsely; and to abstain from wine. They are taught the practice of charity; the merit accruing from the building of temples and convents; and the punishment of their souls entering into the bodies of the vilest and most unclean animals if they commit sin. The principal esoteric or secret doctrines, into which but few are initiated, are the following:—The origin and end of all things is the void and nothing. The first human beings have sprung from nothing, and are returned to nothing. The void constitutes our being. All things, living and inanimate, constitute one whole; differing from each other not in essence, but only in form and qualities. The original essence of all things is pure, unchangeable, highly subtle, and simple, and, because it is simple, the perfection of all other beings. It is perfect, and therefore exists in uninterrupted quiet, without possessing virtue, power, or intelligence; nay, its very essence consists in the absence of intelligence, activity, and want or desire. Whoever desires to be happy, must constantly endeavour to conquer themselves, and become like the original essence. To accomplish this, he must accustom himself not to act, desire, feel, nor think. The great precept was—endeavour to annihilate thyself; for, as soon as thou ceasest to be thyself, thou becomest one with

God, and returnest into his being. The other followers of Fo adopt the doctrine of the void and nothing, and the transmigration of souls; but teach that they enter ultimately the class of Samanœans, and finally appear in the bodies of perfect Samanœans, who have no more crimes to expiate, and need no longer to revere the gods, who are only the servants of the Supreme God of the universe. This Supreme unoriginated Being cannot be represented by any image; neither can he be worshipped, because he is elevated above all worship; but his attributes may be represented, adored, and worshipped. Hence the source of the worship of images by the natives of India, and of the multitude of particular tutelary deities in China. All the elements, the changes of the weather, &c. have each its particular genius; and all these gods are servants or officers of the Supreme God, Seng-wang-Man. The public worship of Fo, which became a national religion, is called, in India, Brahmanism.

Food. Questions concerning meats and drinks have occasioned much angry and bitter contention, both in the Jewish and Christian churches. Undue importance has often, no doubt, been attached to certain distinctions in these matters, and many have been scrupulously nice about what they might eat and drink, while they seem to have forgotten that the kingdom of heaven consisted of righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost. Others, however, have erred on the other hand, by despising all attention to such things, as too trifling to deserve regard. But it must certainly be admitted, that the food by which man is supported and nourished, is not in itself of small importance. He who made all things for the use of man, best knows what is good for food, and what is fitted to serve other purposes. He has an undoubted right to grant or to withhold the use of his creatures, and if he has interfered in this matter, it becomes us to bow with deference to his authority. That particular kinds of food may be productive of certain physical and moral effects on the human constitution, is not to be denied; in this point of view, therefore, the importance of divine enactments respecting their use may be shown. And if distinctions in the use of animals were connected with important religious institutions, and intended to illustrate some interesting doctrines of morality, their propriety may be still further defended. That laws and regulations have been given by the Almighty to guide mankind in this affair, must be obvious to every man who looks into the Bible; and an investigation of the nature of these laws will be found interesting both to the philosopher and the Christian.

To enter into minute details on this subject would swell this article beyond all due bounds; but we shall endeavour to take a general view of the law respecting food, during the Adamic, Noahic, Jewish, and Christian dispensations, in which we shall endeavour to ascertain the nature of the liberty enjoyed, and the restrictions which were imposed during these several periods.

That we may have the whole subject before us at once, it may be proper to place, under its proper head, the several grants or laws which have been made on these matters at the different times.

Grant to Adam.

"Behold, I have given you every herb bearing seed which is on the face of all the earth; and every tree, in which is the fruit of a tree yielding seed—to you it shall be for meat, Gen. i. 29. Of every tree in the garden thou shalt freely eat; but of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil thou shalt not eat," ch. ii. 16.

Grant to Noah.

"Every moving thing that moveth shall be meat for you; even as the green herb have I given you all things. But flesh, with the life thereof, which is the blood thereof, shall you not eat." Gen. ix. 3, 4.

Jewish Law.

"And whatsoever man there be of the house of Israel, or of the strangers that sojourn among you, that eateth any manner of blood, I will even set my face against that soul that eateth blood, and I will cut him off from among his people. For the life of the flesh is in the blood; and I have given it to you upon the altar, to make an atonement for your souls; for it is the blood that maketh an atonement for the soul," Lev. xvii. 10, 11.

Christian Law.

"For it seemed good to the Holy Ghost, and to us, to lay upon you no greater burden than these necessary things; that ye abstain from meats offered to idols, and from blood, and from things strangled, and from fornication; from which, if ye keep yourselves, ye shall do well," Acts xv. 28, 29.

Jewish Restrictions.

"Whatsoever parteth the hoof, and is cloven-footed, and cheweth the cud, among the beasts, that shall ye eat, &c. Whatsoever hath fins and scales in the waters, in the seas, and in the rivers, that shall ye eat. And all that have not fins and scales shall be an abomination unto you. And these are they which ye shall have in abomination among the fowls; they shall not be eaten—they are an abomination: the eagle," and nineteen others. "All fowls that creep, going upon all four, shall be an abomination unto you. These also shall be unclean among the creeping things that creep upon the earth—the weasel," and seven others. "Whatsoever goeth upon the belly, and whatsoever goeth upon all four, or whatsoever hath more feet, and all creeping things, them ye shall not eat; for they are an abomination. This is the law of the beasts, and of the fowl, and of every living creature that moveth in the waters, and of every creature that creepeth upon the earth; to make a difference between the unclean and the clean, and between the beast that may be eaten and the beast that may not be eaten," Lev. xi. passim.

Christian Liberty.

"Peter fell into a trance, and saw heaven opened, and a certain vessel descending to him; wherein were all manner of four-footed beasts of the earth, and wild beasts, and creeping things, and fowls of the air. And there came a voice to him, Rise, Peter; kill and eat. What God hath cleansed, that call not thou common, Acts x. 9, 15. Whatsoever is sold in the shambles, that eat, asking no question for conscience sake; for the earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof, 1 Cor. x. 25, 26. Every creature of God is good, and nothing to be refused, if it be received with thanksgiving; for it is sanctified by the word of God and prayer." 1 Tim. iv. 4, 5.

In these passages we have a general view of the law of Scripture on the subject of meats, from the earliest period to the present time. It is evident there has been a considerable difference in it during the several dispensations. At first, the grant of food was very limited; it afterwards was greatly extended; by the Mosaic law it was restricted in a peculiar manner, and now again we enjoy a high degree of liberty.

On the grant to Adam we would observe,—

1. That neither man nor beasts seem to have been intended to live upon animals. Man was allowed vegetables and fruit; beasts were restricted to the use of the green herb.

2. Whatever is not mentioned in the grant, must be considered as excluded from it; for Adam could have no experience of the fitness or unfitness of any thing for food but what he was told by God. He would, therefore, judge every thing improper or unlawful which he was not expressly permitted to use.

3. To the general use of fruits there was one particular exception;—the fruit of the tree of knowledge, which was intended to answer certain important moral purposes.

4. The first grant, we have no doubt, was fully adequate to all the wants of the first race of men; and sufficient to nourish them under a genial climate, and with the small degree of labour which they had to undergo.

5. The slaughtering of animals would have been inconsistent with a state of innocence. The sorrows and death of the brute creation are connected with a state of sin, as well as our own. Even the heathen excluded the use of animals from their golden age. "During the reign of Saturn, that is, the golden age," says Dicaearchus, quoted by Jerome, "when the ground poured forth in abundance, no flesh was eaten, but all lived on vegetables and fruits which the earth brought forth spontaneously." So Ovid:—

At vetus illa ætas, cul fecimus aurea nomen, Fœtibus arborea, et quas humus educat herbas
Fortunata fuit, nec polluit ora cruore.—L. xv.

And Plato tells us "men all then lived from the earth, for they had abundance of trees and fruits; the soil being so fruitful that it supplied those fruits of its own accord, without the labour of agriculture."—Gale, C. G. p. i. 336.

6. It is impossible to say from Scripture whether the antediluvians used animal food or not. It is by no means improbable they transgressed this as well as other divine precepts; that they had not received permission so to do is evident, both from this and also from the grant to Noah; on which we now observe,—

1. That this is the first revealed grant of animals for food. They had already been slain in sacrifice, but not for meat. The reasons assigned by Bochart and Grotius for being of a different opinion have little weight, and have been repeatedly answered.

2. There is in the second grant a plain allusion to the first, which is quite inexplicable on the ground of any previous permission to use animal food. "Even as the green herb have I given you all things." Had animal food been allowed in the grant to Adam, would not a grant to Noah have been unnecessary?

3. The grant of animal food was now probably given on account of the physical changes produced both on the world and the human constitution by the flood. Men are now subjected to a greater degree of bodily labour; they of course require more nourishing aliment than vegetables; and perhaps the vegetable productions themselves are less nutritious than they were before; and in many parts of the earth a sufficiency of vegetable food could not be procured; such are all the cold northern and southern regions of the globe. By having a choice of food we are enabled to suit it to our health and circumstances, and to resist the debilitating effects of changeable and unfriendly atmospheres. Merciful are all the appointments of God.

4. As in the first, so also in the second grant is there an exception, or limitation:—"Flesh with the life thereof, which is the blood thereof, shall ye not eat." This limitation I understand to contain two things; first, it prohibits eating the flesh of a living animal; and, next, the blood of a creature by itself; for this plain reason, that the blood was the life of the animal. The first will generally be granted, because the practice is repugnant to our feelings and to humanity; the latter, however, is a subject of dispute. Referring to the article BLOOD, as to the lawfulness of blood eating, at present we only remark, that it is natural to expect some limitation of the universal grant of animal food, and we submit whether the most natural interpretation of the restriction is not this:—"Though I give you the flesh, I do not give you the blood with it, because the blood is the life." Again, eating of blood was expressly forbidden to the stranger in Israel, as well as to Israelites, and for the same reason as is here adduced, its being the life of the animal, Lev. xvii. 10, 11. As we have no right to use any thing for food which is not expressly granted, and as blood here is evidently not included in the grant, it must be inferred that it was the design of Heaven that it should be used. One of the obvious reasons of this restriction was the prevention of cruelty to animals. Although they are granted for food, it is not lawful to exercise any unnecessary cruelty towards them. Their life is in their blood; it must therefore be taken from them before they are used; and to excite an aversion to blood, a horror at cruelty, it is improper to use it in any way as food.

On Noah, and in him on all mankind,
The charter was conferred, by which we hold
The flesh of animals in fee, and claim
O'er all we feed a power of life and death.
But read the instrument, and mark it well;
Th' oppression of a tyrannous control
Can find no warrant there. Feed, then, and yield Thanks for thy food. Carnivorous, through sin, Feed on the slain, but spare the living brute.

COWPER.

In this grant we discover both the bounty and the severity of Jehovah. It is becoming to be grateful for the benefit bestowed, and to acquiesce in the appointed restriction.

Jewish and Christian Law.

On the Jewish and Christian Law upon this subject, it appears that they both unite in prohibiting the same thing—blood, whether in or out of the animal—for things strangled seem to relate to things strangled for the sake of keeping the blood in them.

By the Jewish law blood was prohibited for an additional reason—Because it made atonement for the soul. This may be considered as peculiar to that economy in which blood was so constantly offered on the altar. It was necessary, therefore, that it should be considered a sacred thing. But it deserves to be considered whether, though that dispensation be abolished, the reason does not still remain. Our great High Priest continues to officiate in the heavenly holy place with his own blood in his hands; and though this is unseen, it is not the less real and certain. His blood we know has made atonement; and though sacrifices be done away, blood is a sacred thing, as an emblem of that life which was given for a ransom. It is prohibited by the Jewish law under a peculiar penalty—death. This was suitable to the constitution of Israel, and the theocracy under which they were placed. Of course, with all other temporal punishments, it is now done away.

It deserves to be noticed, that the Christian prohibition is absolute. The decree assigns neither one reason nor another. Its language is as pointed with regard to blood as to fornication; and no man has any right to add reasons limiting the prohibition to particular times or circumstances, where the Holy Spirit has been silent. That which had never before been granted, this decree undoubtedly does not sanction.

The Christian law prohibits also "meats offered to idols," or "pollutions of idols." "Meats were polluted by idolatrous worship when the whole had been previously offered in sacrifice, and a part afterwards converted into a feast, or when a part was taken from table and put into the fire, with an invocation of the idol. Now, as meats are 'sanctified by the word of God and prayer,' 1 Tim. iv. 3, 5; so meats are polluted by the name of idols and prayer to them. From the first epistle to the Corinthians, ch. viii. 10, it appears that the Gentile brethren were not always very willing to admit this truth, but were sometimes inclined to feast with their heathen neighbours, not only in private houses, but even in the temples of idols. It was necessary, therefore, to write unto them to abstain from those pollutions. This prohibition is inculcated and defended by Paul, at great length, in the passages just mentioned of his epistle to the Corinthians, which afford an excellent illustration of this clause in the decree, and of the manner in which Christians are bound to observe it. Some have thought that Paul departs from the strict letter of this injunction, because, in ch. viii., he argues merely from the effect of example. But his doctrine, when fully examined, will be found exactly the same with that of James. It still amounts to a prohibition; for, although he allows all meats to be indifferent in themselves, he expressly condemns the practice of eating meats offered to idols, especially in ch. x., where he shows it to be inconsistent with fellowship at the table of the Lord, with regard for the conscience of other men, and with the duty of a Christian, whether he eats or drinks, or whatever he does, to do all to the glory of God. Wherever meats, therefore, are polluted by idolatrous worship, Christians, when they know the fact, are to testify their abhorrence of idolatry by abstaining from such meats."—Ewing's Lect. on Acts xv.

Preservation from idolatry was, no doubt, one of the principal reasons of the strict prohibition of blood and some other kinds of food to the Jews. "Eating of blood, or rather drinking it, was quite customary among the pagan nations of Asia, in their sacrifices to idols, and in the taking of oaths. This, indeed, was so much an Asiatic, and, in a particular manner, a Phœnician usage, that we find the Roman writers taking notice of it, as something outlandish at Rome, and peculiar to these nations; and as in the Roman persecutions the Christians were compelled to burn incense, so were they in the Persian to eat blood. In the west the one, and in the east the other, was regarded as expressive of conversion to heathenism; because both were idolatrous practices. But for this very reason, because it was an idolatrous usage among the neighbouring nations, were the Israelites in the greater danger of being led, by eating blood, into idolatry, from their great propensity to that universally prevalent crime, and not from mere fondness for blood as a desirable article of food."—Michaelis Com. on Laws of Moses, vol. iii. 250, 251.

It is not unworthy of observation, that Mohammed prohibits his followers from eating the same things which are forbidden by the Jewish and Christian laws.

FOOL, one who has not the use of reason or judgment. In Scripture, wicked persons are often called fools, or foolish, because such act contrary to reason, trust to their own hearts, violate the laws of God, and prefer things vile, trifling, and temporal, to such as are important, divine, and eternal.

FOOLISH SPEAKING, such kind of conversation as includes folly, and can no ways be profitable and interesting, Eph. v. 4. Factiousness, indeed, is allowable, when it ministers to harmless divertisement, and delight to conversation; when it is used for the purpose of exposing things which are base and vile; when it has for its aim the reformation of others: when used by way of defence under unjust reproach. But all such kind of speaking as includes profane jesting, loose, wanton, scurrilous, injurious, unseasonable, vain-glorious talk, is strictly forbidden. See Barrow's excellent Sermon on this subject, in his Works, vol. i. ser. 14.

FOOLS, FEAST OF. Festivals under this name were regularly celebrated from the 5th to the 16th century, in several countries of Europe, by the clergy and laity, with the most absurd ceremonies, and form one of the strangest phenomena in the history of mankind. They were an imitation of the Saturnalia, or heathen festivals, and like this was celebrated in December. The chief celebration fell on New Year, or Innocents' Day; but the feast continued from Christmas to the last Sunday of Epiphany. At first only the boys of the choir, and young sacristans, played the principal part in them; but afterwards all the inferior servants of the church, whilst the bishop, or highest clergymen of the place, with the canons, formed the audience. The young people, who played the chief parts, chose from their own number a bishop or archbishop of fools, as he was called, and consecrated him, with many ridiculous ceremonies, in the principal church of the place. This officer then took the usual seat of the bishop, and caused high mass to be said, unless he preferred to read it himself, and to give the people his blessing. During this time the rest of the performers, dressed in different kinds of masks and disguises, engaged in indecent songs and dances, and practised all possible follies in the church. These incongruous practices were condemned by popes and councils, and forbidden by the Sorbonne in 1444; but they continued to be stoutly defended till the time of the Reformation.

FORBEARANCE is the act of patiently enduring provocation or offence. The following may be considered as the most powerful incentives to the exercise of this disposition:—1. The consideration that we ourselves often stand in need of it from others. Gal. vi. 1.—2. The express command of Scripture. Eph. iv. 2. Col. iii. 13.—3. The felicity of this disposition. It is sure to bring happiness at last, while resentment only increases our own misery.—4. That it is one of the strongest evidences we can give of the reality of our religion. John xiii. 35.—5. The beautiful example of Christ. Heb. xii. 3. 1 Pet. ii. 21—23.

FORBEARANCE OF GOD. See PATIENCE OF GOD.

FOREKNOWLEDGE OF GOD is his foresight or knowledge of every thing that is to come to pass, Acts ii. 23. This foreknowledge, says Charnock, was from eternity. Seeing he knows things possible in his power, and things future in his will, if his power and resolves were from eternity, his knowledge must be so too; or else we must make him ignorant of his own power, and ignorant of his own will from eternity, and consequently not from eternity blessed and perfect. His knowledge of possible things must run parallel with his will. If he willed from eternity, he knew from eternity what he willed; but that he did will from eternity we must grant, unless we would render him changeable, and conceive him to be made in time of not willing, willing. The knowledge God hath in time was always one and the same, because his understanding is his proper essence, as perfect as his essence, and of an immutable nature.

"To deny this is, says Saurin, to degrade the Almighty; for what, pray, is a God who created beings, and who could not foresee what would result from their existence? A God who formed spirits united to bodies by certain laws, and who did not know how to combine these laws so as to foresee the effects they would produce? A God forced to suspend his judgment? A God who every day learns something new, and who doth not know to-day what will happen to-morrow? A God who cannot tell whether peace will be concluded, or war continue to ravage the world; whether religion will be received in a certain kingdom, or whether it will be banished; whether the right heir will succeed to the crown, or whether the crown will be set on the head of an usurper? For according to the different determinations of the wills of men, of king, or people, the prince will make peace or declare war; religion will be banished or admitted; the tyrant or the lawful king will occupy the throne: for if God cannot foresee how the volitions of men will be determined, he cannot foresee any of these events. What is this but to degrade God from his Deity, and to make the most perfect of all intelligences a being involved in darkness and uncertainty like ourselves." See OMNISCIENCE.

FORGIVENESS, the pardon of any offence committed against us. This is a virtue which our Lord expressly inculcates, not as extending to our friends only, but to our enemies. "Ye have heard," saith he, "thou shalt love thy neighbour, and hate thine enemy; but I say unto you, love your enemies," &c. "This," says an ingenious writer, "was a lesson so new and utterly unknown, till taught by his doctrines and enforced by his example, that the wisest moralists of the wisest nations and ages represented the desire of revenge as a mark of a noble mind; but how much more magnanimous, how much more beneficial to mankind, is forgiveness! It is more magnanimous, because every generous and exalted disposition of the human mind is requisite to the practice of it; and it is the most beneficial, because it puts an end to an eternal succession of injuries and retaliations." Let us, therefore, learn to cherish this noble disposition; let the bitterest enemy we have be softened by its effects; let us consider, also, how friendly it is to our own happiness, and how much it prevents the unhappiness of others. "The feuds and animosities in families, and between neighbours, which disturb the intercourse of human life, and collectively compose half the misery of it, have their foundation in the want of a forgiving temper, and can never cease but by the exercise of this virtue on one side, or on both." Paley's Mor. Phil. vol. i. p. 271; Soame Jenyns's Int. Evid. pp. 67, 68; Clarke's Ser., ser. ii. vol. x.; Tillotson's Ser., vol. viii. p. 254.

FORGIVENESS OF SINS. See PARDON, MERCY.

FORMALIST, one who places his dependance on the outward ceremonies of religion, or who is more tenacious of the form of religion than the power of it.

FORMS OF PRAYER. See PRAYER.

FORNICATION, whoredom, or the act of incontinency between single persons; for if either of the parties be married, it is adultery. While the Scriptures give no sanction to those austerities which have been imposed on men under the idea of religion, so, on the other hand, they give no liberty for the indulgence of any propensity that would either militate against our own interest or that of others. It is in vain to argue the innocency of fornication from the natural passions implanted in us, since "marriage is honourable in all," and wisely appointed for the prevention of those evils which would otherwise ensue; and, besides the existence of any natural propensity in us, is no proof that it is to be gratified without any restriction. That fornication is both unlawful and unreasonable, may be easily inferred, if we consider, 1. That our Saviour expressly declares this to be a crime, Mark vii. 21, 23. 2. That the Scriptures declare that fornicators cannot inherit the kingdom of God, 1 Cor. vi. 9; Heb. xii. 16; Gal. v. 19—22. 3. Fornication sinks into a mere brutal commerce, a gratification which was designed to be the cement of a sacred, generous, and tender friendship. 4. It leaves the maintenance and education of children, as to the father, at least, utterly unsecured. 5. It strongly tempts the guilty mother to guard herself from infamy by methods of procuring abortion, which not only destroys the child, but often the mother. 6. It disqualifies the deluded creatures to be either good wives or mothers, in any future marriage, ruining that modesty which is the guardian of nuptial happiness. 7. It absolutely disqualifies a man for the best satisfactions,—those of truth, virtue, innocent gratifications, tender and generous friendship. 8. It often perpetuates a disease which may be accounted one of the sorest maladies of human nature, and the effects of which are said to visit the constitution of even distant generations.

FORTITUDE is a virtue or quality of the mind generally considered the same with courage; though, in a more accurate sense, they seem to be distinguishable. Courage resists danger,—fortitude supports pain. Courage may be a virtue or vice, according to the circumstances; fortitude is always a virtue: we speak of desperate courage, but not of desperate fortitude. A contempt or neglect of dangers may be called courage; but fortitude is the virtue of a rational and considerate mind, and is founded in a sense of honour, and a regard to duty.

Christian fortitude may be defined that state of mind which arises from trust and confidence in God; enables us to stand collected and undisturbed in the time of difficulty and danger; and is at an equal distance from rashness on the one hand and pusillanimity on the other. Fortitude takes different names, according as it acts in opposition to different evils; but some of those names are applied with considerable latitude. With respect to danger in general, fortitude has been called intrepidity; with respect to the dangers of war, valour; with respect to pain of body, or distress of mind, patience; with respect to labour, activity; with respect to injury, forbearance; with respect to our condition in general, magnanimity.

Christian fortitude is necessary to vigilance, patience, self-denial, and perseverance; and is requisite under affliction, temptation, persecution, desertion, and death. The noble cause in which the Christian is engaged, the glorious Master whom he serves, the provision that is made for his security, the illustrious examples set before him, the approbation of a good conscience, and the grand prospect he has in view, are all powerful motives to the exercise of this grace. Watts's Ser., ser. 31; Evans's Ser., ser. 19, vol. i.; Steele's Christian Hero; Mason's Ser., vol. i. ser. 5.

FRAME. This word is used to denote any state of mind a man may be in; and, in a religious sense, is often connected with the word feeling, or used synonymously with it. See FEELING.

"If our frames are comfortable," says one, "we may make them the matter of our praise, but not of our pride; we may make them our pleasure, but not our portion; we may make them the matter of our encouragement, but not the ground of our security. Are our frames dark and uncomfortable? they should humble us, but not discourage us; they should quicken us, but not obstruct us in our application for necessary and suitable grace; they should make us see our own emptiness, but not make us suspect the fullness of Christ; they should make us see our own unworthiness, but not make us suspect the willingness of Christ; they should make us see our own weakness, but not cause us to suspect the strength of Christ; they should make us suspect our own hearts, but not the firmness and freeness of the promises."

FRANKE, AUGUSTUS HERMANN, founder of the Orphan House at Halle, and of several institutions connected with it, distinguished in the annals of Christian philanthropy and zeal. He was born at Lubeck, March 23, 1663, and studied so assiduously that, in his fourteenth year, he was ready to enter the university. He studied theology and the languages at Erfurt, Kiel, and Leipsic. In 1681, he began to lecture at the latter university, on the practical interpretation of the Scriptures, and, by the Divine blessing, met with so much success, that the enemies of genuine and spiritual religion were roused against him, and attacked him on all sides; but he was defended by the celebrated Thomasius, then residing at Leipsic. Franke then accepted an invitation to preach at Erfurt, where his sermons attracted such numbers, among whom were many Catholics, that the elector of Mentz, to whose jurisdiction Erfurt then belonged, ordered him to leave the city within twenty-four hours. On this he went to Halle, as professor in the new university, at first of the oriental languages, and afterwards of theology. At the same time he became pastor of Glaucha, a suburb of Halle, the inhabitants of which he found sunk in the deepest ignorance and wretchedness, and for whose benefit he immediately began to devise schemes of usefulness. He first instructed destitute children in his own house, and gave them alms: he then took into his house some orphans, the number of whom rapidly increased. In this charitable work he was aided by some benevolent citizens of Halle; and his charitable institutions increased from year to year. In 1698 was laid the first stone of the buildings which now form two rows, 800 feet long. Sums of money poured in to him from all quarters; and frequently, when reduced to the utmost embarrassment in meeting the expense, the providence of God, in which he implicitly trusted, appeared for his relief. A chemist whom he visited on his death bed, left him the recipe for compounding several medicines, which afterwards yielded an annual income of from 20,000 to 30,000 dollars, by which he was enabled to prosecute his benevolent undertakings without any assistance from government. What is commonly called "Franke's Institution," comprises, 1. An Orphan Asylum. 2. The Royal Pedagogium. 3. The Latin School. 4. The German School. 5. The Canstein Bible Press, founded by Baron Canstein, a pious friend of Franke's, from which upwards of 2,000,000 copies of the whole Bible, and 1,000,000 of the New Testament have been issued, at low prices. 6. A library, and collections of natural history and philosophy.

The whole establishment forms one of the proudest monuments of Christian faith, benevolence, and zeal; and the philological and exegetical labours of Franke are gratefully acknowledged by biblical scholars of the present day, whose views of the doctrines of revelation widely differ from his. In his "Collegia Biblica," or "Biblical Lectures delivered at Halle," there was a return from human forms and systems to the Sacred Scriptures, as the pure and only source of faith, and the substitution of practical religion for scholastic subtleties and unfruitful speculations. Thus Scripture interpretation again became, as among the first reformers, the basis of theological study. After a life of eminent usefulness, this excellent man died, June 8, 1727, at the age of 64 years.

FRANCISCANS, OR MINORITES, (fratres minores, as they were called by their founder, in token of humility,) are the members of the religious order established by St. Francis, of Assisi, in 1208, by collecting followers near the church of Porticella, or Portiuncula, at

Assisi, in Naples. He was the son of a merchant, who having led a dissolute life, was reclaimed by a fit of sickness, and afterwards fell into an extravagant devotion, which more resembled alienation of mind than religion. The order was distinguished by vows of absolute poverty, and a renunciation of all the pleasures of the world, and was intended to serve the church, by the care of the religious state of the people, so neglected by the secular clergy of the time. Learning and intellectual accomplishments its members were not to aim at. They were strictly prohibited from possessing any property whatever. The rule of the order sanctioned by the Pope in 1210 and 1223, destined them to beg and preach. They had granted to them extensive privileges, which soon became equally burdensome to the clergy and laity, particularly as they were subject to no authority but that of the Pope. They often encroached on the rights of the lawful pastors. Indulgences were granted to them more frequently than to any other order: hence the phrase portiuncula indulgence. The order soon comprised thousands of monasteries, all established by alms and contributions. The rule of poverty, so strictly enjoined by the founder, was somewhat relaxed, and the monasteries were allowed to hold property; a change which was not effected without divisions within the order itself. Learning, also, did not long remain excluded from their monasteries, and distinguished scholars, as Bonaventura, Alexander de Hale, Duns Scotus, Roger Bacon, and others, obtained a celebrity which justified the admission of the Minorites to the chairs of the universities. They defended the immaculate conception of the Virgin Mary, against the Dominicans, the animosity against whom was perpetuated in the disputes between the Scotists and the Thomists. With these, their rivals, they were from the thirteenth to the sixteenth century, the confessors of princes and the rulers of the Christian world. They were then superseded by the Jesuits, but by a prudent compromise with them, they contrived to retain more power than the Dominicans. Several Franciscans have risen to the highest honours in the church; the Popes Nicholas IV., Alexander V., Sextus IV. and V., and Clement XIV. were from this order. Some of its members declared this to be an unpardonable departure from the rules, and therefore formed particular fraternities, such as the Cæsarinians and the Celestines in the thirteenth, and the Spirituals in the fourteenth century. In 1363, they were united by St. Paul, in the fraternity of the Socolanti, or sandal wearers. In 1415, they were constituted by the Pope a separate branch of the Franciscans, under the name of Observantines, which, in 1517, when Leo X. effected an accommodation between the different parties, retained the ascendancy. Since that time the general of the Observantines has been the general minister of the whole order. The Cordeliers are a branch of the Franciscans in France. The Reformati in Italy, and the Recollects, formerly numerous in France, belong to the brethren of the Observance. The strictest are the Alcantarines, who follow the reforms introduced by Peter of Alcantara, and go with their feet entirely bare. They are numerous in Spain and Portugal, but not in Italy. The branches of the Observants, under their common general, form two families: the Cismontane, who have sixty-six provinces, now generally in a feeble state, in Italy and Upper Germany, in Hungary, Poland, Palestine, and Syria: and the Ultramontane, with eighty-one provinces, in Spain, Portugal, Asia, Africa, America, and the Islands. That portion of the Franciscans who wear shoes, or the conventuals, are much less numerous. Before the French revolution they had thirty provinces, with one hundred convents, and 15,000 monks. They are now found only here and there in the south of Germany, in Switzerland, and Italy, where they have given up begging, and serve as professors in the colleges. A coarse woollen frock, with a cord round the waist, to which a rope with a knotted scourge is suspended, is the common dress of all the Franciscans. In 1528, Matthew, of Bassi, founded the order of the Capuchins, a branch of the Minorites, still more strict than the Observantines, who have had a separate general since 1619, and in the eighteenth century they numbered 1700 convents, and 25,000 members.

St. Francis himself collected nuns in the year 1209, who were sometimes called Damiantines, from their first church at St. Damian, in Assisi. St. Clare was their first prioress; hence they were also called Nuns of St. Clare. These nuns were also divided into branches, according to the severity of their rules. In the eighteenth century there were 28,000 Franciscan nuns in six hundred convents. They were formerly supported by the alms collected by the monks; they now live on the revenues of their convents. Several smaller orders, or sub-orders, were formed, among whom the Tertiarians were the most numerous in the thirteenth century. The whole number of Franciscans and Capuchins, in the eighteenth century, amounted to 115,000 monks, in 7000 convents. At present it is probably not one-third so great, as they have been suppressed in most countries. The order flourishes in America.

FRATERNITY, in the Roman Catholic countries, signifies a society for the improvement of devotion. Of these there are several sorts, as—1. The fraternity of the Rosary, founded by St. Dominic. It is divided into two branches called the common rosary, and the perpetual rosary; the former of whom are obliged to confess and communicate every first Sunday in the month, and the latter to repeat the rosary continually. 2. The fraternity of the Scapulary, whom it is pretended, according to the Sabbatine bull of Pope John XXII. the Blessed Virgin has promised to deliver out of hell the first Sunday after their death. 3. The fraternity of St. Francis's girdle are clothed with a sack of a grey colour, which they tie with a cord; and in processions walk barefooted, carrying in their hands a wooden cross. 4. That of St. Austin's leathern girdle comprehends a great many devotees. Italy, Spain, and Portugal are the countries where are seen the greatest number of these fraternities, some of which assume the name of arch-fraternity. Pope Clement VII. instituted the arch-fraternity of charity, which distributes bread every Sunday among the poor, and gives portions to forty poor girls on the feast of St. Jerome, their patron. The fraternity of death buries such dead as are abandoned by their relations, and causes masses to be celebrated for them.

FRATRICELLI, an enthusiastic sect of Franciscans, which rose in Italy, and particularly in the marquisate of Ancona, about the year 1294. The word is an Italian diminutive, signifying fraterculi, or "little brothers," and was here used as a term of derision, as they were most of them apostate monks, whom the Italians call frutelli, or fratricelli. For this reason, the term fratricelli, as a nickname, was given to many other sects, as the Catharists, the Waldenses, &c., however different in their opinions and their conduct. But this denomination, applied to the austere part of the Franciscans, was considered as honourable. See FRANCISCANS.

The founders of this sect were P. Maurato and P. de Fossombroni, who having obtained of Pope Celestin V. a permission to live in solitude, after the manner of hermits, and to observe the rule of St. Francis in all its rigour, several idle vagabond monks joined them, who, living after their own fancies, and making all perfection to consist in poverty, were soon condemned by Pope Boniface VIII. and his successor, and the inquisitors ordered to proceed against them as heretics, which commission they executed with their usual barbarity. Upon this, retiring into Sicily, Peter John Oliva de Serignan had no sooner published his comment on the Apocalypse, than they adopted his tenets. They held the Romish church to be Babylon, and proposed to establish another far more perfect one; they maintained that the rule of St. Francis was the Evangelical rule observed by Jesus Christ and his apostles. They foretold the reformation of the church, and the restoration of the true gospel of Christ by the genuine followers of St. Francis; and declared their assent to almost all the doctrines which were published under the name of the Abbot Joachim, in the "Introduction to the everlasting gospel," a book published in 1250, and explained by one of the spiritual friars, whose name was Gerhard.

Among other errors inculcated in this book, it is pretended that St. Francis was the angel mentioned in Rev. xiv. 6, and had promulgated to the world the true and everlasting gospel; that the gospel of Christ was to be abrogated in 1260, and to give place to this new and everlasting gospel, which was to be substituted in its room; and that the ministers of this great reformation were to be humble and barefooted friars, destitute of all worldly employments. Some say they even elected a pope of their church; at least they appointed a general with superiors, and built monasteries, &c. Besides the opinions of Oliva, they held that the sacraments of the church were invalid, because those who administered them had no longer any power or jurisdiction. They were condemned again by Pope John XXII., in consequence of whose cruelty they regarded him as the true antichrist; but several of them returning into Germany, were sheltered by Lewis, duke of Bavaria, the emperor.

There are authentic records, from which it appears, that no less than 2000 persons were burnt by the inquisition, from the year 1318 to the time of Innocent VI. for their inflexible attachment to the order of St. Francis. The severities against them were again revived, towards the close of the fifteenth century, by Pope Nicholas V. and his successors. However, all the persecutions which this sect endured were not sufficient to extinguish it; for it subsisted until the times of the reformation in Germany, when its remaining votaries adopted the cause and embraced the doctrine and discipline of Luther.

FRAUDS, PIOUS, artifices and falsehoods made use of in propagating the truth, and endeavouring to promote the spiritual interests of mankind. These have been more particularly practised in the church of Rome, and considered not only as innocent, but commendable. Neither the term nor the thing signified, however, can be justified. The terms pious and fraud, form a solecism; and the practice of doing evil that good may come, is directly opposite to the injunction of the Sacred Scriptures. Rom. iii. 8.

In order to give the reader a view of the pious frauds which have been carried on in the Church of Rome, we here insert the following specimen:—

The Franciscans maintained that the Virgin Mary was born without the blemish of original sin; the Dominicans asserted the contrary.

The doctrine of the Franciscans, in an age of darkness and superstition, could not but be popular; and hence the Dominicans lost ground from day to day. To support the credit of their order, they resolved, at a chapter held at Vimpsen, in the year 1504, to have recourse to fictitious visions and dreams, in which the people at that time had an easy faith; and they determined to make Bern the scene of their operations. A person named Jetzer, who was extremely simple, and much inclined to austerities, and who had taken their habit as a lay brother, was chosen as the instrument of the delusions they were contriving. One of the four Dominicans, who had undertaken the management of this plot, conveyed himself secretly into Jetzer's cell, and about midnight appeared to him in a horrid figure, surrounded with howling dogs, and seemed to blow fire from his nostrils, by the means of a box of combustibles which he held near his mouth. In this frightful form he approached Jetzer's bed, told him that he was the ghost of a Dominican, who had been killed at Paris, as a judgment of Heaven, for laying aside his monastic habit; that he was condemned to purgatory for this crime; adding at the same time, that by his means he might be rescued from his misery, which was beyond expression. This story, accompanied with horrible cries and howlings, frightened poor Jetzer out of the little wits he had, and engaged him to promise to do all that was in his power to deliver the Dominican from his torment. Upon this the impostor told him, that nothing but the most extraordinary mortifications, such as the discipline of the whip, performed during eight days by the whole monastery, and Jetzer's lying prostrate in the form of one crucified in the chapel during mass, could contribute to his deliverance. He added, that the performance of these mortifications would draw down upon Jetzer the peculiar protection of the Blessed Virgin; and concluded by saying, that he would appear to him again, accompanied with two other spirits. Morning was no sooner come than Jetzer gave an account of this apparition to the rest of the convent, who all unanimously advised him to undergo the discipline that was enjoined him, and every one consented to bear his share of the task imposed. The deluded simpleton obeyed, and was admired as a saint by the multitudes that crowded about the convent; while the four friars that managed the imposture, magnified in the most pompous manner, the miracle of this apparition in their sermons, and in their discourses. The night after, the apparition was renewed, with the addition of two impostors, dressed like devils, and Jetzer's faith was augmented by hearing from the spectre all the secrets of his life and thoughts, which the impostors had learned from his confessor. In this and some subsequent scenes (the detail of whose enormities, for the sake of brevity, we shall here omit) the impostor talked much to Jetzer of the Dominican order, which he said was peculiarly dear to the Blessed Virgin: he added, that the Virgin knew herself to be conceived in original sin; that the doctors who taught the contrary were in purgatory; that the Blessed Virgin abhorred the Franciscans for making her equal with her Son; and that the town of Bern would be destroyed for harbouring such plagues within her walls. In one of these apparitions Jetzer imagined that the voice of the spectre resembled that of the prior of the convent, and he was not mistaken; but, not suspecting a fraud, he gave little attention to this. The prior appeared in various forms, sometimes in that of St. Barbara, at others in that of St. Bernard: at length he assumed that of the Virgin Mary, and for that purpose, clothed himself in the habits that were employed to adorn the statue of the Virgin in the great festivals. The little images, that on these days are set on the altars, were made use of for angels, which, being tied to a cord that passed through a pulley over Jetzer's head, rose up and down, and danced about the pretended Virgin to increase the delusion. The Virgin, thus equipped, addressed a long discourse to Jetzer, in which, among other things, she told him that she was conceived in original sin, though she had remained but a short time under that blemish. She gave him, as a miraculous proof of her presence, a host, or consecrated wafer, which turned from white to red in a moment; and after various visits, in which the greatest enormities were transacted, the Virgin-prior told Jetzer, that she would give him the most affecting and undoubted marks of her Son's love, by imprinting on him the five wounds that pierced Jesus on the cross, as she had done before to St. Lucia and St. Catharine. Accordingly she took his hand by force, and struck a large nail through it, which threw the poor dupe into the greatest torment. The next night this masculine virgin brought, as he pretended, some of the linen in which Christ had been buried, to soften the wound; and gave Jetzer a soporific draught, which had in it the blood of an unbaptized child, some grains of incense and of consecrated salt, some quicksilver, the hairs of the eye-brows of a child; all which with some stupefying and poisonous ingredients, were mingled together by the prior with magic ceremonies, and a solemn dedication of himself to the devil in hope of his succour. The draught threw the poor wretch into a sort of lethargy, during which, the monks imprinted on his body the other four wounds of Christ in such a manner that he felt no pain. When he awakened, he found to his unspeakable joy, those impressions on his body, and came at last to fancy himself a representative of Christ in the various parts of his passion. He was, in this state, exposed to the admiring multitude on the principal altar of the convent, to the great mortification of the Franciscans. The Dominicans gave him some other draughts, that threw him into convulsions; which were followed by putting a pipe into the mouths of two images, one of Mary, and another of the child Jesus, the former of which had tears painted upon its cheeks in a lively manner. The little Jesus asked his mother, by means of this voice (which was that of the prior) why she wept? and she answered, that her tears were owing to the impious manner in which the Franciscans attributed to her the honour that was due to him, in saying that she was conceived and born without sin.

The apparitions, false prodigies, and abominable stratagems of these Dominicans were repeated every night; and the matter was at length so grossly overacted, that, simple as Jetzer was, he at last discovered it, and had almost killed the prior, who appeared to him one night in the form of the Virgin with a crown on her head. The Dominicans, fearing, by this discovery, to lose the fruits of their imposture, thought the best method would be to own the whole matter to Jetzer, and to engage him, by the most seducing promises of opulence and glory, to carry on the cheat. Jetzer was persuaded, or at least appeared to be so. But the Dominicans, suspecting that he was not entirely gained over, resolved to poison him; but his constitution was so vigorous, that though they gave him poison five several times, he was not destroyed by it. One day they sent him a loaf prepared with some spices, which growing green in a day or two, he threw a piece of it to a wolf's whelps that were in the monastery, and it killed them immediately. At another time they poisoned the host, or consecrated wafer; but as he vomited it up soon after he had swallowed it, he escaped once more. In short, there were no means of securing him, which the most detestable impiety and barbarity could invent, that they did not put in practice; till finding, at last, an opportunity of getting out of the convent, he threw himself into the hands of the magistrates, to whom he made a full discovery of this infernal plot. The affair being brought to Rome, commissaries were sent from thence to examine the matter; and the whole cheat being fully proved, the four friars were solemnly degraded from their priesthood, and were burnt alive on the last day of May, 1509. Jetzer died some time after at Constance, having poisoned himself, as was believed by some. Had his life been taken away before he had found an opportunity of making the discovery already mentioned, this execrable and horrid plot, which in many of its circumstances was conducted with art, would have been handed down to posterity as a stupendous miracle.

FREE AGENCY is the power of following one's inclination, or whatever the soul does, with the full bent of preference and desire. Many and long have been the disputes on this subject; not that man has been denied to be a free agent, but the dispute has been in what it consists. See articles LIBERTY and WILL. A distinction is made by writers between free agency and what is called the Arminian notion of free will. The one consists merely in the power of following our prevailing inclination; the other in a supposed power of acting contrary to it, or at least of changing it. The one predicates freedom of the man; the other, of a faculty in man, which Mr. Locke, though an anti-necessarian, explodes as an absurdity. The one goes merely to render us accountable beings; the other arrogantly claims a part, yea, the very turning point of salvation. According to the latter, we need only certain helps or assistances, granted to men in common, to enable us to choose the path of life; but, according to the former, our hearts being by nature wholly depraved, we need an almighty and invincible Power to renew them. See NECESSITY.

FREETHINKER, a person who rejects revelation; a deist. The term originated in the 18th century, and contains a sneer at believers, like the French esprit fort, and the German rationalist. Freethinking first appeared in England in the reigns of James II. and William III. In 1718 a weekly paper, entitled the "Freethinker," was published. Collins, Toland, Tindal, Morgan, and Bolingbroke are the champions of the sect; but Bolingbroke and Hume are the most distinguished. In France, Voltaire, D'Alembert, Diderot, and Helvetius, led the opposition against revealed religion. In Germany the same spirit became fashionable in the reign of Frederic the Great, and obtained a most extensive influence through the medium of the press, the universities, and even of the pulpit.

FREE-WILL BAPTISTS, in North America, a denomination first founded in 1780, but which has since spread into various parts of the country, and has churches in twelve of the States, and in the Canadas. They have about 700 churches; 560 preachers; and 30,500 communicants. They have quarterly and annual meetings, to which delegates are sent, and where difficult points are settled. They reject the Calvinistic doctrine regarding the Five Points; and some have imbibed Arian notions.

FRENCH CHURCH. See CHURCH, GALLICAN.

FRENCH PROPHETS. They first appeared in Dauphiny and Vivarais. In the year 1688, five or six hundred Protestants, of both sexes, gave themselves out to be prophets, and inspired of the Holy Ghost. They soon became so numerous, that there were many thousands of them inspired. They were people of all ages and sexes without distinction, though the greatest part of them were from six or seven to twenty-five years of age. They had strange fits, which came upon them with tremblings and faintings, as in a swoon, which made them stretch out their arms and legs, and stagger several times before they dropped down. They struck themselves with their hands, they fell on their backs, shut their eyes, and heaved with their breasts.

They remained a while in trances, and, coming out of them with twitchings, uttered all which came in their mouths. They said they saw the heavens open, the angels, paradise, and hell. Those who were just on the point of receiving the spirit of prophecy, dropped down, not only in the assemblies, crying out mercy, but in the fields, and in their own houses. The least of their assemblies made up 400 or 500, and some of them amounted to even 3000 or 4000 persons. When the prophets had for a while been under agitations of body, they began to prophesy. The burden of their prophecies was, "Amend your lives; repent ye: the end of all things draws nigh!" The hills resounded with their loud cries for mercy, and imprecations against the priests, the church, the pope, and against the anti-christian dominion, with predictions of the approaching fall of popery. All they said at these times was heard and received with reverence and awe.

In the year 1706, three or four of these prophets came over into England, and brought their prophetic spirit along with them, which discovered itself in the same ways and manners, by ecstasies, and agitations, and inspirations under them, as it had done in France; and they propagated the like spirit to others, so that before the year was out there were 200 or 300 of these prophets in and about London, of both sexes, of all ages; men, women, and children: and they had delivered, under inspiration, 400 or 500 prophetic warnings.

The great things they pretended by their spirit was, to give warning of the "near approach of the kingdom of God, the happy times of the church, the millennium state." Their message was, (and they were to proclaim it as heralds to the Jews, and every nation under heaven, beginning in England,) that the grand jubilee, the acceptable year of the Lord, the accomplishment of those numerous Scriptures concerning the "new heaven and the new earth," the "kingdom of the Messiah," the "marriage of the Lamb," the "first resurrection," or "the New Jerusalem descending from above," were now even at the door; that this great operation was to be wrought on the part of man by spiritual arms only, proceeding from the mouths of those who should, by inspiration, or the mighty gift of the Spirit, be sent forth in great numbers to labour in the vineyard; that this mission of his servants should be witnessed to by signs and wonders from heaven, by a deluge of judgments on the wicked universally throughout the world, as famine, pestilence, earthquakes, &c.; that the exterminating angels shall root out the tares, and there shall remain upon earth only good corn; and the works of men being thrown down, there shall be but one Lord, one faith, one heart, one voice among mankind. They declared that all the great things they spoke of would be manifest over the whole earth within the term of three years.

These prophets also pretended to the gift of languages, of discerning the secrets of the heart, the gift of ministration of the same spirit to others by the laying on of hands, and the gift of healing. To prove they were really inspired by the Holy Ghost, they alleged the complete joy and satisfaction they experienced, the spirit of prayer which was poured forth upon them, and the answer of their prayer by God.

FRIAR, or BROTHER, a term common to the monks of all orders. In a more peculiar sense, it is restrained to such monks as are not priests: for those in orders are usually dignified with the appellation of father.

FRIENDSHIP, a mutual attachment subsisting between two persons, and arising not merely from the general principle of benevolence, from emotions of gratitude for favours received, from views of interest, nor from instinctive affection or animal passion; but from an opinion entertained by each of them that the other is adorned with some amiable or respectable qualities. Various have been the opinions respecting friendship. Some have asserted that there is no such thing in the world; others have excluded it from the list of Christian virtues; while others, believing the possibility of its existence, suppose that it is very rare. To the two former remarks we may reply, that there is every reason to believe that there has been, and is such a thing as friendship. The Scriptures present us both with examples of, and precepts concerning it. David and Jonathan, Paul and Timothy, our Lord and Lazarus, as well as John, are striking instances of friendship. Solomon exhorts us in language so energetic, as at once shows it to be our duty to cultivate it. "Thine own friend and thy father's friend forsake not." "Make sure of thy friend, for faithful are the wounds of a friend," &c. The genius and injunctions of the Christian religion seem also to inculcate this virtue; for it not only commands universal benevolence to men, but promotes the strongest love and friendship between those whose minds are enlightened by divine grace, and who behold in each other the image of their Divine Master. As friendship, however, is not enjoyed by every one, and as the want of it arises often from ourselves, we shall here subjoin, from an eminent writer, a few remarks, by way of advice respecting it. 1. We must not expect perfection in any with whom we contract fellowship.—2. We must not be hurt by differences of opinion arising in intercourse with our friends.—3. It is material to the preservation of friendship, that openness of temper and obliging manners on both hands be cultivated.—4. We must not listen rashly to evil reports against our friends.—5. We must not desert our friends in danger or distress. Blair's Sermon, ser. 17, vol. iv.; Bp. Porteus's Ser., vol. i. ser. 15; W. Melmoth's Translation of Cicero's Lælius, in a Note.

FRIENDS, SOCIETY OF. See QUAKERS.

FULLER, ANDREW, long Secretary to the Baptist Missionary Society, was born at Wicken, in Cambridgeshire, on the 6th of February, 1754. His father occupied a small farm at that place, and was the parent of three sons, of whom Andrew was the youngest. He received the common rudiments of an English education at the free school of Soham; and till the age of twenty, was engaged in husbandry. Although his parents were dissenters of the Calvinistic persuasion, and were eminently pious, yet his youthful days were spent in sin and vanity, and he indulged in all the vices of the world. When about sixteen years of age, his mind became enlightened: he sincerely repented of his past transgressions; he forsook his former evil ways; and from that time he continued to make an honourable and consistent profession of Christianity. In the month of April, 1770, he was publicly immersed, on a profession of repentance and faith, and endured the revilings of his former associates for this conduct with meekness and resignation. For the two succeeding years he occasionally preached at Soham; and in January, 1774, he received, in consequence of the resignation of their pastor, Mr. Diver, a unanimous invitation from that congregation to become their pastor. In the spring of 1775, after the probation of more than twelve months, he accepted the call of the church, and was ordained in the month of May in that year. For some time he was engaged in the study of the Calvinistic controversy, though it appears that he read but few of the works written on the Arminian side of the question. In December, 1776, Mr. Fuller married Miss Gardiner, who was a member of the church at Soham—an amiable, diffident, and retired woman, by whom he had a numerous family. The income of Mr. Fuller being very small, he opened a seminary in 1779, but which in the succeeding year, he relinquished; and not being able comfortably to provide for his increasing family, and the conduct of some of the members of the church at Soham being lukewarm and unsatisfactory to him, he accepted an invitation from a Baptist congregation at Kettering, to become their pastor; and after having for twelve months preached to them on probation, in October, 1783, he was publicly set apart.

Mr. Fuller's removal to Kettering formed a new era in his life. It brought him into contact with a number of ministers of his own denomination, to whom he was greatly attached, and who were equally ardent with himself in the investigation of truth. Here his labours took a wider range, and were determined towards a more definite object. The prevailing system of doctrine among the Baptist churches, at this period, was that of the ultra-calvinism of Drs. Crisp and Gill, Messrs. Hussey, Brine, &c.—a system which denies true faith to be the duty of every one to whom the Gospel comes; and which, consequently, must paralyse the efforts of ministers to “go into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature;” “commanding all men every where to repent and believe,” at the peril of their souls. Mr. Fuller saw the baneful effects of this unscriptural system, and set himself to oppose and refute it with all his might. With this view he drew up and published a small volume, entitled, “The Gospel of Christ worthy of all Acceptation; or, the Obligations of men, fully to credit, and cordially to approve whatever God makes known; wherein is considered the Nature of Faith in Christ, and the Duty of those where the Gospel comes in that Matter.” This valuable treatise operated powerfully, and set thousands upon examining their received principles. A host of opponents presently rose up to oppose this new doctrine, as it was termed; and our author had to defend himself on every side, which he did with no ordinary dexterity.

In August, 1790, Providence deprived him of his excellent wife; and though he sustained the loss with becoming fortitude, it deeply affected him. To relieve the sufferings of his mind, he composed his “Dialogues and Letters on the Fundamental Principles of the Gospel;” and a celebrated work “On the Calvinistic and Socinian Systems, Examined and Compared as to their Moral Tendency.” This work deservedly ranks among the ablest and most useful of Mr. Fuller's literary productions; having done more to stem the torrent of Socinianism in this country, than any one book of late years. It consists of a series of letters, each occupying a particular subject, and the whole forming an octavo volume. The book was well received by the public, and will long maintain its ground.

Towards the close of 1796, another Baptist congregation at Kettering, over which, to that period, Mr. Satchel had presided, requested to be incorporated with the church under Mr. Fuller's care, and such union became mutually satisfactory and advantageous. The writings of Mr. Fuller having circulated in America, and having been generally approved, the college at New Jersey conferred on him the title of Doctor of Divinity; but which, supposing it to be incompatible with the simplicity of the Christian character, he declined to use. In 1792, the Baptist Missionary Society was first established at Kettering, by Mr. Fuller and a few of his friends, among whom was Mr. W. Carey of Leicester, who volunteered his services as a missionary. India was selected as the country which they should visit; and, in the spring of 1793, Mr. Carey and other missionaries set sail for Bengal, where they arrived in the succeeding October. In the establishment of that society, Mr. Fuller had taken the liveliest interest, and he was appointed to the situation of secretary. The society, ever afterwards, was inseparable from his mind, and depended, under God, mainly on his exertions. The consultations which he held, the correspondence he maintained, the personal solicitations which he employed, the contributions he collected, the management of these and other funds, the selection, probation, and improvement of intended missionaries; the works which he composed and compiled on these subjects, the discourses he delivered, and the journeys he accomplished, to extend the knowledge, and to promote the welfare of the mission, required energy almost unequalled. In 1799 he made a tour through Scotland for the benefit of the society; and on his return home, he found that he had travelled nine hundred miles, and collected full 900*l*. In 1804 he visited the Baptist congregations throughout Ireland, and collected a considerable sum for the mission. The state of the Baptist congregations gave him, however, great uneasiness; and he afterwards published "Remarks on the State of the Baptist Churches in Ireland." In July, 1805, he made another tour through Scotland, to collect for the printing of the Scriptures in the Eastern languages, and travelled one thousand eight hundred miles in one month, preached every day, and collected 1800*l*. In 1807 he drew up a statement of the proceedings of the society; and in fine, the history of the last twenty-three years of his life was completely identified with that of the mission. Besides the publications already mentioned, Mr. Fuller was the author of a great number of treatises on various subjects, which, since his decease, have been collected and printed in eight volumes, octavo; among which we may particularly mention, "Expository Discourses on the Books of Genesis and the Apocalypse," two vols. 8vo.; "Sermons on Various Subjects;" "The Gospel its own Witness;" "Memoirs of Mr. Samuel Pearce, of Birmingham;" "Apology for Christian Missions to the Heathen;" with many other smaller pieces, which will be found in his works. All his writings discover a clear, solid, and profound judgment, great strength of mind, acuteness of discrimination, and a decided attachment to the doctrine of rich, free, and sovereign grace; add to which, that he was animated by fervent zeal in behalf of the best interests of mankind, in promoting which he was indeed "in labours more abundant."

Notwithstanding the general excellence of the health of Mr. Fuller, he was subject to an affection of the liver, which gradually impaired his health and injured his constitution. In September, 1814, he was attacked by an inflammation of that organ; and from such attack he did not completely recover. In the month of December he visited London, but by the journey his complaint was increased; and during the spring of 1815, his disorder gradually progressed. At length, on the 7th of May, 1815, in the sixty-second year of his age, this zealous, intelligent, benevolent, and pious Christian minister expired; his heart being devoted to God, and his soul resting on Christ alone for salvation and eternal happiness.

FUNERAL RITES, ceremonies accompanying the interment or burial of any person.

The first people who seem to have paid any attention to their dead were the Egyptians. They took great care in embalming their bodies, and building proper repositories for them. This gave birth to those wonders of the world, the Egyptian pyramids. On the death of any person among them, the parents and friends put on mournful habits, and abstained from all banquets and entertainments. This mourning lasted from forty to seventy days, during which time they embalmed the body. Before the dead were allowed to be deposited in the tomb, they underwent a solemn judgment. If any one stepped forth, accused them, and proved that the deceased had led an evil life, the judges pronounced sentence, and the body was precluded from burial. Even their sovereigns underwent this judicature; and Diodorus Siculus asserts, that many kings had been deprived of the honours of burial, and that the terrors of such a fate had a salutary influence on the virtue of their kings.

The funeral rites among the Hebrews were solemn and magnificent. The relations and friends rent their clothes; and it was usual to bend the dead person's thumb into the hand, and fasten it in that posture with a string, because the thumb then having the figure of the name of God, they thought the devil would not approach it. They made a funeral oration at the grave, after which they prayed; then, turning the face of the deceased towards heaven, they said, "Go in peace."

The Greeks used to put a piece of money into the mouth of the deceased, which was thought to be the fare over the infernal river; they abstained from banquets; tore, cut, or shaved their hair; sometimes throwing themselves on the ground, and rolling in the dust; beating their breasts, and even tearing their flesh with their nails.

The funeral rites among the Romans were very numerous. They kept the deceased seven days, and washed him every day with hot water, and sometimes with oil, if possibly he might be revived, in case he were only in a slumber; and every now and then his friends meeting, made a horrible shout with the same view; but if they found he did not revive, he was dressed and embalmed with a performance of a variety of singular ceremonies, and at last brought to the funeral pile, and burnt; after which his ashes were gathered, inclosed in an urn, and deposited in the sepulchre or tomb.

The ancient Christians testified their abhorrence of the pagan custom of burning their dead, and always deposited the body entire in the ground; and it was usual to bestow the honour of embalming upon the martyrs, at least, if not upon others. They prepared the body for burial by washing it with water, and dressing it in funeral attire. This was performed by near relations, or persons of such dignity as the circumstances of the deceased required. Psalmody, or singing of psalms, was the great ceremony used in all funeral processions among the ancient Christians.

In the Romish church, when a person is dead, they wash the body, and put a crucifix in his hand. At the feet stands a vessel of holy water, and a sprinkler, that they who come in may sprinkle both themselves and the deceased. In the meantime some priest stands by the corpse, and prays for the deceased till it is laid in the earth. In the funeral procession the exorcist walks first, carrying the holy water: next the cross bearer; afterwards the rest of the clergy; and, last of all, the officiating priest. They all sing the miserere, and some other psalms; and at the end of each psalm a requiem. It is said that the faces of deceased laymen must be turned towards the altar when they are placed in the church, and those of the clergy towards the people. The corpse is placed in the church, surrounded with lighted tapers. After the office for the dead, mass is said; then the officiating priest sprinkles the corpse thrice with holy water, and as often throws incense on it. The body being laid in the grave, the friends and the relations of the deceased sprinkle the grave with holy water.

The funeral ceremonies of the Greek church are much the same with those of the Latin. It needs only to be observed, that, after the funeral service, they kiss the crucifix, and salute the mouth and forehead of the deceased; after which, each of the company eats a bit of bread, and drinks a glass of wine in the church, wishing the soul a good repose, and the afflicted family all consolation. Bingham's Antiq., b. 2; *Enc. FUTURE STATE, a term made use of in relation to the existence of the soul after death. That there is such a state of existence, we have every reason to believe; "for if we suppose," says a good writer, "the events of this life to have no reference to another, the whole state of man becomes not only inexplicable, but contradictory and inconsistent. The powers of the inferior animals are perfectly suited to their station. They know nothing higher than their present condition. In gratifying their appetites, they fulfil their destiny, and pass away.—Man, alone, comes forth to act a part which carries no meaning, and tends to no end. Endowed with capacities which extend far beyond his present sphere, fitted by his rational nature for running the race of immortality, he is stopped short in the very entrance of his course. He squanders his activity on pursuits which he discerns to be vain. He languishes for knowledge which is placed beyond his reach. He thirsts after a happiness which he is doomed never to enjoy. He sees and laments the disasters of his state, and yet, upon this supposition, can find nothing to remedy them. Has the eternal God any pleasure in sporting himself with such a scene of misery and folly as this life (if it had no connexion with another) must exhibit to his eye? Did he call into existence this magnificent universe, adorn it with so much beauty and splendour, and surround it with those glorious luminaries which we behold in the heavens, only that some generations of mortal men might arise to behold these wonders, and then disappear for ever? How unsuitable in this case were the habitation to the wretched inhabitant! How inconsistent the commencement of his being, and the mighty preparation of his powers and faculties, with his despicable end! How contradictory, in fine, were every thing which concerns the state of man, to the wisdom and perfection of his Maker!"

But that there is such a state is clear from many passages of the New Testament: John v. 24; Acts vii. 9; Rom. viii. 10, 11; 2 Cor. v. 1, 2; Phil. i. 21; 1 Thess. iv. 14; 1 Thess. v. 10; Luke xvi. 22, &c. But though these texts prove the point, yet some have doubted whether there be any where in the Old Testament any reference to a future state at all. The case, it is said, appears to be this: the Mosaic covenant contained no promises directly relating to a future state; probably, as Dr. Warburton asserts, and argues at large, because Moses was secure of an equal providence, and therefore needed not subsidiary sanctions taken from a future state, without the belief of which the doctrine of an universal providence cannot ordinarily be vindicated, nor the general sanctions of religion secured. But, in opposition to this sentiment, as Doddridge observes, "it is evident that good men, even before Moses, were animated by views of a future state, Heb. xi. 13, 16, as he himself plainly was, 24th to 26th verse; and that the promises of heavenly felicity were contained even in the covenant made with Abraham, which the Mosaic could not disannul. Succeeding providences also confirmed the natural arguments in its favour, as every remarkable interposition would do; and when general promises were made to the obedient, and an equal providence relating to the nation established on national conformity to the Mosaic institution, and not merely to the general precepts of virtue; as such an equal providence would necessarily involve many of the best men in national ruin, at a time when, by preserving their integrity in the midst of general apostasy, their virtue was most conspicuous; such good men, in such a state, would have vast additional reasons for expecting future rewards, beyond what could arise from principles common to the rest of mankind; so that we cannot wonder that we find in the writings of the prophets many strong expressions of such an expectation, particularly Gen. xlix. 18; Ps. xvi. 9 to 11; Ps. xvii. last verse; Ps. lxxiii. 17, 27; Eccl. iii. 15, 16, &c.; Eccl. vii. 12, 15; Is. iii. 10, 11; Ezek. xviii. 19, 21; Job xix. 23, 37; Dan. xii. 2; Is. xxxv. 8; xxvi. 19. The same thing may also be inferred from the particular promises made to Daniel, Dan. xii. 13; to Zerubabel, Hag. ii. 23; and to Joshua, the high priest, Zech. iii. 7; as well as from those historical facts recorded in the Old Testament of the murder of Abel, the translation of Enoch and Elijah, the death of Moses, and the story of the witch of Endor, and from what is said of the appearance of angels to, and their converse with, good men." GAIANITE, a denomination which derived its name from Gaian, a bishop of Alexandria, in the sixth century, who denied that Jesus Christ, after the hypostatical union, was subject to any of the infirmities of human nature.

GALILEAN, a name of reproach first given to our Saviour and his disciples by the Jews, and afterwards liberally used by the pagans. Julian the Apostate constantly employed it, and wished to have it established as the legal name by which the Christians should be designated. The Redeemer he called "the Galilean God," and with his dying breath thus gave vent to his rage, while forced to acknowledge his power: νενικηκας Γαλιλαι: "O Galilean, thou hast overcome!"

GALILEANS, a sect of the Jews which arose in Judea some years after the birth of our Saviour. They sprang from one Judas, a native of Gaulam, in Upper Galilee, upon the occasion of Augustus appointing the people to be mustered, which they looked upon as an instance of servitude which all true Israelites ought to oppose. They pretended that God alone should be owned as master and lord, and in other respects were of the opinion of the Pharisees; but as they judged it unlawful to pray for infidel princes, they separated themselves from the rest of the Jews, and performed their sacrifices apart. As our Saviour and his apostles were of Galilee, they were suspected to be of the sect of the Galileans; and it was on this principle, as St. Jerome observes, that the Pharisees laid a snare for him, asking, Whether it were lawful to give tribute to Caesar? that in case he denied it, they might have an occasion of accusing him.

GENERAL CALL. See CALLING.

GENERATION, ETERNAL, is a term used as descriptive of the Father's communicating the Divine Nature to the Son. The Father is said by some divines to have produced the Word, or Son, from all eternity, by way of generation; on which occasion the word generation raises a peculiar idea: that procession which is really effected in the way of understanding, is called generation, because, in virtue thereof, the Word becomes like to Him from whom he takes the original; or, as St. Paul expresses it, the figure or image of his substance; i.e. of his being and nature. And hence it is, they say, that the second person is called the Son; and that in such a way and manner as never any other was, is, or can be, because of his own divine nature, he being the true, proper, and natural Son of God, begotten by him before all worlds. Thus, he is called his own Son, Rom. viii. 3, his only begotten Son, John iii. 16. Many have attempted to explain the manner of this generation by different similitudes; but as they throw little or no light upon the subject, we shall not trouble the reader with them. Most modern divines believe that the term Son of God refers to Christ as mediator; and that his sonship does not lie in his divine or human nature separately considered, but in the union of both in one person. See Luke i. 35; Matt. iv. 3; John i. 49; Matt. xvi. 16; Acts ix. 20. 22; Rom. i. 4. It is observed, that it is impossible that a nature properly divine should be begotten, since begetting, whatever idea is annexed to it, must signify some kind of production, derivation, and inferiority; consequently, that whatever is produced must have a beginning, and whatever had a beginning was not from eternity, as Christ is said to be, Col. i. 16. 17. That the sonship of Christ respects him as mediator, will be evident, if we compare John x. 30, with John xiv. 28. In the former it is said, "I and my Father are one;" in the latter, "My Father is greater than I." These declarations, however opposite they seem, equally respect him as he is the Son; but if his sonship primarily and properly signify the generation of his divine nature, it will be difficult, if not impossible, according to that scheme, to make them harmonize. Considered as a distinct person in the Godhead, without respect to his office as mediator, it is impossible that, in the same view, he should be both equal and inferior to his Father. Again, he expressly tells us himself, that "the Son can do nothing of himself; that the Father sheweth him all things that he doth; and that he giveth him to have life in himself." John v. 19. 20. 26. Which expressions, if applied to him as God, not as mediator, will reduce us to the disagreeable necessity of subscribing either to the creed of Arius, and maintain him to be God of an inferior nature, and thus a plurality of Gods, or of embracing the doctrine of Socinus, who allows him only to be a God by office. But if this title belong to him as mediator, every difficulty is removed. And, lastly, it is observed, that though Jesus be God, and the attributes of eternal existence ascribed to him, yet the two attributes, eternal and son, are not once expressed in the same text as referring to eternal generation. This dogma, held by systematic divines, according to which our Lord was the Son of God, with respect to his divine nature, by communication from the Father, who on this account is called πηγή θεότητος, the Fountain of Deity, is of considerable antiquity. It was customary for the fathers, after the council of Nice, to speak of the Father as ἀγεννητος, and to ascribe to him what they termed generatio activa; and of the Son as γεννητος, to whom they attributed generatio passiva. According to them it was the essential property of the Father eternally to have the divine nature of or from himself, so that, with respect to him, it was underived; whereas it was the property of the Son to be eternally begotten of the Father, and thus to derive his essence from him. To this mode of representing the relations of these two persons of the Trinity, as it respects their essence, it has justly been objected, that it necessarily goes to subvert the supreme and eternal Deity of the Son, and to represent him as essentially derived and inferior; a doctrine nowhere taught in the Scriptures. Some prefer saying that it was not the divine nature that was communicated to the Son, but only distinct personality; but this can scarcely be said to relieve the difficulty. In regard to this and all similar subjects, the safest way is to abstain from all metaphysical subtleties, and rest satisfied with the biblical mode of representation. That Christ is the Son of God in a sense perfectly unique, and that he was from eternity God, are truths which the Scripture clearly teach, but wherein, in that sense, his filiation consisted, is a subject on which they are entirely silent. Every attempt to explain it has only furnished a fresh instance of darkening counsel by words without knowledge. See article Son of God; Owen on the Person of Christ; Pearson on the Creed; Ridgley's Body of Divinity, p. 73. 76, 3d edition; Gill's Dito, p. 205, vol. i. 8vo edition; Lambert's Sermons, ser. 13, text John xi. 35; Hodson's Essay on the Eternal Filiation of the Son of God; Watts's Works, vol. v. p. 77. GENEROSITY, the disposition which prompts us to bestow favours which are not the purchase of any particular merit. It is different from humanity. Humanity is that exquisite feeling we possess in relation to others, so as to grieve for their sufferings, resent their injuries, or rejoice at their prosperity; and as it arises from sympathy, it requires no great self-denial, or self-command; but generosity is that by which we are led to prefer some other person to ourselves, and to sacrifice any interest of our own to the interest of another. Generosity is peculiarly amiable when it is spontaneous and unsolicited—when it is disinterested—and when, in the distribution of its benefits, it consults the best season and manner of conferring them.

GENIUS, a good or evil spirit or demon, who, the ancients supposed, was set over each person to direct his birth, accompany him in his life, and to be his guard.

GENTILE, in matters of religion, a Pagan, or worshipper of false gods. The origin of this word is deduced from the Jews, who called all those who were not of their name גוֹיִם gojim, i. e. gentes, which in the Greek translations of the Old Testament is rendered ἔθνη, in which sense it frequently occurs in the New Testament; as in Matt. vi. 32, "All these things the nations or Gentiles seek." Whence the Latin church also used gentes in the same sense as our Gentiles, especially in the New Testament. But the word gentes soon got another signification, and no longer meant all such as were not Jews, but those only who were neither Jews nor Christians, but followed the superstitions of the Greeks and Romans, &c. In this sense it continued among the Christian writers, till their manner of speech, together with their religion, was publicly, and by authority, received in the empire, when gentiles, from gentes, came into use; and the both words had two significations: viz. in treatises or laws concerning religion, they signified Pagans, neither Jews nor Christians; and in civil affairs they are used for all such as were not Romans. See HEATHEN, PAGANISM.

GENTLENESS, softness or mildness of disposition and behaviour. Little as this disposition is thought of by many, we find it considered in Scripture as a characteristic of the true Christian. "The wisdom that is from above," saith St. James, "is gentle," chap. iii. 17. "This gentleness, indeed, is to be distinguished from passive tameness of spirit, and from unlimited compliance with the manners of others. That passive tameness, which submits without a struggle to every encroachment of the violent and assuming, forms no part of Christian duty; but, on the contrary, is destructive of general happiness and order. That unlimited complaisance, which on every occasion falls in with the opinions and manners of others, is so far from being a virtue, that it is itself a vice, and the parent of many vices. It overthrows all steadiness of principle, and produces that sinful conformity with the world which taints the whole character. In the present corrupted state of human manners, always to assent and to comply is the very worst maxim we can adopt. True gentleness, therefore, is to be carefully distinguished from the mean spirit of cowards and the fawning assent of sycophants. It renounces no just right from fear; it gives up no important truth from flattery: it is, indeed, not only consistent with a firm mind, but it necessarily requires a manly spirit and fixed principle, in order to give it any real value. It stands opposed to harshness and severity, to pride and arrogance, to violence and oppression: it is properly that part of charity which makes us unwilling to give pain to any of our brethren. Compassion prompts us to relieve their wants; forbearance prevents us from retaliating their injuries; meekness restrains our angry passions; candour our severe judgments; but gentleness corrects whatever is offensive in our manner, and, by a constant train of humane attentions, studies to alleviate the burden of common misery."

GENUFLEXION, the act of bowing or bending the knee, or rather of kneeling down. The Jesuit Rosweyd, in his Onomasticon, shows that genuflexion, or kneeling, has been a very ancient custom in the church, and even under the Old Testament dispensation; and that this practice was observed throughout all the year, excepting on Sundays, and during the time from Easter to Whitsuntide, when kneeling was forbidden by the council of Nice. Others have shown that the custom of not kneeling on Sundays had obtained from the time of the apostles, as appears from St. Irenæus and Tertullian; and the Ethiopic church, scrupulously attached to the ancient ceremonies, still retains that of not kneeling at divine service. The Russians esteem it an indecent posture to worship God on the knees. The Jews usually prayed standing. Baronius is of opinion that genuflexion was not established in the year of Christ 58, from that passage in Acts xx. 36, where St. Paul is expressly mentioned to kneel down at prayer; but Saurin shows that nothing can be thence concluded. The same author remarks, also, that the primitive Christians carried the practice of genuflexion so far, that some of them had worn cavities in the floor where they prayed; and St. Jerome relates of St. James, that he had contracted a hardness on his knees equal to that of camels.

GESENIUS, WILLIAM, a celebrated orientalist and biblical critic, was born 1786, at Nordhausen, where his father, who was known as a respectable medical writer, was engaged in the practice of his profession. He was educated at the gymnasium of his native town, and at the universities of Helmstädt and Göttingen. His attention, however, was almost exclusively devoted to the study of the Oriental languages; and the necessity which he soon perceived of a better grammar and lexicon of the Hebrew language, led him to devote himself entirely to this, and to the study of the Old Testament. This he did during a three years' residence at Göttingen, as Magister legendi and lecturer on theology, from 1806 to 1809, when he made preparations for his Hebrew lexicon. In 1809 he was appointed by the government of Westphalia, professor of ancient literature in the Catholic and Protestant gymnasium at Heiligenstadt; afterwards, in 1810, extraordinary, and in 1811, ordinary professor of theology at Halle. Here he attracted particular attention to the study of the Old Testament; and remaining after the restoration of the university in 1814, as Doctor of Theology, he wrote his Commentary on the origin, character, and authority of the Samaritan Pentateuch, which will always be regarded as a model in investigations of such a nature. In the summer of 1820, he made a scientific tour to Paris and Oxford, where he prepared collections in the Semitic languages, for lexicographical purposes, and also took a copy of the Ethiopian book of Enoch, with a view to future publication. In 1810 and 1812 appeared his Hebrew and German Lexicon, in two volumes; and in 1815 an abridgment of the same, a translation of which, by Mr. Gibbs, of Andover, has been published, both in America and England. The chief peculiarities of these valuable works are a just estimation of, and thorough examination of, all the sources of lexicography, a correct apprehension of the relation between the Hebrew and its cognate languages, a complete statement and explanation of the constructions and phrases which are derived from each word; a clear distinction between what belongs to the province of the lexicon, the grammar, and the exegetical commentary respectively, and attention to the various kinds of diction. Some excellent remarks, which have had no small effect in the dissemination of right views upon these subjects, are to be found in the prefaces to the lexicon. His version of Isaiah, with a commentary, is one of the ablest critical works that have ever appeared, but unfortunately the neological views of the author have deeply tinged many parts of his exposition, especially such as relate to the prophecies respecting the Messiah. The last twenty-six chapters of the book he considers to have been written, not by Isaiah, but by some later author, an hypothesis which has been refuted by several writers, but by none more ably than by Hengstenberg, in his Old Testament Christology. Making deductions for these serious faults, it may nevertheless be asserted, that more philological, historical, and antiquarian research is to be found in this work than in any other commentary on the Scriptures. The celebrity which Gesenius acquired by these labours has attracted a vast number of students to Halle, where he and Wegscheider take the lead of the supernaturalist party, and have for a time given eclat and currency to their principles; but of late their popularity as theologians has begun to decline, and the students are taught to discriminate between the speculating unbelieving philologist, and the profound, consistent, and pious divine.

GICHTEL, JOHN GEORGE, a mystic and fanatic, born at Ratisbon in 1638. In his sixteenth year he pretended to have divine visions and revelations; he afterwards went to Holland, where he attended to certain religious exercises, with a view to fit himself for the duties of a missionary in America. After enduring several persecutions in Germany, the result of the disturbances created by his doctrines, and suffering considerable opposition from a number of his followers, who withdrew from him that support for which he was entirely dependent on them, he died at Amsterdam in 1710. He wrote several works, which were published by himself or his disciples, who called themselves the Angelic Brethren. These works have recently been drawn forth from oblivion, and are held in great esteem by the present mystics of Germany.

GHOST, HOLY. See HOLY GHOST.

GIFT OF TONGUES, an ability given to the apostles of readily and intelligibly speaking a variety of languages which they had never learnt. This was a most glorious and important attestation of the Gospel, as well as a suitable, and, indeed, in their circumstances, a necessary furniture for the mission for which the apostles and their assistants were designed. Nor is there any reason, with Dr. Middleton, to understand it as merely an occasional gift, so that a person might speak a language most fluently one hour, and be entirely ignorant of it in the next; which neither agrees with what is said of the abuse of it, nor would have been sufficient to answer the end proposed. See Acts ii. See Gill and Henry in loc.; Jortin's Remarks, vol. i. p. 15—21; Essay on the Gift of Tongues; Middleton's Miscel. Works, vol. ii. p. 379; Doddridge's Lect. lect. 141; Henderson's Lectures on Inspiration, pp. 215—233.

GILBERTINES, a religious order; thus called from St. Gilbert, of Sempringham, in the county of Lincoln, who founded the same about the year 1148; the monks of which observed the rule of St. Augustine, and were accounted canons, and the nuns that of St. Benedict. The founder of this order erected a double monastery, or rather two different ones, contiguous to each other; the one for men, the other for women, but parted by a very high wall. St. Gilbert himself founded thirteen monasteries of this order: viz. four for men alone, and nine for men and women together, which had in them 700 brethren, and 1500 sisters. At the dissolution, there were about twenty-five houses of this order in England and Wales.

GILL, JOHN, D.D., was born the 23rd of November, 1697, at Kettering, in Northamptonshire, where his father was deacon of the Baptist church. He made rapid advances in classical learning at a neighbouring grammar school, in which he was placed while very young; and even then he resorted so frequently to a bookseller's, for the purpose of reading, that it became proverbial to say that a thing was as certain as that John Gill was in the bookseller's shop. Being driven from the grammar school, by the bigotry of the clergyman who presided over it, his friends endeavoured to procure him admission into a seminary for the ministry, by sending specimens of his advancement in different branches of literature. These, however, defeated their object, for they produced the following answer: "He is too young, and should he continue, as it might be expected he would, to make such rapid advances, he would go through the common circle before he would be capable of taking care of himself, or of being employed in any public service." It is to be hoped that this reply was accompanied with some explanation, which made it appear more justifiable than in its present detached state; or it would seem that the guardians of this seminary felt but little solicitude to see the finest talents consecrated to the noblest of causes. Not discouraged by this repulse, young Gill pursued his studies with so much ardour, that before he was nineteen, he had read the principal Greek and Latin classics; had gone through a course of logic, rhetoric, natural and moral philosophy; and acquired a considerable knowledge of the Hebrew tongue. But it is supremely gratifying to find that religion was still dearer to him than learning; for, instead of resembling those sciolists who suppose it a proof of genius to disdain the study of their Maker's will, he imitated him who, in early youth, resorted to the temple as his father's house, and there employed in sacred researches that understanding at which all were astonished. The Baptist church in his native town first received this extraordinary youth as a member, and then called him forth into the ministry. For this work he went to study under Mr. Davies, at Higham Ferrers; but was soon invited to preach to the Baptist congregation in Horsleydown near London, over which he was ordained in 1719, when he was in his twenty-second year. He now applied with intense ardour to oriental literature; and having contracted an acquaintance with one of the most learned of the Jewish rabbies, he read the Targums, the Talmud, and every book of rabbinical lore which he could procure. In this line, it is said that he had but few equals, and that he was not excelled by any whose name is recorded in the annals of literature. Having published, in 1748, "A Commentary on the New Testament," in three folio volumes, the immense reading and learning which it displayed induced the University of Aberdeen to send him the diploma of Doctor of Divinity, with the following compliment: "On account of his knowledge of the Scriptures, of the oriental languages, and of Jewish antiquities; of his learned defence of the Scriptures against deists and infidels, and the reputation gained by his other works, the university had, without his privacy, unanimously agreed to confer on him the degree of Doctor in Divinity." He published also "A Commentary on the Old Testament," which, together with that of the New, forms an immense mass of nine folio volumes, in which, however, the sacred text is frequently completely travestied by his spiritualization of the history; and his systematic views of theology are given in their length and breadth under every remarkable text. There is not perhaps, within the whole compass of theological literature, a work so awfully calculated to vitiate the scripture taste of a student, and unfit him for ministering with profit in the church of God. Its almost only recommendation is the quantity of Jewish, and especially of Rabbinical, learning with which it is stored; from which a flower may now and then be culled to illustrate the meaning of the sacred writers. At the close of this Herculean labour, he was so far from resting satisfied, that he said, "I considered with myself what would be next best to engage in, for the further instruction of the people under my care, and my thoughts led me to enter upon a scheme of doctrinal and practical divinity;" this he executed in three quarto volumes. Amidst these labours of the study, added to those of the pulpit, he lived to a good old age, and departed to his rest in the year 1771, when he was far advanced in his 74th year. He was married, and had a numerous family, but his wife died seven years before him; and he was survived by only two of his children. Besides the works already mentioned, he maintained the five points of Calvinism in his "Cause of God and Truth," with much temper and learning. He published also "A Dissertation on the Hebrew Language;" "Discourses on the Canticles," to which considerable objections have been made; and many sermons, as well as smaller controversial pieces. His private character was so excellent, that it has been said, "his learning and labours were exceeded only by the invariable sanctity of his life and conversation. From his childhood to his entrance on the ministry, and from his entrance on the ministry to the moment of his dissolution, not one of his most inveterate opposers was ever able to charge him with the least shadow of immorality. Those who had the honour and happiness of being admitted into the number of his friends can say, they know that his moral demeanour was, from first to last, more than blameless, it was exemplary." As a divine, he was a supralapsarian Calvinist; but in his Body of Divinity, he is so far from condemning sublapsarian sentiments as heretical, or Arminianised, that he attempts to show how the two systems coalesce. He discovered, however, an anxiety to support his high scheme at every opportunity, and often betrayed his weakness, by catching at the shadows of arguments for its defence. He read much, and wrote tolerably well on every subject; however, it cannot be denied, that while he possessed knowledge, his learning was not inspired by genius; and while his works impress the judicious reader with esteem for the purity of his intentions, and admiration for the magnitude of his labours, they excite regret that they had not been prepared with greater delicacy of taste, and revised with more accurate judgment. It is, above all, to be lamented, that they have diffused a taste for extravagant Calvinism, which has induced many, who were devoid of his sanctity, to profane his name, in order to sanction their errors or their lusts. Dr. Gill was, nevertheless, a great and good man; and his character is highly esteemed by every well-informed Christian. Vide Memoirs of Dr. Gill, Jones's Christ. Biog.

GLAS, JOHN, the father of Scotch independency, and founder of a denomination which is called after him—though in England better known by the term Sandemanians—was born on the 21st of September, 1695, in the parish of Auchtermuchty, in the county of Fife, North Britain. His father, Alexander Glas, was a minister of the Kirk of Scotland, as were also his grandfather, and great-grandfather; the latter having been appointed the first Presbyterian minister at Dunkeld, about the time of the Reformation. John Glas, the subject of this memoir, acquired the knowledge of Latin and Greek at the grammar school of Perth; and his parents, intending him for the clerical profession, afterwards sent him to St. Andrew's and Edinburgh, where he perfected his studies in philosophy and theology. Having gone through the preliminary course of trial prescribed to candidates for the ministry in the Church of Scotland, he was licensed to preach, by the presbytery of Perth; and in 1719, ordained minister of the parish of Tealing, near Dundee.

Mr. Glas had studied, with great diligence and care, the doctrinal systems of Calvin and Arminius; and being decidedly fixed in the former, he held forth the doctrine of rich, free, and sovereign grace, with extraordinary ability, from the pulpit; and his fame as a preacher soon spread abroad, and drew numbers to hear him. When he had been a few years engaged in the work of the ministry, he found his labours blessed to the profit of many; and several, who had received the truth in the love of it, began to feel the necessity of a closer union, in order to attain the ends of mutual edification, than the discipline and communion of a national church afforded. These persons accordingly formed themselves into a small society, in connexion with Mr. Glas, in 1725, thus constituting a church within a church; a mode of proceeding which, however opposite to the New Testament, evangelical ministers in national churches have often found it expedient to resort unto. In this way Mr. Glas and his friends proceeded for two years; when an extraordinary stir being made in Scotland, about the duty of covenanting, Mr. Glas was put upon the task of investigating this subject, and of bringing it to the touchstone of the New Testament. The result of his inquiries was the publication of a small volume, which made its first appearance in 1729, under the title of "The Testimony of the King of Martyrs concerning his Kingdom;" being an explanation and illustration of Christ's good confession before Pontius Pilate. John xviii. 36, 37. He was now brought to this point; that, as the kingdom of Christ is not of this world, it must be distinguished from all those kingdoms which are of it, by some fundamental principles and characteristic qualities: in short, that if it were not of this world, it must be spiritual in its nature, and heavenly in its origin—its laws and institutions, its object and end must, consequently, all be totally different from what pertains to worldly kingdoms; and that every attempt to incorporate it with civil polity, or support it by acts of parliament, or the sword of the magistrate, could be nothing less than a vile corruption of a divine institute. The adoption of this principle gave an entire new turn to many of his religious sentiments; and convinced him that he could no longer officiate, with a good conscience, as a clergyman of the national establishment. The avowal and propagation of his sentiments, both from the pulpit and the press, occasioned his being cited before the synod of Angus and Mearns, by which he was speedily deposed; and the sentence being afterwards confirmed by the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, he became the first dissenter in Scotland, upon independent and scriptural principles.

Mr. Glas now took up his residence in Dundee, where he was the means of collecting a church, which was formed on congregational principles, and of which he was chosen a presbyter, in conjunction with Mr. Francis Archibald, who had left the Church of Scotland at the same time as himself. From this period Mr. Glas was busily engaged for several years in maintaining his principles against a host of opponents who rose up in rapid succession to defend those of the National Establishment. By the spirit of inquiry thus set on foot, the profession spread rapidly throughout Scotland, and the formation of churches in the various towns of Dunkeld, Perth, Edinburgh, Glasgow, &c. &c. found abundant employment for Mr. Glas for a number of years. He removed his residence from Dundee to Edinburgh, where he officiated several years as the pastor of a church which had been collected there; and when his labours were no longer required there, he removed to Perth, where he laboured with assiduity till the year 1737; when, having established the profession in that city, he again returned to Dundee, where he continued his labours in his Master's vineyard to the termination of his useful life, November the 2nd, 1773, at the advanced age of seventy-eight. He had fifteen children, all by the same mother, whom he lost in 1749; and it is remarkable that he survived all his children. Besides his "Testimony of the King of Martyrs," he published a great number of different treatises, of which a uniform edition was printed in five volumes octavo, Perth, 1782. Some of them are exceedingly valuable, on account of the rich savour of evangelical doctrine with which they are imbued; particularly a "Treatise on the Lord's Supper"—"A Plea for pure and undefiled Religion"—"A view of the Heresy of Ærius," &c. &c. As a preacher, Mr. Glas is said to have greatly excelled, which cannot, however, be truly said of him as an author; for his style is unusually heavy, involved, and, were it not for the general excellency of his sentiments, would scarcely be endured in the present age of refinement. He confesses himself to have been considerably indebted to Dr. John Owen; and he admits Calvin to have been "a great divine and excellent writer, no way equalled by those who show the greatest contempt of him in comparison of the ancients."—*Jones's Christ. GLORY, praise or honour, attributed to God, in adoration, or worship. The state of felicity prepared for the righteous. See HEAVEN.

The glory of God is the manifestation of the divine perfections in creation, providence, and grace. We may be said to give glory to God when we confess our sins, when we love him supremely, when we commit ourselves to him, are zealous in his service, improve our talents, walk humbly, thankfully, and cheerfully before him, and recommend, proclaim, or set forth his excellences to others. Jos. vii. 19; Gal. ii. 20; John xv. 8; Ps. l. 23; Matt. v. 16.

GLOSSARIUM, in biblical literature, is a book or writing comprehending glosses or short explanations of dark and difficult words or phrases in the inspired writings or the Greek authors. Among the Greeks γλωσσα meant either an idiomatic word, peculiar to a certain dialect only, and unknown in others, an obsolete word, or an obscure one. A glossary, of course, extends only to a few of the words and phrases of an author. It is not to be used as a lexicon, but as a comment on particular passages. Its value depends on its antiquity, or on the learning of its author. The principal ancient glossaries published are these: Hesychius, Suidas, Phavorinus, Cyrill, Photius, Etymologicon Magnum.

GNOSIMACHI, a name which distinguished those in the seventh century who were professed enemies to the Gnosis; i. e. the studied knowledge or science of Christianity, which they rested wholly on good works, calling it a useless labour to seek for knowledge in the Scripture. In short, they contended for the practice of morality in all simplicity, and blamed those who aimed at improving and perfecting it by a deeper knowledge and insight into the doctrines and mysteries of religion. The Gnosimachi were the very reverse of the Gnostics.

GNOSTICS (from γνωσις, knowledge,) ancient heretics, famous from the first rise of Christianity, principally in the East. It appears, from several passages of Scripture, particularly 1 John ii. 18; 1 Tim. vi. 20; Col. ii. 8, that many persons were infected with the Gnostic heresy in the first century, though the sect did not render itself conspicuous, either for numbers or reputation, before the time of Adrian, when some writers erroneously date its rise. The name was adopted by this sect, on the presumption that they were the only persons who had the true knowledge of Christianity. Accordingly they looked on all other Christians as simple, ignorant, and barbarous persons, who explained and interpreted the sacred writings in a low, literal, and unedifying signification. At first, the gnostics were the only philosophers of those times, who formed for themselves a peculiar system of theology, agreeable to the philosophy of Pythagoras and Plato; to which they accommodated all their interpretations of Scripture. But gnostics afterwards became a generical name, comprehending divers sects and parties of heretics, who rose in the first centuries; and who, though they differed among themselves as to circumstances, yet all agreed on some common principles. They corrupted the doctrine of the gospel by a profane mixture of the tenets of the oriental philosophy, concerning the origin of evil and the creation of the world, with its divine truths. Such were the Valentinians, Simoniens, Carpocratians, Nicolaitans, &c.

Gnostics sometimes also occurs in a good sense, in the ancient ecclesiastical writers, particularly Clemens Alexandrinus, who, in the person of his gnostic, describes the characters and qualities of a perfect Christian. This point he labours in the seventh Book of his "Stromata," where he shows that none but the gnostic, or learned person, has any true religion. He affirms that, were it possible for the knowledge of God to be separated from eternal salvation, the gnostic would make no scruple to choose the knowledge; and that if God would promise him impunity in doing of any thing he has once spoken against, or offer him heaven on those terms, he would never alter a whit of his measures. In this sense the father uses gnostics, in opposition to the heretics of the same name; affirming, that the true gnostic is grown old in the study of the holy Scriptures, and that he preserves the orthodox doctrine of the apostles and of the church; whereas the false gnostic abandons all the apostolical traditions, as imagining himself wiser than the apostles.

Gnostics was sometimes also more particularly used for the successors of the Nicolaitans and Carpocratians, in the second century, upon their laying aside the names of the first authors. Such as would be thoroughly acquainted with all their doctrines, reveries, and visions, may consult Irenæus, Tertullian, Clemens Alexandrinus, Origen, and Epiphanius; particularly the first of these writers, who relates their sentiments at large, and confutes them. Indeed he dwells more on the Valentinians than any other sect of gnostics; but he shows the general principles whereon all their mistaken opinions were founded, and the method they followed in explaining scripture. He accuses them of introducing into religion certain vain and ridiculous genealogies, i. e. a kind of divine processions or emanations, which had no other foundation but in their own wild imagination. The gnostics confessed that these æons or emanations were nowhere expressly delivered in the sacred writings; but insisted that Jesus Christ had intimated them in parables to such as could understand them. They built their theology not only on the gospels and the epistles of St. Paul, but also on the law of Moses and the prophets. These last were peculiarly serviceable to them, on account of the allegories and allusions with which they abound, which are capable of different interpretations; though their doctrine concerning the creation of the world by one or more inferior beings of an evil or imperfect nature, led them to deny the divine authority of the books of the Old Testament, which contradicted this idle fiction, and filled them with an abhorrence of Moses and the religion he taught; alleging that he was actuated by the malignant author of this world, who consulted his own glory and authority, and not the real advantage of men. Their persuasion that evil resided in matter, as its centre and source, made them treat the body with contempt, discourage marriage, and reject the doctrine of the resurrection of the body, and its reunion with the immortal spirit. Their notion, that malevolent genii presided in nature, and occasioned diseases and calamities, wars and desolations, induced them to apply themselves to the study of magic, in order to weaken the powers, or suspend the influence of these malignant agents. The gnostics considered Jesus Christ as the Son of God, and inferior to the Father, who came into the world for the rescue and happiness of miserable mortals, oppressed by matter and evil beings; but they rejected our Lord's humanity, on the principle that every thing corporeal is essentially and intrinsically evil; and therefore the greatest part of them denied the reality of his sufferings. They set a great value on the beginning of the Gospel of St. John, where they fancied they saw a great deal of their æons, or emanations, under the terms the word, the life, the light, &c. They divided all nature into three kinds of beings, viz. hylic, or material; psychic, or animal; and pneumatic, or spiritual. On the like principle, they also distinguished three sorts of men; material, animal, and spiritual. The first, who were material, and incapable of knowledge, inevitably perished, both soul and body; the third, such as the gnostics themselves pretended to be, were all certainly saved; the psychic, or animal, who were the middle between the other two, were capable either of being saved or damned, according to their good or evil actions. With regard to their moral doctrines and conduct, they were much divided. The greatest part of this sect adopted very austere rules of life, recommended rigorous abstinence, and prescribed severe bodily mortifications, with a view of purifying and exalting the mind. However, some maintained that there was no moral difference in human actions; and thus confounding right with wrong, they gave a loose rein to all the passions, and asserted the innocence of following blindly all their motions, and of living by their tumultuous dictates. They supported their opinions and practice by various authorities: some referred to fictitious and apocryphal writings of Adam, Abraham, Zoroaster, Christ, and his apostles; others boasted that they had deduced their sentiments from secret doctrines of Christ, concealed from the vulgar; others affirmed that they arrived at superior degrees of wisdom by an innate vigour of mind; and others asserted that they were instructed in these mysterious parts of theological science by Theudas, a disciple of Paul, and by Matthias, one of the friends of our Lord. The tenets of the ancient gnostics were revived in Spain, in the fourth century, by a sect called the Priscillianists. At length the name gnostic, which originally was glorious, became infamous, by the idle opinions and dissolute lives of the persons who bore it.

God, the self-existent, infinitely perfect, and infinitely good Being who created and preserves all things that have existence. The name is derived from the Icelandic Godi, which signifies the Supreme Magistrate, and is thus strikingly characteristic of Jehovah as the moral Governor of the universe. As the Divine Being possesses a nature far beyond the comprehension of any of his creatures, of course that nature is inexplicable. "All our knowledge of invisible objects is obtained by analogy; that is, by the resemblance which they bear to visible objects; but as there is in nature no exact resemblance of the nature of God, an attempt to explain the divine nature is absurd and impracticable. All similitudes, therefore, which are used in attempting to explain it, must be rejected." Yet, though we cannot fully understand his nature, there is something of him we may know. He hath been pleased to discover his perfections, in a measure, by the works of creation and the Scriptures of truth; these, therefore, we ought to study, in order that we may obtain the most becoming thoughts of him. For an account of the various attributes or perfections of God, the reader is referred to those articles in this work.

There are various names given to the Almighty in the Scriptures, though, properly speaking, he can have no name; for as he is incomprehensible, he is not nominable; and being but one, he has no need of a name to distinguish him; nevertheless, as names are given him in Scripture, to assist our ideas of his greatness and perfection, they are worthy of our consideration. These names are El, which denotes him the strong and powerful God, Gen. xvii. 1; Eloah and Elohim, which represent him as the only proper object of worship, Psal. xlv. 6, 7; Shaddai, which denotes him to be all-sufficient and all-mighty, Exod. vi. 3; Elyon, which represents his incomparable excellency, absolute supremacy over all, and his peculiar residence in the highest heavens, Psal. l. 11; Adonai, which marks him as the great lord, and judge of all creatures, Psal. cx. 1; Jah, which denotes his self-existence, and giving of being to his creatures, Exod. xv. 2; Ehjah, I am, or I will be, denotes his self-existence, absolute independency, immutable eternity, and all-sufficiency to his people, Exod. iii. 14; Jehovah, which denotes his self-existence, absolute independency, unsuccessive eternity, and his effectual and marvellous giving of being to his creatures, and fulfilling his promises, Gen. ii. 4, &c.

In the New Testament, God is called Kurios, or Lord, which denotes his self-existence, and his establishment of, and authority over, all things; and Theos, which represents him as the maker, pervader, and governing observer of the universe.

GODFATHERS AND GODMOTHERS, among Catholics and Episcopalians, persons who, at the baptism of infants, answer for their future conduct, and solemnly promise that they will renounce the devil and all his works, and follow a life of piety and virtue; and by these means lay themselves under an indispensable obligation to instruct them, and watch over their conduct. In the Catholic Church, the number of Godfathers and Godmothers is reduced to two; in the Church of England, to three: formerly the number was not limited.

GODLINESS, strictly taken, is right worship or devotion; but in general it imports the whole of practical religion, 1 Tim. iv. 8. 2 Pet. i. 6. It is difficult, as Saurin observes, to include an adequate idea of it in what is called a definition. "It supposes knowledge, veneration, affection, dependence, submission, gratitude, and obedience; or it may be reduced to these four ideas; knowledge in the mind, by which it is distinguished from the visions of the superstitious; rectitude in the conscience, that distinguishes it from hypocrisy; sacrifice in the life, or renunciation of the world, by which it is distinguished from the unmeaning obedience of him who goes as a happy constitution leads him; and, lastly, zeal in the heart, which differs from the languishing emotions of the lukewarm." The advantages of this disposition are honour, peace, safety, usefulness, support in death, and prospect of glory; or, as the apostle sums up all in a few words, "It is profitable unto all things, having the promise of the life that now is, and of that which is to come." 1 Tim. iv. 8. Saurin's Sermon, vol. v. ser. 3, Engl. trans.: Barrow's

Works, vol. i. p. 9; Scott's Christian Life; Scougal's Life of God in the Soul of Man.

GOEL (Heb. גֹּאֵל), among the Hebrews, one whose right and duty it was to avenge the blood of his relation, but who was not allowed to break in upon the security of an asylum or city of refuge.

GOG AND MAGOG, symbolical names, supposed to apply to the heathen nations of northern Asia, more particularly the Tartars and Mongolians, which the Arabic and other oriental writers term Yajuj and Majuj. They occur in Ezek. xxxviii. and xxxix., and in Rev. xx.

GOOD, in general, is whatever increases pleasure, or diminishes pain in us; or, which amounts to the same, whatever is able to procure or preserve to us the possession of agreeable sensations, and remove those of an opposite nature. Moral good denotes the right conduct of the several senses and passions, or their just proportion and accommodation to their respective objects and relations.

Physical good is that which has either generally, or for any particular end, such qualities as are expected or desired.

GOOD FRIDAY, a fast kept by many in memory of the sufferings and death of Jesus Christ. It is observed on the Friday in Passion Week, and it is called, by way of eminence, good; because of the good effects of our Saviour's sufferings. Among the Saxons it was called Long Friday; but for what reason does not appear, except on account of the long offices then used. The Protestants on the continent consider this day as the most solemn in the whole year; by the Catholics, however, it is only celebrated as a half holiday.

GOODNESS OF GOD relates to the absolute perfection of his own nature, and his kindness manifested to his creatures. Goodness, says Dr. Gill, is essential to God, without which he would not be God, Exod. xxxiii. 19, xxxiv. 6, 7. Goodness belongs only to God, he is solely good, Matt. xix. 17; and all the goodness found in creatures is only an emanation of the divine goodness. He is the chief good; the sum and substance of all felicity, Pa. cxliv. 12, 15; lxiii. 25; iv. 6, 7. There is nothing but goodness in God, and nothing but goodness comes from him, 1 John i. 5; James i. 13, 14. He is infinitely good; finite minds cannot comprehend his goodness, Rom. xi. 35, 36. He is immutably and unchangeably good, Zeph. iii. 17. The goodness of God is communicative and diffusive, Pa. cxix. 68; xxxiii. 5. With respect to the objects of it, it may be considered as general and special. His general goodness is seen in all his creatures: yea, in the inanimate creation, the sun, the earth, and all his works; and in the government, support, and protection of the world at large, Pa. xxxvi. 6; cxlv. His special goodness relates to angels and saints. To angels, in creating, confirming, and making them what they are. To saints, in election, calling, justification, adoption, sanctification, perseverance, and eternal glorification. Gill's Body of Div., vol. i. p. 133, 8vo. ed.; Charnock's Works, vol. i. p. 574; Paley's Nat. Theol., ch. 26; South's admirable Sermon, on this subject, vol. viii. ser. 3; Tillotson's Sermon, ser. 143—146; Abernethy's Sermon, vol. i. No. 2.

GOSPEL, the revelation of the grace of God to fallen man through the Mediator. It is taken also for the history of the life, actions, death, resurrection, ascension, and doctrine of Jesus Christ. The word is compounded of the two Saxon words—god, “good,” and spell, a “message,” or “tidings,” and thus corresponds to the Greek εὐαγγέλιον, which signifies a joyful message, or good news. It is called the Gospel of his grace, because it flows from his free love, Acts xx. 24. The Gospel of the kingdom, as it treats of the kingdom of grace and glory. The Gospel of Christ, because he is the author and subject of it, Rom. i. 16. The Gospel of peace and salvation, as it promotes our present comfort, and leads to eternal glory, Eph. i. 13; vi. 15. The glorious Gospel, as in it the glorious perfections of Jehovah are displayed, 2 Cor. iv. 4. The everlasting Gospel, as it was designed from eternity, is permanent in time, and the effects of it are eternal, Rev. xiv. 6. There are about thirty or forty apocryphal Gospels—as the Gospel of St. Peter, of St. Andrew, of St. Barnabas, the eternal Gospel, &c. &c. &c.; but they were never received by the Christian Church, being evidently fabulous and trifling. See CHRISTIANITY.

GOSPEL, A LAW. It has been disputed whether the Gospel consists merely of promises, or whether it can in any sense be called a law. The answer plainly depends upon adjusting the meaning of the words Gospel and law: if the Gospel be taken for the declaration God has made to men by Christ, concerning the manner in which he will treat them, and the conduct he expects from them, it is plain that this includes commands, and even threatenings, as well as promises; but to define the Gospel so, as only to express the favourable part of that declaration, is indeed taking the question for granted, and confining the word to a sense much less extensive than it often has in Scripture: compare Rom. ii. 16; 2 Thess. i. 8; 1 Tim. i. 10, 11; and it is certain, that, if the Gospel be put for all the parts of the dispensation taken in connexion one with another, it may well be called, on the whole, a good message. In like manner the question, whether the Gospel be a law or not, is to be determined by the definition of the law and of the Gospel, as above. If law signifies, as it generally does, the discovery of the will of a superior, teaching what he requires of those under his government, with the intimation of his intention of dispensing rewards and punishments, as this rule of their conduct is observed or neglected; in this latitude of expression it is plain, from the proposition, that the Gospel, taken for the declaration made to men by Christ, is a law, as in Scripture it is sometimes called, James i. 25; Rom. iv. 15; Rom. viii. 2. But if law be taken, in the greatest rigour of the expression, for such a discovery of the will of God, and our duty, as to contain in it no intimation of our obtaining the Divine favour otherwise than by a perfect and universal conformity to it, in that sense the Gospel is not a law. See NEONOMIANS. Witsius on Cov. vol. iii. ch. 1; Doddridge's Lectures, lect. 172; Watts's Orthodoxy and Charity, essay 2.

GOSPEL CALL. See CALLING.

GOVERNMENT OF GOD is the disposal of his creatures, and all events, relative to them, according to his infinite justice, power, and wisdom. His moral government is his rendering to every man according to his actions, considered as good or evil. See DOMINION and SOVEREIGNTY.

GRACE. There are various senses in which this word is used in Scripture; but the general idea of it, as it relates to God, is his free favour and love. As it respects men, it implies the happy state of reconciliation and favour with God wherein they stand, and the holy endowments, qualities, or habits of faith, hope, love, &c., which they possess. Divines have distinguished grace into common or general, special or particular. Common grace, if it may be so called, is what all men have; as the light of nature and reason, convictions of conscience, &c., Rom. ii. 4; 1 Tim. iv. 10. Special grace is that which is peculiar to some people only—such as electing, redeeming, justifying, pardoning, adopting, establishing, and sanctifying grace, Rom. viii. 30. This special grace is by some distinguished into imputed and inherent. Imputed grace consists in the holiness, obedience, and righteousness of Christ, imputed to us for our justification; inherent grace is what is wrought in the heart by the Spirit of God in regeneration. Grace is also said to be irresistible, efficacious, and victorious; not but that there are in human nature, in the first moments of conviction, some struggles, opposition, or conflict; but by these terms we are to understand, that, in the end, victory declares for the grace of the Gospel. There have been many other distinctions of grace; but as they are of too frivolous a nature, and are now obsolete, they need not a place here. Growth in grace is the progress we make in the divine life. It discovers itself by an increase of spiritual light and knowledge; by our renouncing self, and depending more upon Christ; by growing more spiritual in duties; by being more humble, submissive, and thankful; by rising superior to the corruptions of our nature, and finding the power of sin more weakened in us; by being less attached to the world, and possessing more of a heavenly disposition. M'Laurin's Essays, essay 3; Gill's Body of Div. vol. i. p. 118; Doddridge's Lect. part viii. prop. 139; Pike and Hayward's Cases of Conscience; Saurin on 1 Cor. ix. 26, 27, vol. iv.; Booth's Reign of Grace.

GRACE AT MEALS, a short prayer, imploring the Divine blessing on our food, and expressive of gratitude to God for supplying our necessities. The propriety of this act is evident from the Divine command, 1 Thess. v. 18; 1 Cor. x. 31; 1 Tim. iv. 5. From the conduct of Christ, Mark viii. 6, 7. From reason itself; not to mention that it is a custom practised by most nations, and even not neglected by heathens themselves. The English, however, seem to be very deficient in this duty.

As to the manner in which it ought to be performed, as Dr. Watts observes, we ought to have a due regard to the occasion, and the persons present; the neglect of which hath been attended with indecencies and indiscretions. Some have used themselves to mutter a few words with so low a voice, as though by some secret charm they were to consecrate the food alone, and there was no need of the rest to join with them in the petitions. Others have broke out into so violent a sound, as though they were bound to make a thousand people hear them. Some perform this part of worship with so slight and familiar an air, as though they had no sense of the great God to whom they speak; others have put on an unnatural solemnity, and changed their natural voice into so different and awkward a tone, not without some distortions of countenance, that have tempted strangers to ridicule.

It is the custom of some to hurry over a single sentence or two, and they have done, before half the company are prepared to lift up a thought to heaven. And some have been just heard to bespeak a blessing on the church and the king, but seem to have forgot they were asking God to bless their food, or giving thanks for the food they have received. Others, again, make a long prayer, and, among a multitude of other petitions, do not utter one that relates to the table before them.

The general rules of prudence, together with a due observation of the custom of the place where we live, would correct all these disorders, and teach us that a few sentences suited to the occasion, spoken with an audible and proper voice, are sufficient for this purpose, especially if any strangers are present. It does not appear from Scripture, that it was customary to give thanks after meals. This is always spoken of as having been done before them. Watts's Works, oct. edition, vol.

iv. p. 160; Lau's Serious Call, p. 60; Steel's Post. Ser., p. 174.

GRATITUDE is that pleasant affection of the mind which arises from a sense of favours received, and by which the possessor is excited to make all the returns of love and service in his power. "Gratitude," says Mr. Cogan. (in his Treatise on the Passions,) "is the powerful re-action of a well-disposed mind upon whom benevolence has conferred some important good. It is mostly connected with an impressive sense of the amiable disposition of the person by whom the benefit is conferred, and it immediately produces a personal affection towards him. We shall not wonder at the peculiar strength and energy of this affection, when we consider that it is compounded of love placed upon the good communicated, affection for the donor, and joy at the reception. Thus it has goodness for its object, and the most pleasing, perhaps unexpected, exertions of goodness for its immediate cause. Thankfulness refers to verbal expressions of gratitude." See THANKFULNESS.

GREATNESS OF GOD is the infinite glory and excellency of all his perfections. His greatness appears by the attributes he possesses, Deut. xxxii. 3, 4; the works he hath made, Ps. xix. 1; by the awful and benign providences he displays, Ps. xcvi. 1, 2; the great effects he produces by his word, Gen. i.; the constant energy he manifests in the existence and support of all his creatures, Ps. cxlv.; and the everlasting provision of glory made for his people, 1 Thess. iv. 17. This greatness is of himself, and not derived, Ps. xxi. 13; it is infinite, Ps. cxlv. 3; not diminished by exertion, but will always remain the same, Mal. iii. 6. The considerations of his greatness should excite veneration, Ps. lxxxix. 7; admiration, Jer. ix. 6, 7; humility, Job xlii. 5, 6; dependence, Is. xxvi. 4; submission, Job i. 22; obedience, Deut. iv. 39, 40. See ATTRIBUTES, and books under that article.

GREEK OF THE NEW TESTAMENT. The character of the New Testament diction, although pretty definitely marked, was for a long time mistaken, or was only imperfectly and partially understood by biblical philologists, and has been the subject of much dispute. From the time of Henry Stephens (1576), down to the middle of last century, two parties existed among the interpreters of the New Testament; the one of which laboured to show that the diction of the New Testament is in all respects conformed to the style of the Attic Greek writers; while the other maintained, on the contrary, and supposed themselves able to prove, from every verse, that the style was altogether mixed with Hebraisms, and came very far short of the ancient classic Greek in respect to purity. Though latterly the former of these positions has been shown to be inadmissible, yet it was not till quite lately that the imperfect notions of those who maintained the latter began to be felt, and the spirit of the New Testament diction came to be more deeply investigated.

In the age which succeeded that of Alexander the Great, the Greek language underwent an internal change of a double nature. In part a prosaic language of books was formed (ἡ κοινὴ διάλεκτος), which was built on the Attic dialect, but was intermixed with not a few provincialisms; and partly a language of popular intercourse was formed, in which the various dialects of the different Grecian tribes, heretofore separate, were more or less mingled together; while the Macedonian dialect was peculiarly prominent. The latter language constitutes the basis of the diction employed by the LXX, the writers of the Apocrypha, and the New Testament. This popular Greek dialect was not spoken and written by the Jews, without some foreign intermixtures. They particularly introduced many idioms, and the general complexion of their vernacular language. Hence arose a Judizing Greek dialect. The basis of this dialect consists of the peculiarities of the later Greek, but in the use of all the parts of speech, the Hebrew idioms and modes of construction are combined with them.

GREEK CHURCH. See CHURCH, GREEK.

GREEKS, UNITED, certain Greek congregations in Italy, Hungary, Gallicia, Poland, and Lithuania, which have acknowledged the supremacy of the pope, and are in communion with the Church of Rome. Many of these again separated in the year 1839, and are now in communion with the Greek Church. They are also to be found in some other parts of the East, but in comparatively small numbers.

GROTIUS, HUGO. This eminent and learned man was born on the 10th of April, in the year 1583, at Delft, in Holland. From his infancy his disposition was mild and amiable; and nature bestowed on him the inestimable blessing of a sound judgment, united to a wonderful memory. At the very early age of eight years, he composed some elegiac verses. His father and mother, wishing to make him a good rather than a great man, instilled into his young and tender mind those precepts of piety and wisdom for which, in maturer years, he never ceased to love and thank them. They gave him an excellent education, and placed him under the care of a clever and judicious preceptor, of the name of Lussion. The death of this good man was a circumstance much and deservedly lamented by Grotius, who possessed a mind and heart capable of estimating true virtue and piety. He was next placed under the care of a celebrated clergyman, who resided at the Hague, till he was twelve years of age, when his parents sent him to the famous University of Leyden, to perfect himself in his studies. There he continued three years with the learned Francis Junius, who was so kind as to superintend his behaviour; and the famous Joseph Scaliger, then the ornament of the university, was so delighted with the talents which he discovered Grotius to possess, that he took upon himself the pleasing task of directing his studies. In 1597 he maintained public theses in mathematics, philosophy, and law, with the highest applause. The reputation of young Grotius spread everywhere, and the learned spoke of him as a prodigy. So early as the year 1597, Isaac Pontanus spoke of him as a young man of the greatest hopes; and Meursius, in 1599, declared he had never seen his equal. At a very early age, Grotius formed plans which required great learning and study, and he executed them to such perfection, that the republic of letters was struck with astonishment. In 1598, Grotius went to France, when M. de Buzanval, who had been ambassador in Holland, introduced him to the king; and after having spent a twelvemonth in Paris, he returned to Holland. The celebrated M. de Thou, at that time the most learned man in France, took great notice of him, and a close and long correspondence ensued. In 1600, Grotius sent him the "Epithalamium" he had written on the marriage of King Henry IV. with Mary of Medicis, with which M. de Thou was much delighted, and considered the young author as one of the greatest men of the age. Grotius, who had resolved to follow the bar, pleaded his first cause at Delft, in the year 1599, on his return from France. The study of law and poetry employed one part of his time, while he spent the other in preparing his works for the press. John Grotius had put into his son's hands a manuscript of Capella. Hugo showed it to Scaliger, and this learned man advised him to study that author, and publish a new edition of him. Though Grotius was but then fourteen, the difficulty of the undertaking did not discourage him; he read for it, and at length acquitted himself of the task enjoined on him, with such ability and success, that the literati of the age were astonished. In the following year, Grotius published a work, which is known by the name of "The Phenomena of Aratus," which is a most learned work, containing the Phenomena of Aratus, in Greek, with Cicero's Latin interpretation; the places where Cicero's translation is wanting being supplied. This learned work he dedicated to the States of Holland and West Friesland. Scaliger, M. de Thou, and Lipsius, speak of this edition with the highest praise. Lipsius, in thanking Grotius for his Aratus, says, that notwithstanding his childhood, he looks on him as his friend; and congratulated him that, though so very young, he had, by force of genius and labour, accomplished what few could do in the flower of their age.

In 1603, Grotius was made Advocate-General, which office he did not at all like, though he did infinite honour to it. His brilliant success at the bar, however, procured him a very considerable promotion. In July, 1608, he married Mary Reigesberg, whose highest encomium was, that she was worthy of Grotius for her husband. The most perfect harmony subsisted between them, and Grotius held her in the highest esteem. Grotius at that time began to enter into the affairs of the republic; and, by his anxiety to become serviceable to his country, he heaped coals of fire upon his own head. In the year 1608, while the truce between the Spaniards and the United Provinces was negotiating, Arminius and Gomarus were at issue on some doctrinal points. The doctrine of Arminius was directly contrary to that of Calvin, and he was accused before the Synod of Rotterdam, in which the party of Gomarus prevailed. Arminius presented a petition to the States of Holland, requesting that the grand council would take cognizance of this dispute. His adversaries declared that a theological contest ought to be decided by a church judicature. Arminius's petition was, however, granted, and the magistrates promised to have the affair discussed in a synod. The dispute continued, and became daily more warm. Arminius, however, dying, Grotius wrote an eulogium in verse, and by that means offended Gomarus, though he did not enter into the nature of their disputes. The partisans of Arminius drew up a remonstrance, which they addressed to the state; and from that time were styled Remonstrants. This remonstrance not satisfying the Gomarists, they opposed to it a contra-remonstrance, which gained them the appellation of Contra-remonstrants. The disputes between the Arminians and the Gomarists were very vehement. Hence arose a grand contest, who ought to be judge in these matters. The Arminians declared for the civil magistrate, and the Gomarists for the power to be invested in the hands of the clergy. They accordingly separated from the Remonstrants; took possession of the churches by force; stirred up sedition; wrote libels; and deposed the Arminian ministers. It was at this time of confusion Grotius was nominated pensionary of Rotterdam, and was ordered to go to England. It was supposed he had instructions to get the king to favour the Arminians. On that subject he had several conferences with his majesty. On his return to Holland, he found the disturbances increased, and he was appointed to draw up an edict. This edict gave great offence. The Gomarists complained that it was too much in favour of the Arminians. The riots increased, and Grotius proposed to the States of Holland, that the magistrates should be empowered to raise troops for the security of the town. This step was the ruin of Grotius; and, after much more dispute, he, with some others, were arrested by the Prince of Orange, and were treated most cruelly. His wife drew up two petitions, to be allowed to reside with him, which, even though he was ill, was refused; and when he asked for some paper to make his defence, only half a sheet was allowed him. On the 18th of May, sentence was pronounced against him by the commissioners. In consequence of this sentence, the States-General ordered him to be carried from the Hague, to the fortress of Louvestein. His father asked permission to see him, but was denied; and his wife was only allowed to go to him, on condition that she never left him. Exile and captivity, far from being irksome to Grotius, was a pleasure. Study became his business and consolation. His time passed fast and pleasantly. He wrote much, and he always wrote well. He there composed, in Dutch verse, his most admirable treatise "On the Truth of the Christian Religion."

When Grotius had been confined eighteen months, his wife effected his escape by a chest: which, under pretence of carrying books, conveyed him to Goreum, to the house of David Dazelaers, a friend of Grotius, where the chest was opened, and its captive, dressed like a mason, stepped into a boat, which carried him to Valvic, in Brabant, where he arrived on the 22d of March, in the year 1621. His wife, during his absence, gave out that he was confined to his bed; but as soon as she heard that he was safe, she told the guards "that the bird had flown." They then confined her more closely; but, presenting a petition to the commandant, she was discharged. In 1621, Grotius arrived at Paris, where he wrote his "Apology," which he finished in 1622; and it was soon after translated into Latin. After having lived a year in that vicious metropolis, he retired to a seat of President de Memes, at Balagni, where he began his greatest work, which would alone be sufficient to immortalize his name, entitled a "Treatise of the Rights of War and Peace." In the year 1630 he finished the "Phœnissæ of Euripides," and dedicated it to the President de Memes. In May, 1634, Grotius arrived at Frankfort, and was received with great politeness by the high chancellor; who, after taking him to Mentz, proclaimed him counsellor to the queen of Sweden, and her ambassador at the court of France. Hugo Grotius died on the 28th of August, 1645. On his death, two medals were struck, one containing this just inscription, that he was "the Phœnix of his country, the oracle of Delft, the great genius, the light which enlighteneth the earth." Grotius was master of all that is worth knowing in sacred and profane literature. There was no art or science with which he was not acquainted. He possessed a clear head, an excellent judgment, universal learning, immense reading, and a sincere and unwavering love of truth and Christianity. In his annotations on the Old and New Testament he discovers his amazing store of classical erudition, and the acuteness of his critical tact. He adheres rigidly to the literal sense throughout, objects to the double sense of prophecy, is rather hostile to the application of the Old Testament revelation to the Messiah, and attaches too little importance to the peculiar doctrines of Christianity, many of which, indeed, he appears grossly to have misapprehended. It has been remarked by Professor Gausson, that while no commentators deserve to be preferred to Erasmus and Grotius, whoever makes use of their writings should be aware that "he is treading on fire overspread with faithless ashes." His Socinian perversions were ably exposed by Dr. Owen, in his "Vindiciæ Evangelicæ," and by Calovius, in his "Biblia Illustrata." Vide M. de Burigny's Life of Grotius; Jones's Christ. Biog.

GUARDIAN ANGEL. "Some," says Dr. Doddridge, "have thought, that not only every region but every man has some particular angel assigned him as a guardian, whose business it is generally to watch over that country or person; for this opinion they urge Matt. xviii. 10; Acts xii. 15. But the argument from both these places is evidently precarious; and it seems difficult to reconcile the supposition of such a continued attendance with what is said of the stated residence of these angels in heaven, and with Heb. i. 14, where all the angels are represented as ministering to the heirs of salvation: though, as there is great reason to believe the number of heavenly spirits is vastly superior to that of men upon earth, it is not improbable that they may, as it were, relieve each other, and in their turns perform these condescending services to those whom the Lord of Angels has been pleased to redeem with his own blood; but we must confess that our knowledge of the laws and orders of those celestial beings is very limited, and consequently that it is the part of humility to avoid dogmatical determinations on such heads as these. See ANGEL; and Doddridge's Lectures, lect. 212.

GUEBRES, or GAURS (i. e. infidels;) the name given to the fire-worshippers in Persia, who in India are called Parsees. They designate themselves Behendie, or followers of the true faith, and live chiefly in the deserts of Caramania, towards the Persian Gulf, and in the province of Yezd Keram, but are also found at Bombay, at Bachu on the western shore of the Caspian, and at Astrachan. They are but little known, but appear to be mild in their manners, temperate in their habits, and laborious cultivators of the ground. They are not prohibited the use of wine, and eat all kinds of meat. Divorce and polygamy are forbidden; only if a wife remain barren during the first nine years of marriage, the husband may take a second wife. They worship one Supreme Being, whom they call Yezd, or the Eternal Spirit. The sun, moon, and planets, they believe to be peopled with intelligent beings; they acknowledge light as the primitive cause of good, and regard darkness as that of evil; on which account they worship fire, though they themselves maintain that they do not render the worship to the material element itself, but to the pure and incomprehensible God, of whom it is the brightest and most appropriate image. With a view to the performance of this service, they keep a fire uninterruptedly burning on their holy places, the original of which, they maintain, was kindled by Zoroaster 4000 years ago. Their religious book is the Zenda-vesta, which see. One of the peculiarities of the Guebres is, that they do not bury their dead, but expose the bodies upon the towers of their temples, where they are devoured by birds. They observe which part the birds eat first, from which they judge of the fate of the deceased.

GUILT, the state of a person justly charged with a crime; a consciousness of having done amiss; liability to punishment. It is in this last acceptation the term is used in reference to original sin. We cannot be chargeable with the crime as Adam was, because we have not actually or personally committed it, as he did; but we are rendered liable to death in consequence of our connexion with him as our representative.

H.

HABADIM, a subdivision of the Jewish sect of Chasidim, founded by Rabbi Solomon, in the government of Mohilef. The name (Habadim) by which they are distinguished, is composed of the initial letters of the three Hebrew words, חכמה, בינה, דעה, "wisdom, intelligence, and knowledge." They may not improperly be termed the "Jewish Quietists," as their distinguishing peculiarity consists in the rejection of external forms, and the complete abandonment of the mind to abstraction and contemplation. Instead of the baptisms customary among the Jews, they go through the signs without the use of the element, and consider it their duty to disengage themselves as much as possible from matter, because of its tendency to clog the mind in its ascent to the supreme source of intelligence. In prayer they make no use of words, but simply place themselves in the attitude of supplication, and exercise themselves in mental ejaculations.

HABIT, a power and ability of doing any thing, acquired by frequent repetition of the same action. It is distinguished from custom. Custom respects the action; habit the actor. By custom we mean a frequent reiteration of the same act; and by habit the effect that custom has on the mind or body. "Man," as one observes, "is a bundle of habits. There are habits of industry, attention, vigilance, advertency; of a prompt obedience to the judgment occurring, or of yielding to the first impulse of passion; of apprehending, methodizing, reasoning; of vanity, melancholy, fretfulness, suspicion, covetousness, &c. In a word, there is not a quality or function, either of body or mind, which does not feel the influence of this great law of animated nature." To cure evil habits, we should be as early as we can in our application, principiis obsta; to cross and mortify the inclination by a frequent and obstinate practice of the contrary virtue. To form good habits, we should get our minds well stored with knowledge; associate with the wisest and best men; reflect much on the pleasure good habits are productive of; and, above all, supplicate the Divine Being for direction and assistance. Kaimes's El. of Crit. ch. xiv. vol. 1; *Græc's Mor. HADES, Ἅδης, from ἀ privative, and ἵδναι to see, signifying the invisible state, or the place of the departed, without reference either to their misery or bliss. The corresponding term in Hebrew is שְׁאוֹל Sheol, which is by many derived from the root שָׁאַל to demand, inquire; and either signifies the place with respect to which it may be asked, "Man giveth up the ghost, and where is he?" Job xiv. 10; or the insatiable receptacle which crieth, Give, give, and never saith, It is enough, Prov. xxx. 15, 16. Both words are used to express the state of the dead, in its most comprehensive point of view; comprising the grave as the invisible residence of the body, and the world of spirits as the invisible abode of the soul. At other times they are used, either of the one or the other, taken separately. They are often very improperly rendered hell in our common version; the instances being comparatively few in which the words have the signification of the place of punishment. In other passages the term grave is too limited a rendering. The reader must judge from the context, and all the circumstances of the case, in which acceptation the words are to be taken.

That the Hebrews ordinarily understood something beyond the grave by the term שְׁאוֹל Sheol, is evident from the circumstance, that the common name for that receptacle of the human body is קֶבֶר Keber; so that when in any given instance they did apply it in this sense, it was only designating a part for the whole. It was the state in which the aged patriarch expected to meet his deceased son, Gen. xxxvii. 35; into which the fathers had entered, and whither their posterity were removed at death to join their society. Gen. xxv. 8; xxxv. 29; xlix. 29. Deut. xxxii. 50. In all these passages, the being "gathered to one's people," is spoken of as something distinct from mere burial; and, indeed, in the cases of Abraham and Moses, it is obvious, that, in such a sense, no phrase can be more incongruous, since the former had no people in the cave of Machpelah, Sarah being the only individual who as yet had been buried in it; and of the grave of the latter, the children of Israel were profoundly ignorant. To his people he certainly was not gathered, if by the phrase he meant that his body was deposited in his family grave. It has justly been observed that ἅδης, and the corresponding Hebrew word Sheol are always singular in meaning as well as in form. The word for grave is often plural. The former never admits the possessive pronouns, being the receptacle of all the dead, and therefore incapable of appropriation to individuals; the latter frequently does. Where the disposal of the body or corpse is spoken of, ταφος, or some equivalent term, is the name of its repository. When mention is made of the spirit after death, its abode is ἅδης.

With respect to the situation of Hades, it was conceived of by the Hebrews as well as the Pagans, as in the lower or interior parts of the earth, and answering in depth to the visible heavens in height. Hence the phrases,—deep as hades; to descend to hades, &c. For further information on this subject, see Campbell's Dissert. No. vi.

HADJEE, the title of a Mohammedan who performs a pilgrimage to Mecca; a religious act which every orthodox Mussulman is directed to do once in his life. It is also the name of the celebration which takes place on the arrival of the caravan of pilgrims at Mecca.

HAGIOGRAPHIA, (Gr. ἅγιος, holy, and γραφή, a writing,) the name given to the third division of the Jewish Scriptures, which comprises the book of Psalms, Proverbs, Job, Daniel, Ezra, Nehemiah, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, the Song of Solomon, Esther, and the Chronicles. In Hebrew this division is called כְּתוּבִים Kethubim, the "writings." These books appear to have received the name of "Sacred Writings," to intimate that, though they were not written by Moses, nor by any of the prophets, strictly so called, they were nevertheless to be received as of the same divine authority, having been written or added to the canon, under the influence of that Holy Spirit by whose inspiration the other books were composed.

HERETICO COMBURENDO, a writ which

anciently lay against a heretic, who having once been convicted of heresy by his bishop, and having abjured it, afterwards falling into it again, or into some other, is thereupon committed to the secular power. This writ is thought by some to be as ancient as the common law itself; however, the conviction of heresy by the common law was not in any petty ecclesiastical court, but before the archbishop himself, in a provincial synod, and the delinquent was delivered up to the king, to do with him as he pleased; so that the crown had a control over the spiritual power; but by 2 Henry IV. cap. 15, the diocesan alone, without the intervention of a synod, might convict of heretical tenets; and unless the convict abjured his opinions, or if after abjuration he relapsed, the sheriff was bound ex officio, if required by the bishop, to commit the unhappy victim to the flames without waiting for the consent of the crown. This writ remained in force, and was actually executed on two Anabaptists, in the seventh of Elizabeth, and on two Arians in the ninth of James I. Sir Edward Coke was of opinion that this writ did not lie in his time, but it was now formally taken away by statute 29 Car. II. cap. 9. But this statute does not extend to take away or abridge the jurisdiction of Protestant archbishops, or bishops, or any other judges of any ecclesiastical courts, in cases of atheism, blasphemy, heresy, or schism; but they may prove and punish the same, according to his Majesty's ecclesiastical laws, by excommunication, deprivation, degradation, and other ecclesiastical censures, not extending to death, in such sort and no other, as they might have done before the making of this act.

HALF-WAY COVENANT, a scheme adopted by the Congregational Churches of New England, in 1657-1662, in order to extend the privileges of church membership and infant baptism beyond the pale of actual communion at the Lord's Supper. It justly caused a great agitation in the New England Colonies; for, according to its arrangements, persons who confessedly had not given their hearts to God, were encouraged to present their children for baptism, at which time they made the most solemn of all public professions. The consequence of its adoption was, that, in many places, the churches came to consist of unregenerate persons. It is, however, now universally abandoned by the Evangelical or Orthodox Churches, and is only found among the Unitarians.

HALLELUJAH, Hebrew הללו יהוה "Praise ye the Lord." In Greek Ἀλληλούια. The ancient writers of the Christian church make frequent mention of singing the Allelujah, by which they sometimes mean the repetition of that single word, which they did, in imitation of the heavenly host, singing and repeating Allelujah, Rev. xix. Sometimes they mean one of those Psalms which are called Alleluatic Psalms, because they had the word Allelujah prefixed to them; such as the cxlv. and those that follow, to the end. The singing Allelujah was a sort of invitational, or call to each other, to praise the Lord. Anciently there was no dispute about the lawfulness of using the hymn itself, but there was some difference about the times of using it. St. Austin tells us, that in some churches it was sung only on Easter-day, and the fifty days of Pentecost. But in other churches it was used at other times also. Sozomen assures us that, in the Roman church, it was sung only on Easter-day; and that from thence it was the common form of an oath among the Romans, as they hoped to live to sing Allelujah on that day. But even in those churches, where it was most in use, there were some exceptions in point of time and season; for, according to St. Austin, it was never used in the time of Lent. The fourth Council of Toledo forbids the singing it, not only during Lent, but on other days of fasting. In the same council the Allelujah is mentioned under the name of Laudes, and appointed to be sung after the reading of the Gospel. It was also sung at funerals, as St. Jerome acquaints us in his epitaph of Fabiola, where he speaks of the whole multitude singing psalms together, and making the golden roof of the church shake with echoing forth the Allelujah. In the second Council of Tours, it is appointed to be sung immediately after the Psalms, both at Matins and Vespers. St. Jerome says, it was used even in private devotion, and that the ploughman at his labour sung Allelujahs. It was likewise the signal, or call, among the monks, to their ecclesiastical assemblies. The ancient church always preserved the Hebrew word; and so did the Church of England in her first Liturgy, though now they say, "Praise ye the Lord," with a response of the people, "The Lord's name be praised."

The word as occurring in the Psalms, has been retained in many versions, and is often employed in hymns, probably on account of its full and fine sound, which, together with its simple and solemn meaning, so proper for public religious services, has rendered it a favourite of musical composers. Its vowels are very favourable for a singer.

The Jews call the Psalms cxiii. to cxvii. the Great Hallel, because they celebrate the peculiar mercies of God towards the Jews, and they are sung at the feast of the Passover, and that of Tabernacles.

HALYBURTON, THOMAS, Professor of Divinity in the University of St. Andrew's, was born at Duplin, in the parish of Aberdalgy, near Perth, December the 25th, 1674. His father, formerly minister of that parish, was ejected, with about three hundred others, for nonconformity. Both his parents were emineutely pious. In 1682 his father died, in the fifty-fifth year of his age; and the care of the son's morals and education devolved on his excellent mother. Never was the importance of the union of piety and literature in the maternal character more fully developed than in this instance. But for this the world might never have heard, nor the church have felt, the benefit of the talents and Christian virtues of an Halyburton. This excellent woman was the mother of eleven children, out of which number she followed nine to the grave at a very early age. In addition to her other trials, she was driven, by the rage of persecution, to seek an asylum in Holland, for herself and children, two of which only were now left to her—the subject of the present sketch, and her eldest daughter, who was married. While on his voyage to Holland, he speaks in his Memoirs, of various convictions arising in his mind, in times of real or apprehended danger, but acknowledges, at the same time, that he knew nothing of acceptance and communion with God; and attributes his concern of mind to a mixture of natural fear, and a selfish desire of preservation from supposed danger. He made resolutions in the storm, which subsided with the winds; and corruption, that had been dammed in for a little, having forced down the temporary mounds which were raised against it, broke its way with increased violence and force. Having reached land, and fixed at Rotterdam, he was, by the care of his mother, placed within reach of the most valuable instructions of one of the suffering ministers. In the month of February, 1687, King James issued his proclamations for indulgence; when most of those who had fled returned home, and his mother and family amongst them. During the voyage, they were in imminent danger of shipwreck, but providentially escaped. This danger, being sudden, left little impression on Halyburton's mind. He took up his abode with his mother, at Perth, till 1690 or 1691. Being placed under good scholastic discipline, he made considerable proficiency. But religion as yet had made no effective impression on his mind, till towards the close of James's reign, when the fear of a massacre, or some sudden stroke from the papists, revived his concern for his eternal welfare. This was aided by evangelical instruction, increased knowledge, the seasons of sickness; and more especially by the state of public affairs. His fear of the daggers of the papists having ceased, through the battle of Killcrankie, fought June the 27th, 1689, his remaining difficulty was only with his convictions, which he could by no means effect for any considerable length of time together. He began to be perplexed respecting the evidences of revealed religion, till after having experienced some mental relief from Robert Bruce's "Fulfilling of the Scriptures," he received further relief from Mr. Donaldson, an excellent old minister, who came to preach at Perth, and paid a visit to his mother. He inquired of his young friend, if he sought a blessing from God on his learning; remarking at the same time, with an austere look, "Sirrah, unsanctified learning has done much mischief to the kirk of God." This led him to seek divine direction in extraordinary difficulties; but this exercise, he acknowledges, left him still afar off from God. In 1690 or 1691, his mother removed to Edinburgh, and placed him at Mr. Gavin Weir's school, where he remained (a short interval excepted) till November 1692, when he entered the college, under Mr. Alexander Cunningham. Here his convictions increased, chiefly through the means of sermons from the pulpit, and the private perusal of Shepherd's "Sincere Convert." His formal attention to the duties of the closet increased, but no solid peace was yet attained, till about this time, meeting with Clark's Martyrology, and being naturally fond of history, he read it with eager attention, and received many valuable impressions, which never left him. In May, 1693, he was advised, on his mother's account as well as his own, to seek a change of air, and he went to St. Andrew's, where he entered college. He was placed under the care of Mr. Thomas Taylor, a man of learning, and who was exceedingly kind to him. At St. Andrew's his regard for religion increased; and under the ministry of Mr. Thomas Forrester, he began to discover the more secret evils of his heart. He formed many good resolutions, and thought he had found peace; but it was a structure, which had for its foundation vows made, and sometimes fulfilled with apparent success, rather than the atonement of Christ. Having applied himself closely three years to the study of philosophy, he had thought of going abroad, in search of further improvement; but fear of the sea on the one hand, and the pressing solicitations of friends on the other, prevailed with him to engage as domestic chaplain in a nobleman's family. Accordingly, in August, 1696, he went to the Wemyes. Here he met with considerable difficulties, arising out of his prominent situation, and more especially from the debates into which he was drawn on the truth of religion.

In resorting to the works of Deists, with a view to meet their arguments, his own mind was much perplexed: but the valuable fruit of his study, in reference to others, may be seen in his admirable "Treatise on Deism," which most triumphantly refutes the principles of Lord Herbert, and other Deists, and will ever remain a standard work on the subject. Nor, in the issue, could he regret a research which taught him an humble submission to the dictates of divine revelation, notwithstanding at present he was the subject of the most distressing doubts. He represents his state of depression, during this conflict, as of a nature too grave to have been long sustained. But about the close of January, or beginning of February, 1698, he obtained from the Scriptures that salutary relief, which was no less necessary to his earthly existence, than to his spiritual peace. New light broke in upon his mind. From the doctrine of the cross he derived that consolation which he had in vain sought elsewhere, and that purity, which is connected, as a principle, with the religion of Christ. His heart was expanded towards others, and for many days together, he says, he seemed admitted into the very "secret of the divine pavilion." The most overwhelming sense of his own worthlessness pervaded his mind, and his feelings of reverence for God were unusually exalted; his joy he states to have been "truly unspeakable, and full of glory." So much was he raised above earth, that he could scarcely bend his mind to the perusal of any works but those of a devotional cast. His views of the enormity of sin, he says, grew clearer as he advanced in holiness; his contrition under it became more pungent, and his desire after freedom from its influence more ardent. "All his former doubts, respecting the being of a God, vanished in the clear light of an evangelical faith; and he had a witness to the existence of a Being of infinite love and purity in the internal satisfaction and holiness of his heart. The bulky arguments, that appeared as mountains, shook at the presence of the Lord, and were carried into the midst of the sea." The authenticity of the Scriptures, which he had previously disputed, and which could be removed neither by personal investigation nor by reading the works of others, now received sufficient proof in the discoveries which they had enabled him to make of his own guilt—of the being, attributes, and purposes of God—and the transforming, quickening, supporting, and reviving influences which they had conveyed to his own mind. In short, reason now became entirely the disciple of revelation, and the thoughts of entering the ministry, which he had previously laid aside, on account of the wavering state of his mind, now returned, and in April or May, 1698, two ministers, from the presbytery of Kirkaldy, visited him, and pressed him to enter on trial for the ministry. He objected his want of reading, of a knowledge of language, &c., but after repeated solicitations he complied, and was licensed by them to preach, June the 22nd, 1699. He was appointed minister of Cens parish, May the 1st, 1700. Within a few years after his settlement at Cens, his health began to fail; and at length his indisposition so much increased, that with great difficulty he went through the labours incident to so large a parish. In April, 1710, he was appointed, by patent from Queen Anne, professor of divinity in the new college of St. Andrew's, through the mediation of the Synod of Fife, and delivered his inaugural oration in confutation of an atheistical pamphlet, entitled "Epistola Archimedis ad Regem Gelonenem." In April, 1711, he was seized with a dangerous pleurisy. This disease was removed, but he never fully recovered his former strength; and, on the 23rd of September, 1712, he departed triumphantly to his eternal rest. His last words are among the richest treasures which piety ever bequeathed to the church; and the letters which he dictated on his dying bed, are specimens of his unparalleled devotion and concern for the welfare of others. He was singularly fitted for the schools; he spoke elegant Latin with fluency; he was well skilled in the Greek, but his sickness prevented the execution of his design to learn the oriental languages. Few lives have been more useful and distinguished by general piety; his death was a loss to Scotland and the world at large. His works, in addition to those already mentioned, consist of—"The great Concern of Salvation; in three parts, viz., A Discovery of Man's Natural State; or, the Guilty Sinner Convicted: Man's Recovery by Faith in Christ; or, the convinced Sinner's Case and Cure: The Christian's Duty, with respect to both personal and family Religion." Glasgow, octavo, 1770.—Ten Sermons, preached before and after the celebration of the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper; to which are added, Two Sermons, preached upon the occasion of the death of a friend. To these discourses is prefixed an excellent preface by Dr. Watts, highly expressive both of their own worth, and of their author's. There is also another, to the same purpose, by Mr. Thomas Black. Vide Life, written by himself. Jones's Christ. Biog.

HAPPINESS, absolutely taken, denotes the durable possession of perfect good, without any mixture of evil; or the enjoyment of pure pleasure unalloyed with pain, or a state in which all our wishes are satisfied; in which senses, happiness is only known by name on this earth. The word happy, when applied to any state or condition of human life, will admit of no positive definition, but is merely a relative term; that is, when we call a man happy, we mean that he is happier than some others with whom we compare him; or than the generality of others; or than he himself was in some other situation. Moralists justly observe, that happiness does not consist in the pleasures of sense; as eating, drinking, music, painting, theatrical exhibitions, &c. &c., for these pleasures continue but a little while, by repetition lose their relish, and by high expectation often bring disappointment. Nor does happiness consist in an exemption from labour, care, business, &c.; such a state being usually attended with depression of spirits, imaginary anxieties, and the whole train of hypochondriacal affections. Nor is it to be found in greatness, rank, or elevated stations, as matter of fact abundantly testifies; but happiness consists in the enjoyment of the Divine favour, a good conscience, and uniform conduct. In subordination to these, human happiness may be greatly promoted by the exercise of the social affections; the pursuit of some engaging end, the prudent constitution of the habits, and the enjoyment of our health. *Bolton and Lucas on Happiness; Henry's Pleasurableness of a Religious Life; Grove and Paley's Mor. HARMONY OF THE GOSPELS, a term made use of to denote the concurrence or agreement of the writings of the four Evangelists; or the history of the four Evangelists digested into one continued series. By this means each story or discourse is exhibited with all its concurrent circumstances; frequent repetitions are prevented, and a multitude of seeming oppositions reconciled. Among some of the most valuable harmonies, are those of Cradoek, Le Clerc, Docteur, Macknight, Norcome, and Townson's able Harmony on the concluding Part of the Gospels; Thompson's Dissertations. To the theological student Griesbach's Synopsis of the first three Gospels, in Greek, with the various readings, is invaluable. The term harmony is also used in reference to the agreement which the Gospel bears to natural religion, the Old Testament, the history of other nations, and the works of God at large.

HASSIDEANS, or ASSIDEANS, those Jews who resorted to Matthias, to fight for the laws of God and the liberties of their country. They were men of great valour and zeal, having voluntarily devoted themselves to a more strict observation of the law than other men. For, after the return of the Jews from the Babylonish captivity, there were two sorts of men in their church—those who contented themselves with that obedience only which was prescribed by the law of Moses, and who were called Zadikim, i. e. the righteous; and those who, over and above the laws, superadded the constitutions and traditions of the elders, and other rigorous observances: these latter were called the Chasidim, i. e. the pious. From the former sprang the Sadducees and Caraites; from the latter, the Pharisees and the Essenes, which see.

HATRED is the aversion of the will to any object considered by us as evil, or to any person or thing we suppose can do us harm. See ANTIPATHY. Hatred is ascribed to God, but is not to be considered as a passion in him as in man; nor can he hate any of the creatures he has made, as his creatures. Yet he is said to hate the wicked, Ps. v. and indignation and wrath, tribulation and anguish, will be upon every soul of man that does evil. See WRATH OF GOD.

HATTEMISTS, in ecclesiastical history, the name of a modern Dutch sect; so called from Pontian Van Hattem, a minister in the province of Zealand, towards the close of the last century, who, being addicted to the sentiments of Spinoza, was on that account degraded from his pastoral office. The Verschorists and Hattemists resemble each other in their religious systems, though they never so entirely agreed as to form one communion. The founders of these sects deduced from the doctrine of absolute decrees a system of fatal and uncontrollable necessity; they denied the difference between moral good and evil, and the corruption of human nature; from whence they further concluded, that mankind were under no sort of obligation to correct their manners, to improve their minds, or to obey the divine laws; that the whole of religion consisted not in acting, but in suffering; and that all the precepts of Jesus Christ are reducible to this one,—that we bear with cheerfulness and patience the events that happen to us through the divine will, and make it our constant and only study to maintain a perfect tranquillity of mind. Thus far they agreed: but the Hattemists further affirmed, that Christ made no expiation for the sins of men by his death: but had only suggested to us, by his mediation, that there was nothing in us that could offend the Deity: this, they say, was Christ's manner of justifying his servants, and presenting them blameless before the tribunal of God. It was one of their distinguishing tenets, that God does not punish men for their sins, but by their sins. These two sects, says Mosheim, still subsist, though they no longer bear the names of their founders.

HEARING THE WORD OF GOD, is an ordinance of divine appointment, Rom. x. 17; Prov. viii. 4, 5; Mark iv. 24.

Public reading of the Scriptures was a part of synagogue worship, Acts xiii. 15; xv. 21, and was the practice of the Christians in primitive times. Under the former dispensation there was a public hearing of the law at stated seasons, Deut. xxxi. 10, 13; Neh. viii. 2, 3. It seems, therefore, that it is a duty incumbent on us to hear, and, if sensible of our ignorance, we shall also consider it our privilege. As to the manner of hearing, it should be constantly, *Prov. viii. 34; Jam. i. 24, 25. Attentively, Luke xxi. 48; Acts x. 33; Luke iv. 20, 22. With reverence, Ps. lxxix. 7. With faith, Heb. iv. 2. With an endeavour to retain what we hear, Heb. ii. 1; Ps. cxix. 11. With an humble, docile disposition, Luke x. 42. With prayer, Luke xviii. The advantages of hearing are information, 2 Tim. iii. 16. Conviction, 1 Cor. xiv. 24, 25; Acts ii. Conversion, Ps. xl. 7; Acts iv. 4. Confirmation, Acts xiv. 22; xvi. 5. Consolidation, Phil. i. 25; Isa. xl. 1, 2; xxxv. 3, 4. Stennett's Parable of the Sower; Massillon's Serm. vol. ii. pp. 131, Eng. transl.; Gill's Body of Div. vol. iii. p. 340, oct. ed.*

HARK is used for the soul, and all the powers thereof—as the understanding, conscience, will, affections, and memory. The heart of man is naturally, constantly, universally, inexpressibly, openly, and evidently depraved, and inclined to evil, Jer. xvii. 9. It requires a divine power to renovate it, and render it susceptible of right impressions, Jer. xxiv. 7. When thus renovated the effects will be seen in the temper, conversation, and conduct at large. See FAITH, HOPE, &c. Hardness of heart is that state in which a sinner is inclined to, and actually goes on in rebellion against God. This state evidences itself by light views of the evil of sin; partial acknowledgment and confession of it; pride and conceit; ingratitude; unconcern about the word and ordinances of God; inattention to divine providences; stifling convictions of conscience; shunning reproof; presumption, and general ignorance of divine things. We must distinguish, however, between that hardness of heart which even a good man complains of, and that of a judicial nature. 1. Judicial hardness is very seldom perceived, and never lamented: a broken and contrite heart is the last thing such desire; but it is otherwise with believers, for the hardness they feel is always a matter of grief to them, Rom. vii. 24. 2. Judicial hardness is perpetual; or, if ever there be any remorse or relenting, it is only at such times when the sinner is under some outward afflictions, or, filled with the dread of the wrath of God; but as this wears off, or abates, his stupidity returns as much as, or more than ever, Exod. ix. 27: but true believers, when no adverse dispensations trouble them, are often distressed because their hearts are no more affected in holy duties, or inflamed with love to God, Rom. vii. 15. 3. Judicial hardness is attended with a total neglect of duties, especially those that are secret; but that hardness of heart which a believer complains of, though it occasions his going uncomfortably in duty, yet does not keep him from it, Job xxiii. 2, 3. 4. When a person is judicially hardened, he makes use of indirect and unwarrantable methods to maintain that false peace which he thinks himself happy in the enjoyment of; but a believer, when complaining of the hardness of his heart, cannot be satisfied with any thing short of Christ, Ps. ci. 2. 5. Judicial hardness generally opposes the interest of truth and godliness; but a good man considers this as a cause nearest his heart; and although he have to repent his lukewarmness, yet he constantly desires to promote it, Ps. lxxii. 19.

Keeping the heart, is a duty enjoined in the Sacred Scriptures. It consists, says Mr. Flavel, in the diligent and constant use and improvement of all holy means and duties to preserve the soul from sin, and maintain communion with God; and this, he properly observes, supposes a previous work of sanctification, which hath set the heart right by giving it a new bent and inclination. 1. It includes frequent observation of the frame of the heart, Ps. lxxvii. 6. 2. Deep humiliation for heart evils and disorders, 2 Chron. xxxii. 26. 3. Earnest supplication for heart purifying and rectifying grace, Ps. xix. 12. 4. A constant holy jealousy over our hearts, Prov. xxvii. 14. 5. It includes the realizing of God's presence with us, and setting him before us, Ps. xvi. 8. Gen. xvii. 1. This is, 1. The hardest work; heart work is hard work, indeed. 2. Constant work, Exod. xvii. 12. 3. The most important work, Prov. xxiii. 26. This is a duty which should be attended to, if we consider it in connexion with, 1. The honour of God, Is. lxvi. 3. 2. The sincerity of our profession, 2 Kings x. 31; Ezek. xxxiii. 31, 32. 3. The beauty of our conversation, Prov. xii. 26; Ps. xlv. 1. 4. The comfort of our souls, 2 Cor. xiii. 5. 5. The improvement of our graces, Ps. lxxiii. 5, 6. 6. The stability of our souls in the hour of temptation, 1 Cor. xvi. 13. The seasons in which we should more particularly keep our hearts are, 1. The time of prosperity, Deut. vi. 10, 12. 2. Under afflictions, Heb. vii. 5, 6. 3. The time of Sion's troubles, Ps. xli. 1, 4. 4. In the time of great and threatening dangers, Is. xxvi. 20, 21. 5. Under great wants, Phil. iv. 6, 7. 6. In the time of duty, Lev. x. 3. 7. Under injuries received, Rom. xii. 17, &c. 8. In the critical hour of temptation, Matt. xxvi. 41. 9. HEATHENS (from heath, barren, uncultivated,) pagans who worship false gods, and are not acquainted either with the doctrines of the Old Testament or the Christian dispensation. For many ages before Christ, the nations at large were destitute of the true religion, and gave themselves up to the grossest ignorance, the most absurd idolatry, and the greatest crimes. Even the most learned men among the heathens were in general inconsistent, and complied with or promoted the vain customs they found among their countrymen. It was, however, divinely foretold, that in Abraham's seed all nations should be blessed; that the heathen should be gathered to the Saviour, and become his people, Gen. xxii. 18; Gen. xlix. 10; Ps. ii. 8; Is. xlii. 6, 7; Ps. lxxii.; Is. lx. In order that these promises might be accomplished, vast numbers of the Jews, after the Chaldean captivity, were left scattered among the heathen.

was taken out of man,' Gen. ii. 23. He was 'cast into a deep sleep, when God took out one of his ribs, and so formed the woman,' as we read in the foregoing words; yet the knowledge hereof was communicated to him by God. Moreover, we read that Peter, James, and John knew Moses and Elias, Matt. xvii., as appears from Peter's making a particular mention of them: 'Let us make three tabernacles; one for thee, one for Moses, and one for Elias,' 4th ver., though he had never seen them before. Again, our Saviour, in the parable, represents the 'rich man' as seeing 'Abraham afar off, and Lazarus in his bosom,' Luke xvi. 23, and speaks of him as addressing his discourse to him. From such like arguments, some conclude that it may be inferred that the saints shall know one another in heaven, when joined together in the same assembly.

"Moreover, some think that this may be proved from the apostle's words, in 1 Thess. ii. 19, 20, 'What is our hope, or joy, or crown of rejoicing? Are not even ye in the presence of our Lord Jesus Christ at his coming? for ye are our glory and joy:' which seems to argue that he apprehended their happiness in heaven should contribute, or be an addition to his, as he was made an instrument to bring them thither; even so, by a parity of reason, every one who has been instrumental in the conversion and building up others in their holy faith, as the apostle Paul was with respect to them, these shall tend to enhance their praise, and give them occasion to glorify God on their behalf. Therefore it follows that they shall know one another; and consequently they who have walked together in the ways of God, and have been useful to one another as relations and intimate friends, in what respects more especially their spiritual concern, shall bless God for the mutual advantages which they have received, and consequently shall know one another. Again, some prove this from that expression of our Saviour, in Luke xvi. 9, 'Make to yourselves friends of the mammon of unrighteousness, that, when ye fail, they may receive you into everlasting habitations;' especially if by these 'everlasting habitations' be meant heaven, as many suppose it is; and then the meaning is, that they whom you have relieved, and shown kindness to in this world, shall express a particular joy upon your being admitted into heaven; and consequently they shall know you, and bless God for your having been so useful and beneficial to them.

"To this it is objected, that if the saints shall know one another in heaven, they shall know that several of those who were their intimate friends here on earth, whom they loved with very great affection, are not there; and this will have a tendency to give them some uneasiness, and a diminution of their joy and happiness.

"To this it may be replied, that if it be allowed that the saints shall know that some whom they loved on earth are not in heaven, this will give them no uneasiness: since that affection which took its rise principally from the relation which we stood in to persons on earth, or the intimacy that we have contracted with them, will cease in another world, or rather run in another channel, and be excited by superior motives: namely, their relation to Christ; that perfect holiness which they are adorned with; their being joined in the same blessed society, and engaged in the same employment: together with their former usefulness one to another in promoting their spiritual welfare, as made subservient to the happiness they enjoy there. And as for others, who are excluded from their society, they will think themselves obliged, out of a due regard to the justice and holiness of God, to acquiesce in his righteous judgments. Thus, the inhabitants of heaven are represented as adoring the divine perfections, when the vials of God's wrath were poured out upon his enemies, and saying, 'Thou art righteous, O Lord, because thou hast judged thus: true and righteous are thy judgments,' Rom. xvi. 5, 7."

The happiness of heaven will be eternal. Whether it will be progressive or not, and that the saints shall always be increasing in their knowledge, joy, &c., is not so clear. Some suppose that this indicates an imperfection in the felicity of the saints for any addition to be made; but others think it quite analogous to the dealings of God with us here; and that, from the nature of the mind itself, it may be concluded. But however this be, it is certain that our happiness will be complete. 1 Pet. v. 10; v. 4; Heb. xi. 10. Watts's Death and Heaven; Gill's Body of Divinity, vol. ii. p. 495; Saurin's Sermon, vol. iii. p. 321; Toplady's Works, vol. iii. p. 471; Bates's Works; Ridgley's Body of Divinity, question 90.

HEBREW BIBLE. See BIBLE.

HEBREW LANGUAGE, one of the branches of an extensive linguistic family, which, besides Palestine, originally comprehended Syria, Phœnicia, Mesopotamia, Babylon, Arabia, and Ethiopia, and extending even to Carthage and other places along the Mediterranean Sea. It is confessedly one of the oldest of the Oriental or Semitic dialects, and is deserving of particular regard, not only as containing the most ancient written documents in existence, some of which are upwards of 3280 years old, but as being the depository of the ancient divine revelations to mankind. Proofs that the Hebrew was the primitive language, have been drawn from the names of individuals, nations and places; from the names of the heathen gods; from the traces of it in all languages; and from its great purity and simplicity. Its principal characteristics, which apply, however, more or less to the kindred Semitic dialects, are stated by Gesenius to be the following. 1. It is fond of gutturals, which appear to have been pronounced with considerable force, but which our organs cannot enunciate. 2. The roots, from which other words are derived, generally consist of two syllables, and are more frequently verbs than nouns. 3. The verb has only two temporal forms, the past and the future. 4. The oblique cases of the pronouns are always affixed to the verb, the substantive, or the particle, with which they stand connected. 5. The genders are only two,—masculine and feminine. 6. The only way of distinguishing the cases is by prepositions, only the genitive is formed by a noun being placed in construction with another noun, by which it is governed. 7. The comparative and superlative have distinct or separate forms. 8. The language exhibits few compounds, except in proper names. 9. The syntax is extremely simple, and the diction is in the highest degree unperiodical.

The Hebrew language is found in its greatest purity in the writings of Moses. It was in a very flourishing state in the time of David and Solomon; but towards the reign of Hezekiah it began to decline, was subjected to an intermixture of foreign words, principally Aramæan, and gradually deteriorated till the captivity, during which it became in a great measure forgotten, the Jews adopting the eastern Aramæan in Babylon; and on their return to their native land they spoke a mixed dialect, composed principally of the dialects just mentioned, and otherwise made up of Syriacisms, or western Aramæan materials. Some knowledge, however, of the ancient language continued to exist among the learned of the nation: but they no longer spoke it in purity, and mixed it up with a number of Persian, Greek, and Latin words, and thus formed the Talmudic dialect, which exhibits the language as preserved in the Talmud. The Rabbinical Hebrew, which is that of a still later age, contains a further mixture from the different languages with which the Rabbins were conversant.

HEBREW PHILOLOGY. In no department of sacred learning have the wild vagaries of a playful imagination, or stubborn hardihood of preconceived opinions, and favourite theological theories, produced greater confusion, and thrown more formidable bugbears in the way of the youthful student, than that of Hebrew philology. The very facts, that some of the documents comprised in the sacred volume are upwards of 3000 years old, and were penned several centuries before the Greeks became acquainted with the use of letters; and that a period of not fewer than twelve centuries intervened between the composition of the earliest and the most recent of its records, together with the wide difference which is known to exist between the forms and structure of the oriental languages and those of western Europe, present considerations which are of themselves sufficiently intimidating, and calculated to make a beginner despair of ever acquiring a satisfactory knowledge of the language in which it is written: but when in addition to these facts, we reflect on the various conflicting systems of Hebrew grammar and lexicography, the high-pretending, but contradictory hypotheses of divines eminent for their erudition and piety, and the circumstance that few years elapse without some production of novel and original claims being obtruded on the attention of the theological world in reference to this subject, it cannot be matter of surprise, that numbers, even of those whose sacred engagements would naturally lead them to cultivate the study of Hebrew, are induced to abandon it as altogether unprofitable and vain.

Such as have never particularly directed their attention to the subject, can scarcely form any idea of the widely-diversified views that have been entertained respecting the only proper and legitimate methods by which to determine the true meaning of the words constituting the ancient language of the Hebrews. We shall, therefore, here attempt a brief sketch of the different schools of Hebrew philology.

1. The Rabbinical. This school, which is properly indigenous among the Jews, derives its acquaintance with the Hebrew from the tradition of the synagogue; from the Chaldee Targums; from the Talmud; from the Arabic, which was the language of some of the most learned Rabbins; and from conjectural interpretation. In this school, at one of its earlier periods, Jerome acquired his knowledge of the language; and on the revival of learning, our first Christian Hebraists in the west were also educated in it, having had none but Rabbins for their teachers. In consequence of this, the Jewish system of interpretation was introduced into the Christian church by Reuchlin, Sebastian Munster, Sanctes Pagninus, and the elder Buxtorf; and its principles still continue to exert a powerful and extensive influence through the medium of the grammatical and lexicographical works of the last-mentioned author, and the tinge which they gave to many parts of the biblical translations executed immediately after the Reformation.

2. The Forsterian school, founded about the middle of the sixteenth century, by John Forster, a scholar of Reuchlin's, and professor in Tübingen and Wittenberg. This author entirely rejected the authority of the Rabbins; and, not being aware of the use to be made of the versions and cognate dialects, laid it down as an incontrovertible principle of Hebrew philology, that a perfect knowledge of the language is to be derived from the sacred text alone, by consulting the connexion, comparing the parallel passages, and transposing and changing the Hebrew letters, especially such as are similar in figure. His system was either wholly adopted and extended, or, in part, followed by Bohl, Gusset, Driessen, Stock, and others, whose lexicons all proceed on this self-interpreting principle; but its insufficiency has been shown by J. D. Michaelis, in his "Investigation of the Means to be employed in order to attain to a Knowledge of the dead Language of the Hebrews," and by Bauer, in his "Hermeneut. V. T."

3. The Arenarian school, which proceeds on the principle that the Hebrew, being the primitive language from which all others have been derived, may be explained by aid of the Greek, Latin, German, English, &c. Its founder, John Avenarius, professor at Wittenberg, has had but few followers; but among these we may reckon the eccentric Hermann van der Hardt, who attempted to derive the Hebrew from the Greek, which he regarded as the most ancient of all tongues.

4. The Hieroglyphic, or cabalistic system, long in vogue among the Jews, but first introduced into Christendom by Caspar Neumann, professor at Breslau. It consists in attaching certain mystical and hieroglyphical powers to the different letters of the Hebrew alphabet, and determining the signification of the words according to the position occupied by each letter. This ridiculously absurd hypothesis was ably refuted by the learned Christ. Bened. Michaelis, in a Dissertation printed at Halle, 1709, in 4to., and has scarcely had any abettors: but recently it has been revived by a French academician, whose work on the subject exhibits a perfect anomaly in modern literature. Its title is, "La Langue Hébraïque Restituée, et le véritable sens des mots Hébreux rétabli et prouvé par leur analyse radicale." Par Fabre D'Olivet, à Paris, 1815." 4to. According to this author, א is the sign of power and stability; ב of paternity and virility; ג of organic or material development; ד of divisible or divided nature; ה a most mysterious sign, expressive of the connexion between being and nonentity, &c. The following specimens of M. D'Olivet's own English version, taken at random from the second volume, will fill the reader with astonishment at the perversion they display, no less of the powers of the human mind, than of the true principles of language, and of the Scriptures of truth.

"Gen. ii. 8. And-he-appointed, IHOHA, HE-the-Gods, an-inclosure (an organical boundary) in - the - temporal - and - sensible - sphere, extracted - from - the - boundless - and - foregoing (time), and-he-laid-up there that-same-Adam, whom he-had-framed-forever.

"10. And-a-flowing-effluence (an emanation) was-running from-this-temporal-and sensible-place, for-be-dewing that-same-organical-enclosure; and-thence it-was-dividing in-order - to - be - henceforth-suitable to-the-four-fold-generative power.

"22. And-he-restored (in its former state) IHOHA, He-the Being-of-beings, the-self-sameness-of-the-sheltering-windings which-he-had-broken from-Adam (the collective man) for (shaping) Aishah (the intellectual woman, man's faculty of volition), and-he-brought-her to-Adam.

"vi. 9. Those-are the symbolical-progenies of-Noah; Noah, intellectual-principle, right-proving-of-universal-accomplishments was-he, in-the-periods-his-own; together with-him-the-Gods, he-applied-himself-to walk, Noah.

"x. 30. And-such-was-the-restoring-place-of-them, from-harvest-spiritual-fruits, by-dint of-spiritual-contriving, to-the-height of-pristine-time."

Having perused these delectable portions of the translation, which no language but the English was found capable of expressing, our readers will be fully prepared to do justice to the assertions of M. D'Olivet, "that the Hebrew language (which he considers to be the ancient Egyptian) has long been lost; that the Bible we possess is far from being an exact translation of the Sepher of Moses; that the greater part of the vulgar translations are false; and that to restore the language of Moses to its proper grammar, we shall be obliged violently to shock those scientific and religious prejudices, which habit, pride, interest, and respect for ancient errors, have combined to consecrate, confirm, and guard."

5. The Hutchinsonian school, founded by John Hutchinson, originally steward to the Duke of Somerset, and afterwards master of the horse to George I., who maintained, that the Hebrew Scriptures contain the true principles of philosophy and natural history; and that, as natural objects are representative of such as are spiritual and invisible, the Hebrew words are to be explained in reference to these sublime objects. His principles pervade the lexicons of Bates and Parkhurst; but though they have been embraced by several learned men in this country, they are now generally scouted, and have never been adopted, as far as we know, by any of the continental philologists. The disciples of this school are violent anti-punctuists.

6. The Cocceian, or polydynamic hypothesis, according to which the Hebrew words are to be interpreted in every way consistent with their etymological import, or, as it has been expressed, in every sense of which they are capable. Its author, John Cocceius, a Dutch divine, regarded every thing in the Old Testament as typical of Christ, or of his church and her enemies; and the lengths to which he carried his views on this subject, considerably influenced the interpretations given in his Hebrew Lexicon, which is, nevertheless, a work of no ordinary merit. This system has been recently followed by Mr. Von Meyer, of Frankfort, in his improved version of the Holy Scriptures, with short notes.

7. The Schultensian school, by which, to a certain extent, a new epoch was formed in Hebrew philology. Albert Schultens, professor of the oriental languages at Leyden, was enabled, by his profound knowledge of Arabic, to throw light on many obscure passages of Scripture, especially on the book of Job; but, carrying his theory so far as to maintain, that the only sure method of fixing the primitive significations of the Hebrew words is to determine what are the radical ideas attaching to the same words, or words made up of the same letters in Arabic, and then to transfer the meaning from the latter to the former, a wide door was opened for speculative and fanciful interpretation; and the greater number of the derivations proposed by this celebrated philologist and his admirers, have been rejected as altogether untenable, by the first Hebrew scholars, both in our own country and the continent. The great faults of the system consisted in the disproportionate use of the Arabic, to the neglect of the other cognate dialects, especially the Syriac, which, being the most closely related, ought to have the primary place allotted to it; want of due attention to the context; an inordinate fondness for emphases; and far-fetched etymological hypotheses and combinations.

8. The last school of Hebrew philology is that of Halle, so called from the German university of this name, where most of the Hebrew scholars have received their education, or resided, by whom its distinguishing principles have been originated, and brought to their present advanced state of maturity. Its foundation was laid by J. H. and Ch. B. Michaelis, and the superstructure has been carried up by J. D. Michaelis, Simon Eichhorn, Dindorf, Schnurrer, Rosenmüller, and Gesenius, who is allowed to be one of the first Hebraists of the present day.

The grand object of this school is to combine all the different methods by which it is possible to arrive at a correct and indubitable knowledge of the Hebrew language, as contained in the Scriptures of the Old Testament:—allotting to each of the subsidiary means its relative value and authority, and proceeding, in the application of the whole, according to sober and well-matured principles of interpretation.

The first of these means is the study of the language itself, as contained in the books of the Old Testament. Though by some carried to an unwarrantable length, it cannot admit of a doubt, that this must ever form the grand basis of Scripture interpretation. Difficulties may be encountered at the commencement;

but when, as we proceed, we find from the subject-matter, from the design of the speaker or writer, and from other adjuncts, that the sense we have been taught to affix to the words must be the true one, we feel ourselves possessed of a key, which, as far as it goes, we may safely and confidently apply to unlock the sacred writings. When, however, the signification of a word cannot be determined by the simple study of the original Hebrew, recourse must then be had to the ancient versions, the authors of most of which, living near the time when the language was spoken in its purity, and being necessarily familiar with oriental scenes and customs, must be regarded as having furnished us with the most important and valuable of all the subsidiary means by which to ascertain the sense in cases of ἀπαξ λεγόμενα, words or phrases of rare occurrence, or connexions which throw no light on the meaning. Yet, in the use of these versions, care must be taken not to employ them exclusively, nor merely to consult one or two of them to the neglect of the rest. It must also be ascertained, that their text is critically correct in so far as the passage to be consulted is concerned; and the biblical student must not be satisfied with simply guessing at their meaning, or supposing that they either confirm or desert what he may have been led to regard as the sense of the original; but must be practically acquainted with the established usage obtaining in each version, and the particular character of their different renderings.

The Rabbinical Lexicons and Commentaries furnish the next source of Hebrew interpretation. Not that this source is to be admitted as a principium cognoscendi, or an infallible criterion, by which to judge of the true signification of Hebrew words; but, considering that the Rabbins of the tenth, eleventh, and twelfth centuries, whose works alone are here taken into account, possessed a knowledge of the Arabic as their vernacular language, or in which, at least, they were well versed; that they were familiar with the traditional interpretation of the synagogue, as contained in the Talmud and other ancient Jewish writings, or transmitted through the medium of oral communication; and, that they were mostly men of great learning, who rose superior to the trammels of tradition, and did not scruple to give their own views respecting the meaning of certain words and phrases in opposition to the voice of antiquity; it must be conceded, that no small degree of philological aid may reasonably be expected from their writings.

The last means consists in a proper use of the cognate dialects. These are the Chaldee, Syriac, Arabic, Ethiopic, Samaritan, Phœnician, and the Talmudical Hebrew. All these dialects possess, to a great extent, in common with the Hebrew, the same radical words, the same derivatives, the same mode of derivation, the same forms, the same grammatical structure, the same phrases, or modes of expression, and the same, or nearly the same, signification of words. They chiefly differ in regard to accentuation, the use of the vowels, the transmutation of consonants of the same class, the extent of signification in which certain words are used, and the peculiar appropriation of certain words, significations, and modes of speech, which are exhibited in one dialect to the exclusion of the rest.

These languages, when judiciously applied to the illustration of the Hebrew Scriptures, are useful in many ways. They confirm the precise signification of words, both radicals and derivatives, already ascertained and adopted from other sources. They discover many roots or primitives, the derivatives only of which occur in the Hebrew Bible. They are of eminent service in helping to a knowledge of such words as occur but once, or at least but seldom, in the sacred writings, and they throw much light on the meaning of phrases, or idiomatical combinations of words—such combinations being natural to them all, as branches of the same stock, or to some of them in common, in consequence of certain more remote affinities.

The best Hebrew Grammars are those of Vater, Wekherlin, Jahn, Gesenius, and Ewald, in German; and those of Marcus, Stuart, and Lee, in English.

HECATOMB, (ἑκατόν βοῦς, a hundred oxen,) the sacrifice of a hundred oxen, or, in a large sense, of a hundred animals of any sort. Such sacrifices were offered by the ancient heathen on extraordinary occasions.

HEOTRAN, an Arabic word, signifying flight, and specially used to mark the flight of Mohammed from Mecca to Medina. As from that event, which took place A.D. 622, the Mohammedans date their computations, the term is employed to denote their era or period.

HEIDELBERG CATECHISM, a work of great celebrity in the history of the Reformation. Frederic III., Elector of the Palatinate, belonging to the Calvinistic church, caused it to be written, for the purpose of having an uniform rule of faith. The principal contributors were Ursinus, professor of theology at Heidelberg, and Olevianus, minister and public teacher at the same place. The catechism was first published in 1563, under the title of "Catechism, or Short System of Christian Faith, as it is taught in the Churches and Schools in the Palatinate." It has been translated into many languages.

HELL, (Anglo-Saxon and Icelandic, Hele, Hela, a cavern, concealed place, the mansion of the dead,) in the language of theology, the place of divine punishment after death. As all religions have supposed a future state of existence after this life, so all have their hell, or place of torment, in which the wicked are to be punished. Even the heathens had their Tartarus; and the Mohammedans, we find, believe the eternity of rewards and punishments; it is not, therefore, a sentiment peculiar to Christianity.

There have been many curious and useless conjectures respecting the place of the damned; the ancients generally supposed it was a region of fire near the centre of the earth. Mr. Swinden endeavoured to prove that it is seated in the sun. Mr. Whiston advanced a new and strange hypothesis: according to him, the comets are so many hells, appointed in their orbits alternately to carry the damned to the confines of the sun, there to be scorched by its violent heat; and then to return with them beyond the orb of Saturn, there to starve them in those cold and dismal regions. But, as Dr. Doddridge observes, we must here confess our ignorance; and shall be much better employed in studying how we may avoid this place of horror, than in labouring to discover where it is.

Of the nature of this punishment we may form some idea from the expressions made use of in Scripture. It is called a place of torment, Luke xvi. 21; the bottomless pit, Rev. xx. 3—6; a prison, 1 Pet. iii. 19; darkness, Matt. viii. 12, Jude 13; fire, Matt. xiii. 42, 50; a worm that never dies, Mark ix. 44, 48; the second death, Rev. xxi. 8; the wrath of God, Rom. ii. 5. It has been debated whether there will be a material fire in hell. On the affirmative side it is observed, that fire and brimstone are represented as the ingredients of the torment of the wicked, Rev. xiv. 10, 11; xx. 10. That as the body is to be raised, and the whole man to be condemned, it is reasonable to believe there will be some corporeal punishment provided, and, therefore, probably material fire. On the negative side it is alleged, that the terms above mentioned are metaphorical, and signify no more than raging desire or acute pain; and that the Divine Being can sufficiently punish the wicked, by immediately acting on their minds, or rather leaving them to the guilt and stings of their own conscience. According to several passages, it seems there will be different degrees of punishment in hell, Luke xii. 47. Rom. ii. 12. Matt. x. 20, 21; xii. 25, 32. Heb. x. 28, 29.

As to its duration, it has been asserted that it cannot be eternal, because there is no proportion between temporary crimes and eternal punishments; that the word everlasting is not to be taken in its utmost extent; and that it signifies no more than a long time, or a time whose precise boundary is unknown. But in answer to this, it is maintained, that the same word is used, and that sometimes in the very same place, to express the eternity of the happiness of the righteous, and the eternity of the misery of the wicked; and that there is no reason to believe that the words express two such different ideas, as standing in the same connexion. Besides, it is not true, it is observed, that temporary crimes do not deserve eternal punishments, because the infinite majesty of an offended God adds a kind of infinite evil to sin, and therefore exposes the sinner to infinite punishment; and that hereby God vindicates his injured majesty, and glorifies his justice. HELL, Christ's descent into. That Christ locally descended into hell, is a doctrine believed not only by the papists, but by many among the reformed. 1. The text chiefly brought forward in support of this doctrine is 1 Pet. iii. 19: "By which he went and preached to the spirits in prison;" but it evidently appears, that the "spirit" there mentioned, was not Christ's human soul, but a divine nature, or rather the Holy Spirit (by which he was quickened and raised from the dead); and by the inspiration of which, granted to Noah, he preached to those notorious sinners who are now in the prison of hell for their disobedience. 2. Christ, when on the cross, promised the penitent thief his presence that day in paradise; and accordingly, when he died, he committed his soul into his heavenly Father's hand: in heaven, therefore, and not in hell, we are to seek the separate spirit of our Redeemer in this period, Luke xxiii. 43, 46. 3. Had our Lord descended to preach to the damned, there is no supposable reason why the unbelievers in Noah's time only should be mentioned, rather than those of Sodom, and the unhappy multitudes that died in sin. But it may be said, do not both the Old and New Testaments intimate this? Ps. xvi. 10; Acts ii. 34. But it may be answered, that the words, "Thou wilt not leave my soul in hell," may be explained (as is the manner of the Hebrew poets) in the following words: "Neither wilt thou suffer thine holy one to see corruption." So the same words are used, Ps. lxxxix. 48, "What man is he that liveth, and shall not see death? shall he deliver his soul from the hand of the grave?" In the Hebrew (שׁוֹמֵר) the word commonly rendered hell, properly signifies "the invisible state," as our word hell originally did; and the other word (נֶפֶשׁ) signifies not always the immortal soul, but the animal frame in general, either living or dead. Bishop Pearson and Dr. Barrow on the Creed; Edwards's Hist. of Redemption, notes, HELLENISTS, a term occurring in the Greek text of the New Testament, and which, in the English version, is rendered Grecians, Acts vi. 1. The critics are divided as to the signification of the word. Some observe, that it is not to be understood as signifying those of the religion of the Greeks, but those who spoke Greek. The authors of the Vulgate version render it like our Græci, but Messieurs Du Port Royal, more accurately, Juifs Grecs, Greek or Grecian Jews, it being the Jews who spoke Greek that are here treated of, and are hereby distinguished from the Jews called Hebrews—that is, who spoke the Hebrew tongue of that time.

The Hellenists, or Grecian Jews, were those who lived in Egypt, and other parts where the Greek tongue prevailed. These Hellenists first settled in Egypt about six hundred years before Christ. Their number was increased by the numerous colonies of Jews planted there by Alexander the Great, a.c. 336, and still later by Ptolemy Lagus. Under the reign of Augustus, they amounted to nearly a million. The mixture of the Jewish and Egyptian national characters, and the influence of the Greek language and philosophy, which were adopted by these Jews, laid the foundation of a new epoch of Græco-Jewish literature, which, from its prevailing character, received the name of the Hellenistic. The systems of Pythagoras and Plato were strangely combined with those Oriental phantasies, which had been reduced to a system in Egypt, and with which the mystical doctrines of the Gnostics were imbued. The most noted of the Jewish Hellenistic philosophers was Philo of Alexandria; and the principal of the learned labours of the Alexandrian Jews was the Greek translation of the Old Testament.

Salmasius and Vossius are of a different sentiment with respect to the Hellenists: the latter will only have them to be those who adhered to the Grecian interests. Scaliger is represented in the Scaligerana as asserting the Hellenists to be the Jews who lived in Greece and other places, and who read the Greek Bible in their synagogues, and used the Greek language in sacris: and thus they were opposed to the Hebrew Jews, who performed their public worship in the Hebrew tongue; and in this sense St. Paul speaks of himself as a Hebrew of the Hebrews, Phil. iii. 5, 6—i. e., a Hebrew both by nation and language. The Hellenists are thus properly distinguished from the Hellenes, or Greeks, mentioned John xii. 20, who were Greeks by birth and nation, and yet proselytes to the Jewish religion. The term Hellenists is also given to those who maintained the classical purity of the New Testament Greek. Their opponents were called Hebraists.

HEMEROBAPTISTS, a sect among the ancient Jews, thus called from their washing and bathing every day in all seasons; and performing this custom with the greatest solemnity, as a religious rite necessary to salvation.

Epiphanius, who mentions this as the fourth heresy among the Jews, observes, that in other points these heretics had much the same opinion as the Scribes and Pharisees; only that they denied the resurrection of the dead, in common with the Sadducees, and retained a few other of the improprieties of these last.

The sect who pass in the East under the denomination of Sabians, calling themselves Mendai Jahia, or the disciples of St. John, and whom Europeans entitle the Christians of St. John, because they yet retain some knowledge of the gospel, is probably of Jewish origin, and seems to have been derived from the ancient Hemerobaptists; at least it is certain that John, whom they consider as the founder of their sect, bears no sort of similitude to John the Baptist, but rather resembles the person of that name whom the ancient writers represent as the chief of the Jewish Hemerobaptists. These ambiguous Christians dwell in Persia and Arabia, and principally at Bassora; and their religion consists in bodily washings, performed frequently and with great solemnity, and attended with certain ceremonies which the priests mingle with this superstitious service.

HENOTICON (Gr. ἑνωτικόν, uniting into one,) a famous edict or decree of the Greek Emperor Zeno, issued in the year 482, with a view to reconcile all the different parties in religion to the profession of one faith. It is generally agreed that Peter, the false patriarch of Alexandria, and Acacius, patriarch of Constantinople, were the authors of this decree, and that their design was to compliment the emperor with the right of prescribing regulations in matters of faith. Zeno was caught by their flattery, and the Henoticon was drawn up. It soon appeared that the emperor, by this decree, arrogated to himself the right of being head of the church, and that it covertly favoured the Eutychian heretics, who approved the council of Chalcedon. Accordingly, Pope Simplicius condemned it in the year 483, and cited Acacius, who had been the chief promoter of it, to appear before him at Rome. But it was not till the year 518 that it was entirely suppressed, when, in the reign of Justinian, and the pontificate of Hormisdas, the name of Zeno was struck out of the diptychs, or sacred registers, of such deceased persons for whom particular prayers were offered up.

HENRICIANS, a sect so called from Henry, its founder, who, though a monk and hermit, undertook to reform the superstition and vices of the clergy. For this purpose he left Lausanne, in Switzerland, and removing from different places, at length settled at Thoulouse, in the year 1147, and there exercised his ministerial function; till, being overcome by the opposition of Bernard, abbot of Clairval, and condemned by Pope Eugenius III. at a council assembled at Rheims, he was committed to a close prison in 1148, where he soon ended his days. This reformer rejected the baptism of infants, severely censured the corrupt manners of the clergy, treated the festivals and ceremonies of the church with the utmost contempt, and held private assemblies for inculcating his peculiar doctrines.

HENRY, MATTHEW, author of the celebrated "Commentary" bearing his name, was born on the 18th of October, 1662, at Broad Oak, in Flintshire. He was the son of the celebrated Philip Henry. Matthew, like many other eminent persons, was a child of infirm health, and early displayed a mind too vigorous and active for the frame which it inspired. At the early age of ten years he was deeply affected by convictions of the evil of sin, in consequence of hearing his father preach on Psalm li. verse 7: "Purge me with hyssop, and I shall be clean; wash me, and I shall be whiter than snow." When he was thirteen years of age, he wrote in his diary, "It is to-day thirteen years since I was born; and though I was sickly, the Lord hath preserved me ever since. Lord Jesus, I bless thee for thy word, for good parents, that I was taken into covenant betimes in baptism, that I have had a good education, that I am thine." That the child of Philip Henry should early love to imitate preaching, and wish to be a minister, is not surprising; but of those who observed his puerile essays, some wondered at the wisdom and gravity which they displayed, and many expressed their fears lest he should be too forward. But the father replied, "Let him go on: he fears God, and designs well; and I hope God will keep him, and bless him."

In the year 1680, he sent his son to London, and placed him under the care of the celebrated Thomas Doolittle, from whom he received much knowledge, and who formed in him many excellent habits and principles to guide him in after life. After having been at the seminary of Mr. Thomas Doolittle, young Mr. Henry was induced, by the influence of friends, to remove to Gray's Inn, in order to study the law. But, true to his original purpose, keeping his eye on the advancement of Christianity as his polar star, he quickly returned to the work of the ministry. His first public services were at his father's residence, where he received the most pleasing testimonies of his usefulness. Being afterwards invited to spend a few days with a friend at Nantwich, in Cheshire, he preached on the words of Job, "With God is terrible majesty," which produced the most striking and delightful effects. He was now invited to Chester, where he preached at the house of Mr. Henthorne, a sugar baker, which laid the foundation of the church of which he was many years the faithful and beloved pastor. But having been called back to London, he found that the king was issuing out licences to empower Nonconformists to preach; on which he wrote to his father, that Mr. Faldo, an Independent minister, had preached publicly at the meeting-house in Moorfields, both morning and afternoon, to many hundreds of people, who were delighted at the reviving of the work. This led him to prepare seriously for his future office; and in a private paper, entitled "Serious Self-Examination before Ordination," he expresses his determination to be zealous and faithful in the discharge of his ministerial duties.

It seems that it had been suggested to him, that he might possibly obtain episcopal ordination, without submitting to the oaths and declarations to which Dissenters objected; but after having examined the question with great seriousness, he determined rather to be ordained by Presbyters; and as the ministers to whom he applied were very aged and cautious, he was ordained with great privacy, on the 9th of May, 1687. Mr. Henry was well received at Chester, and was successful in raising a large congregation. Of his ministry it may be truly said, that, like the apostle, he was in labours more abundant; for his constant work, on the Lord's-day, was to pray six times in public, to expound twice, and preach twice. His two public services seem to have been fully equal to three in the present day. He went through the whole Bible, by way of exposition, more than once. The list of subjects on which he preached is in print, and displays a comprehensive mind, anxious to declare the whole counsel of God; but, in his private notes, he says, "I find myself most in my element when preaching Christ, and him crucified; for the more I think and speak of him, the more I love him." Eager to seize every opportunity of usefulness, he diligently visited the prisoners in the Castle of Chester, where his benevolent compassion and zeal introduced him to some very affecting scenes. But he never confined his labours to Chester, for he was the life of the Dissenting communion through all that county, and constantly preached in the adjoining towns and villages every week. After having refused several invitations from churches in London, he at length consented to leave Chester, in order to take the pastoral charge of a congregation at Hackney, first collected by Dr. Bates. He has left on record his reasons for quitting the first scene of his labours, where he had preached nearly five-and-twenty years, where he had three hundred and fifty communicants, and probably a thousand hearers; a people, of whom he said, with a heavy heart at parting, "They love me too well." His determinations were, unquestionably, not premature, and proved to be cogent. He commenced the 18th day of May, in the year 1712, his pastoral care at Hackney, expounding the first chapter of Genesis in the morning, and in the afternoon, the first of Matthew, as if beginning life anew. That he removed to the vicinity of London to enjoy, not ease, but labour, was evident; for his unexhausted zeal blazed forth with greater ardour, to fill his new and enlarged sphere. He devised additional modes of usefulness; preaching not only at Hackney, but in London also, early and late on the same Sabbath. He often preached lectures every evening in the week, and sometimes two or three on the same day; so that his biographer says, "If ever any minister, in our days, erred in excess of labours, he was the person." But one of the principal motives which led him to London, was to be able to print the remaining volumes of his "Exposition." He now drew near to the goal for which he panted. Having alleviated the pains of separation from his friends at Chester, by promising to visit them every year, he made his last journey to them in the month of June, 1714. On his return, he was taken ill at Nantwich, where he said to his friend Mr. Illidge, "You have been used to take notice of the sayings of dying men, this is mine: That a life spent in the service of God, and communion with him, is the most pleasant life that any one can live in this world." And on the 22nd of June, 1714, he expired, in the fifty-second year of his age. The death of Henry was universally lamented; even those who loved not the communion to which he belonged, owned that it had lost its brightest ornament. He has left behind him, in his works, a library of divinity, which supersedes all eulogium on his character. His mind was not, indeed, formed for metaphysical abstraction, or elegant sublimity; nor was his pen celebrated for those splendid ornaments which feast the fancy, nor those vigorous strokes which thrill through the soul; but he possessed a peculiar faculty, which may be called a religious naïveté, which introduced well-known sentiments in an enchanting air of novel simplicity, while his style abounded with antitheses which Attic taste would sometimes refuse, but which human nature will ever feel and admire. The mere plans of his sermons and expositions contain more vivid lucid instruction, and less deserve the name of skeletons, than the finished discourses of many other divines.

HERACLEONITES, a sect of Christians, the followers of Heracleon, who refined upon the Gnostic divinity, and maintained that the world was not the immediate production of the Son of God, but that he was only the occasional cause of its being created by the demiurgus. The Heracleonites denied the authority of the prophecies of the Old Testament; maintained that they were mere random sounds in the air; and that John the Baptist was the only true voice that directed to the Messiah.

HERESIARCH, one who introduces or founds any particular heresy; a leader in any body of heretics.

HERESY, a term borrowed from the Greek word αἵρεσις, which in its primary signification, implies a choice or election, whether of good or evil. It seems to have been principally applied to what we would call moral choice, or the adoption of one opinion in preference to another. Philosophy was in Greece the great object which divided the opinions and judgments of men; and hence the term αἵρεσις (heresy) being most frequently applied to the adoption of this or that particular dogma, came, by an easy transition, to signify the sect or school in which that dogma was maintained. Thus, though the heresy of the Academy, or of Epicurus, would sound strange to our ears, and though the expression was not common with the early Greek writers, yet in later times it became familiar, and we find Cicero speaking of the heresy to which Cato belonged, when he described him as a perfect Stoic. The Hellenistic Jews made use of the same term to express the leading sects which divided their countrymen. Thus Josephus speaks of the three heresies of the Pharisees, Sadducees, and Essenes; and since he was himself a Pharisee, he could only have used the term as equivalent to sect or party. Luke also, in the Acts of the Apostles, (v. 17, xv. 5,) speaks of the heresy of the Pharisees and Sadducees; and we learn from the same book, (xxiv. 5, 14,) that the Christians were called by the Jews the heresy of the Nazarenes. With this opprobrious addition, the term was undoubtedly used as one of insult and contempt; and the Jews were more likely than the Greeks to speak reproachfully of those who differed from them, particularly in matters of religion. The three Jewish sects already mentioned, were of long standing, and none of them were considered to be at variance with the national creed; but the Christians differed from all of them; and in every sense of the word, whether ancient or modern, they formed a distinct heresy. The apostles would be likely to use the term with a mixture of Jewish and Gentile feelings; but there was one obvious reason why they should employ it in a new sense, and why at length it should acquire a signification invariably expressive of reproach. The Jews, as we have seen, allowed of three, or perhaps more, heresies among their countrymen. In Greece opinions were much more divided; and twelve different sects have been enumerated, which, by divisions and subdivisions, might be multiplied into many more. The shades of difference between these diverging sects were often extremely small; and there were many bonds of union, which kept them together, as members of the same family, or links of the same chain. In addition to which, we must remember, that these differences were not always or necessarily connected with religion. Persons might dispute concerning the summum bonum, and yet they might worship, or at least profess to worship, the same God. But the doctrine of the Gospel was distinct, uncompromising, and of such a nature that a person must believe the whole of it, and to the very letter, or he could not be admitted to be a Christian. There is one body, and one Spirit, one Lord, one faith, one baptism, &c., Eph. iv. 4, 5; which words, if rightly understood, evidently mean, that the faith of the Gospel is one and undivided. Hence arose the distinction between orthodox and heterodox. He who believed the Gospel, as the apostles preached it, was orthodox; he who did not so believe it, was heterodox. He embraced an opinion—it mattered not whether his own, or that of another, but he made it his own choice, and in the strict sense of the term, he was an heretic. It was no longer necessary to qualify the term by the addition of the sect or party which he chose: he was not a true Christian, and therefore he was an heretic. It was in this sense that it was applied by the early fathers. If a man admitted a part, or even the whole of Christianity, and added to it something of his own; or if he rejected the whole of it, he was equally designated as an heretic. Thus, by degrees, it came to be restricted to those who professed Christianity, but professed it erroneously; and in later times, the doctrine of the Trinity, as defined by the council of Nice, was almost the only test which decided the orthodoxy or the heresy of a Christian. Differences upon minor points were then described by the milder term of schism; and the distinction seems to have been, that unity of faith might be maintained, though schism existed; but if the unity of faith was violated, the violator of it was an heretic: a distinction which appears hardly to have been observed in the apostolic age; and Paul has been thought to use the term heresy, where later writers would have spoken of schisms.

According to the laws of this kingdom, heresy consists in a denial of some of the essential doctrines of Christianity, publicly and obstinately avowed. It is now beginning, however, to be generally acknowledged that particular modes of belief or unbelief, not tending to sap the foundations of morality, are by no means the object of coercion by the civil magistrate. What doctrines shall be adjudged heresy, was left by our old constitution to the determination of the ecclesiastical judge, who had herein a most arbitrary latitude allowed him; for the general definition of an heretic, given by Lindewode, extends to the smallest deviations from the doctrines of the holy church: Hæreticus est qui dubitat de fide catholica, et qui negligit servare ea una Romana ecclesia statuit, seu servare decreverat. or, as the statute 2 Hen. IV. cap. 15, expresses it in English, "teachers of erroneous opinions, contrary to the faith and blessed determinations of the holy church." Very contrary this to the usage of the first general councils, which defined all heretical doctrines with the utmost precision and exactness; and what ought to have alleviated the punishment, the uncertainty of the crime, seems to have enhanced it in those days of blind zeal and pious cruelty. The sanctimonious hypocrisy of the Canonists, indeed, went at first no further than enjoining penance, excommunication, and ecclesiastical deprivation, for heresy; but afterwards they proceeded boldly to imprisonment by the ordinary, and confiscation of goods in pios usus. But in the mean time they had prevailed upon the weakness of bigoted princes to make the civil power subservient to their purposes, by making heresy not only a temporal, but even a capital offence; the Romish ecclesiastics determining, without appeal, whatever they pleased to be heresy, and shifting off to the secular arm the odium and drudgery of executions, with which they pretended to be too tender and delicate to intermeddle. Nay, they affected to intercede on behalf of the convicted heretic, well knowing that at the same time they were delivering the unhappy victim to certain death. See ACT OF PARLIAMENT. Hence the capital punishments inflicted on the ancient Donatists and Manicheans by the emperors Theodosius and Justinian; hence, also, the constitution of the Emperor Frederic, mentioned by Lydewode, adjudging all persons, without distinction, to be burnt with fire, who were convicted of heresy by the ecclesiastical judge. The same emperor, in another constitution, ordained, that if any temporal lord, when admonished by the church, should neglect to clear his territories of heretics within a year, it should be lawful for good Catholics to seize and occupy the lands, and utterly to exterminate the heretical possessors. And upon this foundation was built that arbitrary power, so long claimed, and so fatally exerted by the Pope, of disposing even of the kingdoms of refractory princes to more dutiful sons of the church. The immediate event of this constitution serves to illustrate at once the gratitude of the holy see, and the just punishment of the royal bigot; for, upon the authority of this very constitution, the Pope afterwards expelled this very Emperor Frederic from his kingdom of Sicily, and gave it to Charles of Anjou. Christianity being thus deformed by the demon of persecution upon the continent, our own island could not escape its scourge. Accordingly we find a writ de hæretico comburendo, i. e. of burning the heretic. See that article. But the king might pardon the convict by issuing no process against him: the writ de hæretico comburendo being not a writ of course, but issuing only by the special direction of the king in council. In the reign of Henry IV., when the eyes of the Christian world began to open, and the seeds of the Protestant religion (under the opprobrious name of Lollardy) took root in this kingdom, the clergy, taking advantage of the king's dubious title to demand an increase of their own power, obtained an act of parliament which sharpened the edge of persecution to its utmost keenness. See HÆRETICO COMBURENDO. By statute 2 Henry V. c. 7, Lollardy was also made a temporal offence, and indictable in the King's courts; which did not thereby gain an exclusive, but only a concurrent, jurisdiction with the bishop's consistory. Afterwards, when the Reformation began to advance, the power of the ecclesiastics was somewhat moderated; for though what heresy is was not then precisely defined, yet we are told in some points what it is not; the statute 25 Henry VIII. c. 14, declaring that offences against the see of Rome are not heresy; and the ordinary being thereby restrained from proceeding in any case upon mere suspicion; i. e. unless the party be accused by two credible witnesses, or an indictment of heresy be first previously found in the king's courts of common law. And yet the spirit of persecution was not abated, but only diverted into a lay channel; for in six years afterwards, by stat. 31 Henry VIII. c. 14, the bloody law of the six articles was made, which were "determined and resolved by the most godly pain, study, and travail of his Majesty; for which his most humble and obedient subjects, the lords spiritual and temporal, and the commons in parliament assembled, did render and give unto his highness their most high and hearty thanks!" The same statute established a mixed jurisdiction of clergy and laity for the trial and conviction of heretics; Henry being equally intent on destroying the supremacy of the bishops of Rome, and establishing all their other corruptions of the Christian religion. Without recapitulating the various repeals and revivals of these sanguinary laws in the two succeeding reigns, we proceed to the reign of Queen Elizabeth, when the Reformation was finally established, and the ecclesiastical laws considerably modified. By stat. 1 Eliz. c. 1, all former statutes relating to heresy are repealed; which leaves the jurisdiction of heresy as it stood at common law, viz., as to the infliction of common censures in the ecclesiastical courts, and in case of burning the heretic, in the provincial synod only. Sir Matthew Hale is, indeed, of a different opinion, and holds that such power resided in the diocesan also: though he agrees that in either case the writ de hæretico comburendo was not demandable of common right, but grantable or otherwise merely at the king's discretion. But the principal point now gained was, that by this statute a boundary was for the first time set to what should be accounted heresy; nothing for the future being to be so determined, but only such tenets which have been heretofore so declared.—1. By the words of the canonical Scriptures. 2. By the first four general councils, or such others as have only used the words of the Holy Scriptures. Or, 3. Which shall hereafter be so declared by the parliament, with the assent of the clergy in convocation. Thus was heresy reduced to a greater certainty than before, though it might not have been the worse to have defined it in terms still more precise and particular; as a man continued still liable to be burnt for what, perhaps, he did not understand to be heresy, till the ecclesiastical judge so interpreted the words of the canonical Scriptures. For the writ de hæretico comburendo remained still in force, till it was totally abolished, and heresy again subjected only to ecclesiastical correction pro salute animæ, by stat. 29 Car. II. c. 9; when, in one and the same reign, our lands were delivered from the slavery of military tenures, our bodies from arbitrary imprisonment by the habeas corpus act, and our minds from the tyranny of superstitious bigotry, by demolishing this last badge of persecution in the English law. Every thing is now less exceptionable, with respect to the spiritual cognizance and spiritual punishment of heresy; unless, perhaps, that the crime ought to be more strictly defined, and no prosecution permitted, even in the ecclesiastical courts, till the tenets in question are by proper authority previously declared to be heretical. Under these restrictions, some think it necessary, for the support of the national religion, that the officers of the church should have power to censure heretics; yet not to harass them with temporal penalties, much less to exterminate or destroy them. The legislature has, indeed, thought it proper that the civil magistrate should interpose with regard to one species of heresy; for by stat. 9 and 10 William III. c. 32, if any person, educated in the Christian religion, or professing the same, shall, by writing, printing, teaching, or advised speaking, deny any one of the persons in the Holy Trinity to be God, or maintain that there are more Gods than one, he shall undergo the same penalties and incapacities which were inflicted on apostasy by the same statute. *Enc. HERETIC, a general name for all such persons under any religion, but especially the Christian, as profess or teach opinions contrary to the established faith, or to what is made the standard of orthodoxy. See last article, and Lardner's History of the Heretics of the first two Centuries.

HERMENEUTICS, from the Greek ἑρμηνεύω, to interpret, the science or theory of interpretation, comprising and exhibiting the principles and rules according to which the meaning of an author may be judiciously and accurately ascertained. It consists of two parts: the theoretical, which includes the general principles which respect the meaning of words and the kinds of them; and the preceptive, which embraces the rules founded on these principles, by which we are to be guided in our philological inquiries, and all our attempts to investigate the meaning of any writer. Sacred hermeneutics comprise the principles and rules of this science as made to bear on the interpretation of the Holy Scriptures.

HERMIANI, a sect in the second century; so called from their leader Hermias. One of their distinguishing tenets was, that God is corporeal; another, that Jesus Christ did not ascend into heaven with his body, but left it in the sun.

HERMIT, a person who retires into solitude for the purpose of devotion. Who were the first hermits cannot easily be known; though Paul, surnamed the hermit, is generally reckoned the first. The persecutions of Decius and Valerian were supposed to have occasioned their first rise.

HERMOGENIANS, a set of ancient heretics; denominated from their leader Hermogenes, who lived towards the close of the second century. Hermogenes established matter as his first principle; and regarding matter as the fountain of all evil, he maintained, that the world, and every thing contained in it, as also the souls of men and other spirits, were formed by the Deity from an uncreated mass of corrupt matter. The opinions of Hermogenes with regard to the origin of the world, and the nature of the soul, were warmly opposed by Tertullian.

HERNHUTTERS. See MORAVIANS.

HERODIANS, a sect among the Jews at the time of our Saviour, Matt. xxii. 16; Mark iii. 6. The critics and commentators are very much divided with regard to the Herodians. St. Jerome, in his dialogue against the Luciferians, takes the name to have been given to such as owned Herod for the Messiah; and Tertullian and Epiphanius are of the same opinion. But the same Jerome, in his comment on Matthew, treats this opinion as ridiculous; and maintains that the Pharisees gave this appellation by way of ridicule, to Herod's soldiers, who paid tribute to the Romans; agreeable to which the Syrian interpreters render the word by the domestics of Herod, i. e. "his courtiers." M. Simon in his notes on the 22nd chapter of Matthew, advances a more probable opinion: the name Herodian he imagines to have been given to such as adhered to Herod's party and interest, and were for preserving the government in his family, about which were great divisions among the Jews. F. Hardouin will have the Herodians and Sadducees to have been the same. Dr. Prideaux is of opinion that they derived their name from Herod the Great; and that they were distinguished from the other Jews by their concurrence with Herod's scheme of subjecting himself and his dominions to the Romans, and likewise by complying with many of their heathen usages and customs. This symbolizing with idolatry upon views of interest and worldly policy, was probably that leaven of Herod, against which our Saviour cautioned his disciples. It is further probable that they were chiefly of the sect of the Sadducees: because the leaven of Herod is also denominated the leaven of the Sadducees.

HERVEY, JAMES, M.A., the distinguished author of "Meditations," bearing his name, was born at Hardingstone, near Northampton, on February the 26th, 1713. His father was a clergyman, then residing at Collingtree; and Mr. Hervey received from him, and his excellent mother, his early education. At the age of seven they sent him to the grammar school of Northampton, where he remained till he was seventeen. He there acquired a knowledge of the Greek and Latin languages, and attained a considerable proficiency in various branches of general literature. At the age of eighteen he was sent to the University of Oxford; and there, becoming acquainted with the distinguished John Wesley, he devoted himself, with great zeal, to various studies, and became seriously impressed with the importance of religion. For some years afterwards he felt a peculiar attachment to the doctrinal sentiments of Mr. Wesley; but subsequently conceiving such sentiments to be erroneous, he attached himself to the Calvinists.

During the continuance of Mr. Hervey at Lincoln College, he attained great proficiency in the knowledge of the classics, and was justly celebrated for the decorousness of his conduct. At the age of twenty-two his father appointed him to the situation of curate of Weston Favel, and he discharged the duties of his office with piety and integrity. In a few years he was curate at Bideford, and several other places in the west of England; and, during that time, he wrote his celebrated "Meditations and Contemplations," which he published in 1746, and which have been universally read, and very generally admired. In 1750, on the death of his father, he succeeded to the livings of Weston and Collingtree, and he devoted most of his time and attention to the duties of his profession. In 1753 he published "Remarks on Lord Bolingbroke's letters on the Study and Use of History, so far as they relate to the History of the Old Testament, &c.; in a letter to a Lady of Quality;" and a recommendatory Preface to Burnham's Pious Memorials. In 1755 he published his "Theron and Aspasio," which is regarded as decidedly the best effort of his genius; but it was attacked by Mr. Robert Sandeman, of Edinburgh, with extraordinary ability, on the nature of justifying faith, and other points connected with it, in a work, entitled, "Letters on Theron and Aspasio," two volumes. (See the article SANDEMAN.) This attack threw Mr. Hervey into the arms of Mr. W. Cudworth, a dissenting minister in London, in whom he found a powerful coadjutor; but Mr. Hervey does not appear to have understood Cudworth's system, which, in some important points, was very different from his own, though they were agreed in making appropriation essential to the nature of true faith.

The health of Mr. Hervey was generally imperfect; and for many years he was the subject of affliction; till, at length, on December the 25th, 1758, his labours were terminated by death, and his spirit, emancipated from the burdens of mortality, was conducted to regions of purity and peace. Mr. Hervey's writings have had an extensive circulation: for many years the press could hardly supply the demand for them. Yet his style has been severely censured by Dr. Blair and others for its turgid and bombastic qualities; rendering it the very opposite of the chaste and elegant diction of Addison and our best prose writers. They are now, however, less in repute, and less in demand than formerly. Of his character but one opinion prevails: he was eminently pious, though not deeply learned; habitually spiritually minded; zealous for the doctrines of divine grace; animated with ardent love to the Saviour; and his humility, meekness, submission to the will of God, and patience under his afflicting hand, exemplified the Christian character and adorned his profession.

HESYCASTS, certain eastern monks, so called from the Greek word ἡσυχάζω, which signifies to be quiet. Their distinguishing tenet was that of the Messalians, who maintained that, abandoning all labour, we should give ourselves wholly to religious exercises, especially to contemplation. They appeared about Constantinople in the year 1340; and because they fixed their eyes upon their belly, while engaged in prayer, regarding the navel as the seat of the soul, they were likewise called Omphalopsychi or Umbilici. They were joined by Gregory Palamas, archbishop of Thessalonica, who was attacked by the monk Barlaam, and the order was condemned in a synod held at Constantinople in the year 1342.

HETERODOX, something that is contrary to the faith or doctrine established in what has been accounted the true church. See ORTHODOX.

HETEROUSIANS, a branch of the Arians, and so called because they held, not that the Son of God was of a substance like to that of the Father, which was the doctrine of another branch of the Arians, thence called Homi-ousians, but that he was of another substance, different from that of the Father.

HEXAPLA, a Bible disposed in six columns, containing the text, and divers versions thereof, compiled and published by Origen, with a view to secure the sacred text from future corruptions, and to correct those that had been already introduced. Eusebius relates that Origen, after his return from Rome under Caracalla, applied himself to learn Hebrew, and began to collect the several versions that had been made of the sacred writings, and of these to compose his Tetrapla and Hexapla; others, however, will not allow him to have begun till the time of Alexander, after he had retired into Palestine, about the year 231. To conceive what this Hexapla was, it must be observed, that, besides the translation of the sacred writings, called the Septuagint, made under Ptolemy Philadelphus, above 280 years before Christ, the Scripture had been since translated into Greek by other interpreters. The first of those versions, or (reckoning the Septuagint) the second, was that of Aquila, a proselyte Jew, the first edition of which he published in the 12th year of the emperor Adrian, or about the year of Christ 128; the third was that of Symmachus, published, as is commonly supposed, under Marcus Aurelius, but as some say, under Septimius Severus, about the year 200; the fourth was that of Theodotion, prior to that of Symmachus, under Commodus, or about the year 175. These Greek versions, says Dr. Kennicott, were made by the Jews from their corrupted copies of the Hebrew, and were designed to stand in the place of the Seventy, against which they were prejudiced, because it seemed to favour the Christians. The fifth was found at Jericho, in the reign of Caracalla, about the year 217; and the sixth was discovered at Nicopolis, in the reign of Alexander Severus, about the year 228; lastly, Origen himself recovered part of a seventh, containing only the Psalms. Now, Origen, who had held frequent disputations with the Jews in Egypt and Palestine, observing that they always objected to those passages of Scripture quoted against them, appealed to the Hebrew text, the better to vindicate those passages, and confound the Jews, by showing that the Seventy had given the sense of the Hebrew; or rather to show, by a number of different versions, what the real sense of the Hebrew was, undertook to reduce all these several versions into a body, along with the Hebrew text, so as they might be easily confronted, and afford a mutual light to each other. He made the Hebrew text his standard; and allowing that corruptions might have happened, and that the old Hebrew copies might and did read differently, he contented himself with marking such words or sentences as were not in the Hebrew text, nor the later Greek versions, and adding such words or sentences as were omitted in the Seventy, prefixing an asterisk to the additions, and an obelisk to the others. In order to this, he made choice of eight columns; in the first he placed the Hebrew text, in Hebrew characters; in the second, the same text in Greek characters; the rest were filled with the several versions above mentioned; all the columns answering verse for verse, and phrase for phrase; and in the Psalms there was a ninth column for the seventh version. This work Origen called Ἑξαπλά, Hexapla, q. d. sextuple, or work of six columns, as only regarding the first six Greek versions. St. Epiphanius, taking in likewise the two columns of the text, calls the work Octapla, as consisting of eight columns. This celebrated work, which Montfaucon imagines consisted of sixty large volumes, perished long ago; probably with the library at Cæsarea, where it was preserved in the year 653; though several of the ancient writers have preserved us pieces thereof, particularly St. Chrysostom on the Psalms, Phileponus in his Hexameron, &c. Some modern writers have earnestly endeavoured to collect fragments of the Hexapla, particularly Flaminius, Nobilius, Drusius, and F. Montfaucon, in two folio volumes, printed at Paris in 1713. An edition was also published by Bahrdt in two volumes 8vo, which is convenient for reference.

HIERACITES, heretics in the third century, so called from their leader Hierax, a philosopher of Egypt, who taught that Melchisedec was the Holy Ghost, denied the resurrection, and condemned marriage.

HIERARCHY, an ecclesiastical establishment, or a church governed by priests, from hier, sacred, and ἀρχή, government. Though elders, called presbyters and bishops, stood at the head of the primitive churches, yet their constitution was democratic, each of the members having a share in all the concerns of the association, and voting in the election of office-bearers, the admission of new members, and the expulsion of offenders. Soon, however, the government was transferred into the hands of the officers, or more properly speaking, was assumed by them; and, in the second century, some of their number, arrogating to themselves exclusively the title of bishops, acquired a superiority over the other presbyters, though these, and, in many cases, all the members of the churches, retained some share in the government. The bishops residing in the capitals of provinces, soon acquired a superiority over the provincial bishops, and were called metropolitans. They, in their turn, became subject to a still higher order, termed patriarchs; and thus a complete aristocratic constitution was formed, which continues in the Greek church to this day ; but in the Latin it was speedily transformed into a monarchy, centring in the person of the pope.

Besides thus designating the internal government of the church, the term hierarchy is sometimes used to denote the dominion of the church over the state. In the first centuries the church had no connexion with the state, and was for the most part persecuted by it. After its amalgamation with it, under Constantine the Great, it obtained protection, but was dependent on the temporal ruler, who asserted the right of convoking general councils, and nominating the metropolitans, and otherwise frequently interfered in the internal affairs of the church. It was the same in the Gothic, Lombard, and Frankish states. The hierarchical power, however, was incessantly at work ; Gregory VII. especially, exerted himself to enforce its claims. It was greatly promoted by the crusades ; and thus, from the end of the eleventh to the middle of the thirteenth century, the hierarchical influence was rendered predominant. The church became an institution elevated above the state, and stood, in public opinion, above all secular princes. The papal tiara was the sun ; the imperial crown the moon. From the fourteenth century the hierarchy began gradually to decline ; it was shaken almost to its foundation by the attacks of the Reformers ; and the remains of its principles, as still existing in the different Protestant establishments, as well as in the Roman, are becoming daily more and more weakened by the influence of public opinion, and a firm determination, on the part of the people, to obtain the full enjoyment of those civil and religious rights which have been arrogantly and wantonly wrested from them. The word is also used in reference to the subordination some suppose there is among the angels ; but whether they are to be considered as having a government or hierarchy among themselves, so that one is superior in office and dignity to others ; or whether they have a kind of dominion over one another ; or whether some are made partakers of privileges others are deprived of, cannot be determined, since Scripture is silent as to this matter.

HIERONYMITES, hermits of the order of St. Jerome, established in 1373, which wears a white habit with a black scapulary. In the Netherlands, and in Spain, where it was devoted to a contemplative life, and possessed among other convents the splendid one of St. Laurence in the Escorial, the sepulchre of the kings, this order became one of the most opulent and considerable. In Sicily, the West Indies, and Spanish America, it possesses convents.

HIGH CHURCHMEN, the term first given to the non-jurors, who refused to acknowledge William III. as their lawful king, and who had very proud notions of church power ; but it is now commonly used in a more extensive signification, and is applied to all those, who though far from being non-jurors, yet form pompous and ambitious conceptions of the authority and jurisdiction of the church. It has generally been found, that both in the Episcopal and Presbyterian establishments, those who have been most violent in their efforts to uphold and vindicate hierarchical power, and the exclusive claims of the church, have been the most indifferent to the interests of evangelical truth, and the practice of scriptural piety ; but within these few years, many of those who are in repute as the advocates of gospel doctrine, have gradually been contracting in their liberality, and assuming an air and tone of high churchmanship, approximating to those of the party by which they themselves are regarded as a kind of half-dissenters or schismatics.

HIGH MASS is that mass which is read before the high altar on Sundays, feast days, and particular occasions, such as the celebration of a victory, &c.

HILLEL, a famous Jewish rabbi, who lived a little before the time of Christ. He was born at Babylon, and was the disciple of Shammai. At the age of forty, he went to Jerusalem, where he applied himself to the study of the law, and at the age of fourscore was made head of the Sanhedrim. Differing in opinion from his master Shammai, their disciples engaged in the quarrel, and several persons were killed on both sides. By the Jews, Hillel is extolled to the skies, and is said to have educated upwards of a thousand pupils in the knowledge of the law, among whom were thirty who were worthy that the Spirit of God should have rested on them as he did on Moses ; thirty who, like Joshua, were worthy to stop the sun in his course ; and twenty, little inferior to the first, and superior to the second. Rabbi Hillel was the grandfather of Gamaliel, Paul's master.

HISTORY, ECCLESIASTICAL. See ECCLESIASTICAL HISTORY.

HOFFMANIISTS, those who espoused the sentiments of Daniel Hoffman, professor in the university of Helmstadt, who in the year 1598 taught that the light of reason, even as it appears in the writings of Plato and Aristotle, is adverse to religion ; and that the more the human understanding is cultivated by philosophical study, the more perfectly is the enemy supplied with weapons of defence.

HORENLOHE, PRINCE, the eighteenth son of Charles Albert, the Crown Prince, who was disqualified for taking the reins of government by mental derangement. At the wish of his mother, he determined to study for the clerical profession, and an ex-Jesuit was his first instructor. He studied in Vienna and Berne, and finished his studies at Ellwangen, under the care of his uncle, the suffragan bishop, and was ordained deacon by the Chapter of Olmutz. At this time he was fond of conversing with such as believed in wonders ; and after visiting Rome, where he lived in a Jesuits' College, he returned to Germany, where he was considered by his colleagues as devoted to the interests of Jesuitism, and the inveterate enemy of knowledge. In 1820 he wrote a pamphlet, dedicated to the emperors Francis and Alexander, and the king of Prussia, in which he attempts to prove that none but a true Christian, by which he means a Roman Catholic, can be a faithful subject of government. Having become acquainted with a Baden peasant, Martin Michel, who for several years had the repute of working miraculous cures, he was persuaded by this pretended thaumaturgist, that being a priest, it would be much easier for him to perform miracles! The experiment was made. The Princess Matilda of Schwartzberg, who had been grievously afflicted with a distortion of the spine, from which she had been partially cured by a skilful physician, was called on by the priest and the peasant to walk, and she succeeded. He now tried his powers alone, and multitudes flocked to him for cures. Many were in fact benefited; many believed that they were; and many went away in despair because they could not believe. His attempts in the hospitals of Würzburg and Bamberg failed, and the police were ordered not to allow him to try his experiments, except in their presence. A prince of Hildburghausen called in his aid; but his suffering eyes soon became worse in consequence of his exchanging the use of medicine for faith in the miraculous energies of Hohenlohe. In 1821 he laid a statement of his miracles before the Pope, the answer to which is not known; only it is rumoured that his holiness expressed much doubt respecting them, and hints were received from Rome, that the process should no longer be called the working of miracles, but priestly prayers for healing. Since then he has pretended to cure persons at a distance, and cases have been published of cures performed, in one instance at Marseilles, and in another in Ireland, and several others by appointing an hour in which the individuals should unite their prayers with his. Much has been done by Mr. Hornthal, an officer of Bamberg, towards checking the progress of this delusion. The prince is a person of fine exterior, gentle manners, a most insinuating voice, and good pulpit talents.

HOLINESS, freedom from sin, or the conformity of the heart to God. It does not consist in knowledge, talents, nor outward ceremonies of religion, but hath its seat in the heart, and is the effect of a principle of grace implanted by the Holy Spirit. Eph. ii. 8, 10; John iii. 5; Rom. vi. 22. It is the essence of happiness and the basis of true dignity. Prov. iii. 17; iv. 8. It will manifest itself by the propriety of our conversation, regularity of our temper, and uniformity of our lives. It is a principle progressive in its operation.

Prov. iv. 18, and absolutely essential to the enjoyment of God here and hereafter. Heb. xii. 14. See SANCTIFICATION, WORKS.

HOLINESS OF GOD is the purity and rectitude of his nature. It is an essential attribute of God, and the glory, lustre, and harmony of all his other perfections. Psal. xxvii. 4; Exod. xv. 11. He could not be God without it. Deut. xxxiii. 4. It is infinite and unbounded; it cannot be increased or diminished. Immutable and invariable. Mal. iii. 6. God is originally holy; he is so of and in himself, and the author and promoter of all holiness among his creatures. The holiness of God is visible by his works; he made all things holy. Gen. i. 31. By his providences, all of which are intended to promote holiness in the end. Heb. xii. 10. By his grace, which influences the subjects of it to be holy. Tit. ii. 10, 12. By his word, which commands it. 1 Pet. i. 15. By his ordinances, which he hath appointed for that end. Jer. xlv. 4, 5. By the punishment of sin in the death of Christ, (Is. liii.) and by the eternal punishment of it in wicked men. Matt. xxv. last verse. See ATTRIBUTES.

HOLocaust, formed from ὅλος, "whole," and καίω, "I consume with fire;" a kind of sacrifice wherein the whole burnt-offering was burnt or consumed by fire, as an acknowledgment that God the Creator, Preserver, and Lord of all, was worthy of all honour and worship, and as a token of men's giving themselves entirely up to him. It is called in Scripture a burnt-offering. Sacrifices of this sort are often mentioned by the Heathens as well as Jews. They appear to have been in use long before the institution of the other Jewish sacrifices by the law of Moses. Job i. 5; xlii. 8. Gen. xxii. 13; viii. 20. On this account, the Jews, who would not allow the Gentiles to offer on their altar any other sacrifices peculiarly enjoined by the law of Moses, admitted them by the Jewish priests to offer holocausts, because these were a sort of sacrifices prior to the law, and common to all nations. During their subjection to the Romans, it was no uncommon thing for those Gentiles to offer sacrifices to the God of Israel at Jerusalem. Holocausts were deemed by the Jews the most excellent of all their sacrifices. See SACRIFICE.

HOLY ALLIANCE. See ALLIANCE.

HOLY DAY, a day set apart by the church for the commemoration of some saint, or some remarkable particular in the life of Christ. It has been a question agitated by divines, whether it be proper to appoint or keep any holy days (the sabbath excepted.) The advocates for holy days suppose that they have a tendency to impress the minds of the people with a greater sense of religion; that if the acquisitions and victories of men be celebrated with the highest joy, how much more those events which relate to the salvation of man, such as the birth, death, and reurrection of Christ, &c. On the other side it is observed, that if holy days had been necessary under the present dispensation, Jesus Christ would have ordained something respecting them, whereas he was silent about them; that it is bringing us again into that bondage to ceremonial laws from which Christ freed us; that it is a tacit reflection on the Head of the church in not appointing them; that such days, on the whole, are more pernicious than useful to society, as they open a door for indolence and profaneness; yea, that Scripture speaks against such days. HOLY GHOST, the third person in the Trinity.

I. The Holy Ghost is a real and distinct person in the Godhead. 1. Personal powers of rational understanding and will are ascribed to him, 1 Cor. ii. 10, 11; xii. 11; Eph. iv. 3. 2. He is joined with the other two divine persons, as the object of divine worship and fountain of blessings, Matt. xxviii. 19; 2 Cor. xiii. 14. 3. In the Greek, a masculine article or epithet is joined to his name Pneuma, which is naturally of the neuter gender, John xiv. 26; xv. 26; xvi. 13; Eph. i. 13. 4. He appeared under the emblem of a dove, and of cloven tongues of fire, Matt. iii.; Acts ii. 5. Personal offices of an intercessor belong to him, Rom. viii. 26. 6. He is represented as performing a multitude of personal acts,—as teaching, speaking, witnessing, &c., Mark xiii. 11; Acts xx. 23; Rom. viii. 15, 16; 1 Cor. vi. 19; Acts xv. 28; xvi. 6, 7, &c. &c.

II. It is no less evident that the Holy Ghost is a divine person, equal in power and glory with the Father and Son. 1. Names proper only to the Most High God are ascribed to him; as Jehovah, Acts xxviii. 25, with Is. vi. 9, and Hebrews iii. 7, 9, with Exod. xvii. 7; Jer. xxxi. 31, 34; Heb. x. 15, 16; God, Acts v. 3, 4. Lord, 2 Cor. iii. 17, 19. "The Lord, the Spirit." 2. Attributes proper only to the Most High God are ascribed to him; as Omniscience, 1 Cor. ii. 10, 11; Is. xl. 13, 14. Omnipresence, Ps. cxxxix. 7; Eph. ii. 17, 18; Rom. viii. 26, 27. Omnipotence, Luke i. 35. Eternity, Heb. ix. 14. 3. Divine works are evidently ascribed to him, Gen. ii. 2; Job xxvi. 13; Ps. cxxii. 6; civ. 30. 4. Worship, proper only to God, is required and ascribed to him, Is. vi. 3; Acts xxviii. 25; Rom. ix. 1; Rev. i. 4; 2 Cor. xiii. 14; Matt. xxviii. 19.

III. The agency or work of the Holy Ghost is divided by some into extraordinary and ordinary. The former by immediate inspiration, making men prophets; the latter by his regenerating and sanctifying influences, making men saints. It is only the latter which is now to be expected. This is more particularly displayed in—1. Conviction of sin, John xvi. 8, 9. 2. Conversion, 1 Cor. xii. 13; Eph. i. 17, 18; 1 Cor. ii. 10, 12; John iii. 5, 6. 3. Sanctification, 2 Thess. ii. 13; 1 Cor. vi. 11; Rom. xv. 16. 4. Consolation, John xiv. 16, 26. 5. Direction, John xiv. 17; Rom. viii. 14. 6. Confirmation, Rom. viii. 16, 26; 1 John ii. 24; Eph. i. 13, 14. As to the gift of the Holy Spirit, says a good writer, it is not expected to be bestowed in answer to our prayers, to inform us immediately, as by a whisper, when either awake or asleep, that we are the children of God; or in any other way than by enabling us to exercise repentance and faith and love to God and our neighbour. 2. We are not to suppose that he reveals any thing contrary to the written word, or more than is contained in it, or through any other medium. 3. We are not so led by, or operated upon by the Spirit, as to neglect the means of grace. 4. The Holy Spirit is not promised nor given to render us infallible. 5. Nor is the Holy Spirit given in order that we may do any thing, which was not before our duty. HOLY GHOST, PROCESSION OF. See PROCESSION.

HOLY WATER, in the Greek and Roman Catholic churches, water which has been consecrated by prayer, exorcism, and other ceremonies, for the purpose of sprinkling the faithful, and things used in the church. It is placed, in vases, at the doors of churches, and also within them at certain places, from which the Catholics sprinkle themselves before prayer. Holy water is also often found in their chambers, and is used before prayer, particularly before going to bed. The Romanists consider it an effectual exorcism. In Rome, animals are also sprinkled, on a certain feast, with holy water, to keep them healthy and thriving. The same thing is done at Moscow, where there is a particular church, to which the horses are annually driven on purpose. It does not appear that vessels were placed at the doors of churches, for washing the hands, till the fourth century, or that the water was blessed or consecrated till the sixth.

HOMILY, ὁμιλία, a sermon or discourse upon some point of religion delivered in a plain manner, so as to be easily understood by the common people. The Greek, says M. Fleury, signifies a familiar discourse, like the Latin sermo, and discourses delivered in the church took these denominations, to intimate that they were not harangues, or matters of ostentation and flourish, like those of profane orators, but familiar and useful discourses, as of a master to his disciples, or a father to his children. All the homilies of the Greek and Latin fathers are composed by bishops. We have none of Tertullian, Clemens Alexandrinus, and many other learned persons, because in the early ages none but bishops were admitted to preach. The privilege was not ordinarily allowed to priests till toward the fifth century. St. Chrysostom was the first presbyter that preached statedly. Origen and Augustine also preached, but it was by a peculiar license or privilege.

Photius distinguishes homily from sermon, in that the homily was performed in a more familiar manner; the prelate interrogating and talking to the people, and they in their turn answering and interrogating him, so that it was properly a conversation; whereas the sermon was delivered with more form, and in the pulpit, after the manner of the orators. The practice of compiling homilies which were to be committed to memory, and recited by ignorant or indolent priests, commenced towards the close of the eighth century; when Charlemagne ordered Paul the deacon, and Alcuin, to form homilies or discourses upon the Gospels and Epistles from the ancient doctors of the church. This gave rise to that famous collection entitled the "Homiliarium of Charlemagne;" and which, being followed as a model by many productions of the same kind, composed by private persons, from a principle of pious zeal, contributed much (says Mosheim) to nourish the indolence and to perpetuate the ignorance of a worthless clergy. There are still extant several fine homilies composed by the ancient fathers, particularly St. Chrysostom and St. Gregory. The "Clementine Homilies" are nineteen homilies in Greek, published by Cotelierus, with two letters prefixed; one of them written in the name of Peter, the other in the name of Clement, to James, bishop of Jerusalem; in which last letter they are entitled "Clement's Epitome of the Preaching and Travels of Peter." According to Le Clerc, these homilies were composed by an Ebionite, in the second century; but Montfaucon supposes that they were forged long after the age of St. Athanasius. Dr. Lardner apprehends that the Clementine homilies were the original, or first edition of the "Recognitions;" and that they are the same with the work censured by Eusebius under the title of "Dialogues of Peter and Appion."

Homilies of the Church of England, are those which were composed at the Reformation, to be read in churches, in order to supply the defect of sermons. See the quarto edition of the Homilies, with notes, by a divine of the church of England.

HOMIOUSIANS, a branch of the high Arians, who maintain, that the nature of the Son, though not the same, was similar to that of the Father.

HOMOIOUSIANS, a name applied to the Athanasians, who held the Son to be of the same nature as the Father.

HONOUR, a testimony of esteem or submission, expressed by words and an exterior behaviour, by which we make known the veneration and respect we entertain for any one, on account of his dignity or merit. The word is also used in general for the esteem due to virtue, glory, reputation, and probity; as also, for an exactness in performing whatever we have promised; and in this last sense we use the term, a man of honour. It is also applied to two different kinds of virtue; bravery in men, and chastity in women. In every situation of life, religion only forms the true honour and happiness of man. "It cannot," as one observes, "arise from riches, dignity of rank or office, nor from what are often called splendid actions of heroes, or civil accomplishments; these may be found among men of no real integrity, and may create considerable fame; but a distinction must be made between fame and true honour. The former is a loud and noisy applause: the latter is a more silent and internal homage. Fame floats on the breath of the multitude; honour rests on the judgment of the thinking. In order, then, to discern where true honour lies, we must not look to any adventitious circumstance, not to any single sparkling quality, but to the whole of what forms a man; in a word, we must look to the soul. It will discover itself by a mind superior to fear, to selfish interest, and corruption; by an ardent love to the Supreme Being, and by a principle of uniform rectitude. It will make us neither afraid nor ashamed to discharge our duty, as it relates both to God and man. It will influence us to be magnanimous without being proud; humble without being mean; just without being harsh; simple in our manners, but manly in our feelings. This honour, thus formed by religion, or the love of God, is more independent, and more complete, than what can be acquired by any other means. It is productive of higher felicity, and will be commensurate with eternity itself; while that honour, so called, which arises from any other principle, will resemble the feeble and twinkling flame of a taper, which is often clouded by the smoke it sends forth, but is always wasting and soon dies totally away." Barrow's Works, vol. i. ser. 4; Blair's Sermons, vol. iii. ser. 1; Watts's Sermons, ser. 30, vol. ii.; Ryland's Cont. vol. i. p. 343; Jortin's Sermons, vol. iii. ser. 6.

HOP, is the desire of some good, attended with the possibility, at least, of obtaining it; and is enlivened with joy greater or less, according to the probability there is of possessing the object of our hope. Scarce any passion seems to be more natural to man than hope; and, considering the many troubles he is encompassed with, none is more necessary; for life, void of all hope, would be a heavy and spiritless thing, very little desirable, perhaps hardly to be borne; whereas hope infuses strength into the mind, and, by so doing, lessens the burdens of life. If our condition be not the best in the world, yet we hope it will be better, and this helps us to support it with patience. The hope of the Christian is an expectation of all necessary good both in time and eternity, founded on the promises, relations, and perfections of God, and on the offices, righteousness, and intercession of Christ. It is a compound of desire, expectation, patience, and joy, Rom. viii. 24, 25. It may be considered, 1. As pure, 1 John iii. 2, 3, as it is resident in that heart which is cleansed from sin. 2. As good, 2 Thess. ii. 16, (in distinction from the hope of the hypocrite,) as deriving its origin from God, and centring in him. 3. It is called lively, 1 Pet. i. 3, as it proceeds from spiritual life, and renders one active and lively in good works. 4. It is courageous, Rom. v. 5; 1 Thess. v. 8; because it excites fortitude in all the troubles of life, and yields a support in the hour of death, Prov. xiv. 32. 5. Sure, Heb. vi. 19, because it will not disappoint us, and is fixed on a sure foundation. 6. Joyful, Rom. v. 2, as it produces the greatest felicity in the anticipation of complete deliverance from all evil. Grove's Moral Phil., vol. i. p. 381; Gill's Body of Div., p. 82. vol. iii.; No. 471, Spect.; Jay's Sermons, vol. ii. ser. 2.

HOPKINSIANS, so called from the Rev. Samuel Hopkins, D.D., an American divine, who, in his sermons and tracts, has made several additions to the sentiments first advanced by the celebrated Jonathan Edwards, late president of New Jersey College. Dr. Hopkins was born at Waterbury, in Connecticut, 1721, and graduated at Yale College, in 1741. Soon after, he engaged in theological studies, at Northampton, Massachusetts, under the superintendence of Jonathan Edwards, and, in 1743, was ordained at Honsatonic, now Great Barrington, Massachusetts, where he continued till he removed to Newport, Rhode Island, in consequence of the diminution of his congregation, and his want of support. When he had resided some time in this place, the people became dissatisfied with his sentiments, and resolved, at a meeting, to intimate to him their disinclination to his continuance among them. On the ensuing sabbath, he preached his farewell discourse, which was so interesting and impressive, that they besought him to remain, which he did till his death, in 1803. He was a pious and zealous man, of considerable talents, and almost incredible powers of application. He is said to have been sometimes engaged during eighteen hours in his studies. His doctrinal views are contained in his "System of Divinity," published in a second edition at Boston, in 1811, in two vols. 8vo.

The following is a summary of the distinguishing tenets of the Hopkinsians, together with a view of the reasons they bring forward in support of their sentiments.

I. That all true virtue, or real holiness, consists in disinterested benevolence. The object of benevolence is universal being, including God and all intelligent creatures. It wishes and seeks the good of every individual, so far as is consistent with the greatest good of the whole, which is comprised in the glory of God and the perfection and happiness of his kingdom. The law of God is the standard of all moral rectitude or holiness. This is reduced into love to God, and our neighbour as ourselves; and universal good-will comprehends all the love to God, our neighbour, and ourselves, required in the divine law, and therefore must be the whole of holy obedience. Let any serious person think what are the particular branches of true piety; when he has viewed each one by itself, he will find that disinterested friendly affection is its distinguishing characteristic. For instance, all the holiness in pious fear, which distinguishes it from the fear of the wicked, consists in love. Again, holy gratitude is nothing but good-will to God and our neighbour, in which we ourselves are included; and correspondent affection, excited by a view of the good-will and kindness of God. Universal good-will also implies the whole of the duty we owe to our neighbour, for justice, truth, and faithfulness, are comprised in universal benevolence; so are temperance and chastity. For an undue indulgence of our appetites and passions is contrary to benevolence, as tending to hurt ourselves or others; and so opposite to the general good, and the divine command, in which all the crime of such indulgence consists. In short, all virtue is nothing but benevolence acted out in its proper nature and perfection; or love to God and our neighbour, made perfect in all its genuine exercises and expressions.

II. That all sin consists in selfishness. By this is meant an interested, selfish affection, by which a person sets himself up as supreme, and the only object of regard: and nothing is good or lovely in his view, unless suited to promote his own private interest. This self-love is, in its whole nature, and every degree of it, enmity against God: it is not subject to the law of God, and is the only affection that can oppose it. It is the foundation of all spiritual blindness, and therefore the source of all the open idolatry in the heathen world, and false religion under the light of the Gospel; all this is agreeable to that self-love which opposes God's true character. Under the influence of this principle, men depart from truth; it being itself the greatest practical lie in nature, as it sets up that which is comparatively nothing above universal existence. Self-love is the source of all profaneness and impiety in the world, and of all pride and ambition among men, which is nothing but selfishness, acted out in this particular way. This is the foundation of all covetousness and sensuality, as it blinds people's eyes, contracts their hearts, and sinks them down, so that they look upon earthly enjoyments as the greatest good. This is the source of all falsehood, injustice, and oppression, as it excites mankind by undue methods to invade the property of others. Self-love produces all the violent passions—envy, wrath, clamour, and evil-speaking; and every thing contrary to the divine law is briefly comprehended in this fruitful source of all iniquity—self-love.

III. That there are no promises of regenerating grace made to the doings of the unregenerate. For as far as men act from self-love, they act from a bad end; for those who have no true love to God, really do no duty when they attend on the externals of religion. And as the unregenerate act from a selfish principle, they do nothing which is commanded: their impenitent doings are wholly opposed to repentance and conversion; therefore not implied in the command to repent, &c.: so far from this, they are altogether disobedient to the command. Hence it appears that there are no promises of salvation to the doings of the unregenerate.

IV. That the impotency of sinners, with respect to believing in Christ, is not natural, but moral; for it is a plain dictate of common sense, that natural impossibility excludes all blame. But an unwilling mind is universally considered as a crime, and not as an excuse, and is the very thing wherein our wickedness consists. That the impotence of the sinner is owing to a disaffection of heart, is evident from the promises of the gospel. When any object of good is proposed and promised to us upon asking, it clearly evinces that there can be no impotence in us with respect to obtaining it, beside the disapprobation of the will; and that inability, which consists in disinclination, never renders any thing improperly the subject of precept or command.

V. That, in order to faith in Christ, a sinner must approve in his heart of the divine conduct, even though God should cast him off for ever; which, however, neither implies love of misery, nor hatred of happiness. For if the law is good, death is due to those who have broken it. The Judge of all the earth cannot but do right. It would bring everlasting reproach upon his government to spare us, considered merely as in ourselves. When this is felt in our hearts, and not till then, we shall be prepared to look to the free grace of God, through the redemption which is in Christ, and to exercise faith in his blood, who is set forth to be a propitiation to declare God's righteousness, that he might be just, and yet be the justifier of him who believeth in Jesus.

VI. That the infinitely wise and holy God has exerted his omnipotent power in such a manner as he purposed should be followed with the existence and entrance of moral evil into the system. For it must be admitted on all hands, that God has a perfect knowledge, foresight, and view of all possible existences and events. If that system and scene of operation, in which moral evil should never have existed, was actually preferred in the divine mind, certainly the Deity is infinitely disappointed in the issue of his own operations. Nothing can be more dishonourable to God than to imagine that the system which is actually formed by the divine hand, and which was made for his pleasure and glory, is yet not the fruit of wise contrivance and design.

VII. That the introduction of sin is, upon the whole, for the general good. For the wisdom and power of the Deity are displayed in carrying on designs of the greatest good; and the existence of moral evil has undoubtedly occasioned a more full, perfect, and glorious discovery of the infinite perfections of the divine nature than could otherwise have been made to the view of creatures. If the extensive manifestation of the pure and holy nature of God, and his infinite aversion to sin, and all his inherent perfections, in their genuine fruits and effects, is either itself the greatest good, or necessarily contains it, it must necessarily follow that the introduction of sin is for the greatest good.

VIII. That repentance is before faith in Christ. By this is not intended, that repentance is before a speculative belief of the being and perfections of God, and of the person and character of Christ; but only that true repentance is previous to a saving faith in Christ, in which the believer is united to Christ, and entitled to the benefits of his mediation and atonement. That repentance is before faith in this sense, appears from several considerations. 1. As repentance and faith respect different objects, so they are distinct exercises of the heart; and therefore one not only may, but must be prior to the other. 2. There may be genuine repentance of sin without faith in Christ, but there cannot be true faith in Christ without repentance of sin, and since repentance is necessary in order to faith in Christ, it must necessarily be prior to faith in Christ. 3. John the Baptist, Christ and his apostles, taught that repentance is before faith. John cried, "Repent, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand;" intimating, that true repentance was necessary in order to embrace the gospel of the kingdom. Christ commanded, "Repent ye, and believe the gospel." And Paul preached "repentance toward God, and faith toward our Lord Jesus Christ."

IX. That though men became sinners by

Adam, according to a divine constitution, yet they have, and are accountable for no sins but personal; for—1. Adam's act, in eating the forbidden fruit, was not the act of his posterity: therefore they did not sin at the same time he did. 2. The sinfulness of that act could not be transferred to them afterwards, because the sinfulness of an act can no more be transferred from one person to another than an act itself. 3. Therefore Adam's act, in eating the forbidden fruit, was not the cause, but only the occasion of his posterity's being sinners. God was pleased to make a constitution, that, if Adam remained holy through his state of trial, his posterity should in consequence be holy also; but if he sinned, his posterity should in consequence be sinners likewise. Adam sinned, and now God brings his posterity into the world sinners. By Adam's sin we are become sinners, not for it; his sin being only the occasion, not the cause of our committing sins.

X. That though believers are justified through Christ's righteousness, yet his righteousness is not transferred to them. For—1. Personal righteousness can no more be transferred from one person to another, than personal sin. 2. If Christ's personal righteousness were transferred to believers, they would be as perfectly holy as Christ; and so stand in no need of forgiveness. 3. But believers are not conscious of having Christ's personal righteousness, but feel and bewail much indwelling sin and corruption. 4. The Scripture represents believers as receiving only the benefits of Christ's righteousness in justification, or their being pardoned and accepted for Christ's righteousness' sake, and this is the proper Scripture notion of imputation. Jonathan's righteousness was imputed to Mephibosheth when David showed kindness to him for his father Jonathan's sake.

The Hopkinsians warmly contend for the doctrine of the divine decrees, that of particular election, total depravity, the special influences of the Spirit of God in regeneration, justification by faith alone, the final perseverance of the saints, and the consistency between entire freedom and absolute dependence; and therefore claim it as their just due, since the world will make distinctions, to be called Hopkinsian Calvinists. Adam's View of Religions; Hopkins on Holiness; Edwards on the Will, p. 234, 282; Edwards on Virtue; West's Essay on Moral Agency, p. 170, 181; Spring's Nature of Duty, p. 23; Moral Disquisitions, p. 40.

HORROR, a passion excited by an object which causes a high degree of fear and detestation. It is a compound of wonder and fear. Sometimes it has a mixture of pleasure, from which, if predominant, it is denominated a pleasing horror. Such a horror seizes us at the view of vast and hanging precipices, a tempestuous ocean, or wild and solitary places. This passion is the original of superstition, as a wise and well-tempered awe is of religion. Horror and terror seem almost to be synonymous; but the former refers more to what disgusts; the latter to that which alarms us.

HORSLEY, SAMUEL, a learned dignitary of the church of England. His father, who was a clergyman, held the curacy of St. Martin's in the Fields, London; in which parish the son was born, in October, 1733. He was educated at Westminster School, and Trinity Hall, Cambridge, where he took the degree of LL.B. in 1758. The same year, having been ordained, he became curate to his father, then rector of Newington Butts, which benefice he resigned to his son, in 1759, who retained it till his promotion to the see of Rochester. In 1767 he was chosen a fellow of the Royal Society; and the same year he published an elaborate treatise, entitled, "The Power of God, deduced from the computable instantaneous production of it in the Solar System." 8vo. In 1768 he went to Christchurch, Oxford, as private tutor to Lord Guernsey, eldest son of the Earl of Aylesford; and at that university he took the degree of LL.D. In 1770 was printed at the Clarendon press, his earliest mathematical publication, "Apollonii Pergæi Inclinationum, libri ii." In November, 1773, he was elected secretary to the Royal Society; and not long after the Earl of Aylesford presented him to the rectory of Albury, in Surrey, which he held by dispensation, together with that of Newington. In 1774 he published "Remarks on the Observations made in the last voyage towards the North Pole, for discovering the Acceleration of the Pendulum, in lat. 79 deg. 50 min. in a letter to the Honourable C. J. Phipps," quarto. In 1776 he published proposals for a new edition of the works of Sir Isaac Newton, which was gradually completed in five volumes, quarto. His great diligence and proficiency in various sciences now procured him the patronage of Bishop Lowth, who made him his chaplain, and collated him to a prebend in St. Paul's Cathedral. In 1779 he resigned Albury, and the next year obtained the living of Thorley. He was appointed archdeacon of St. Alban's in 1781, and early in 1782 vicar of South Weald, in Essex; on which he resigned both Thorley and Newington. He engaged warmly in the contest carried on in 1783 and 1784 with Sir Joseph Banks, respecting his conduct as president of the Royal Society; and delivered several very eloquent speeches on the occasion, printed with others in "An Authentic Narrative of the Dissensions of the Royal Society," 1784.

Dr. Horsley withdrew from the Society in consequence of a certain high appointment taking place, of which he did not approve. His concluding words, on retiring, were, "I quit that temple where philosophy once presided, and where Newton was her officiating minister." About the same period he commenced a literary controversy with the great champion of Unitarianism, Dr. Priestley. His labours in the cause of orthodoxy, on this occasion, procured him the friendly patronage of the Lord Chancellor Thurlow, who characteristically remarked, that "those who defended the church ought to be supported by the church;" and accordingly presented him to a prebendal stall in the cathedral of Gloucester; and, in 1788, he was, through the same interest, made bishop of St. David's.

In his episcopal character, he supported the reputation for learning and ability which he had previously acquired. His first charge to the clergy, delivered in 1790, attracted great approbation; as did also his speech in the House of Lords, on the catholic bill, May 31st, 1791. On these, as well as on other occasions, he showed himself the strenuous advocate for the existing state of things, in religion and politics; and the merit of his conduct will, accordingly, be differently appreciated with reference to the various opinions of different persons; but none can deny the ability with which he advocated the cause he had adopted. His zeal did not go unrewarded. He was promoted to the see of Rochester in 1793, and made Dean of Westminster; and in 1802 he was translated to St. Asaph's. He died at Brighton, October 4th, 1806, and was interred at Newington Butts. Bishop Horsley, at one period, became quite an alarmist; and some incautious and perhaps intemperate speeches, which he uttered in the House of Peers, during the discussion of Lord Grenville's bill, &c. exposed him to a good deal of censure; but he may, at least, claim the praise of consistency of conduct, as an enemy of innovation; and he was probably honest and sincere, if not wholly disinterested, in his denunciations against religious and political heresy and heretics. Besides the works noticed, he was the author of "Critical Disquisitions on the Eighteenth Chapter of Isaiah," 4to.; "Hosea, a new Translation, with Notes," 4to.; a "Translation of the Psalms," 2 vols.; "Biblical Criticisms," 4 vols. 8vo. all of which contain abundant proofs that he was one of the most adroit and powerful critics of his age. Sermons; Charges; elementary Treatises on the Mathematics, on the Prosodies of the Greek and Latin Languages; and papers in the Philosophical Transactions.—Nichols's Lit. Anec.

Dr. Horsley has been, not inaptly, described as the last of the race of episcopal giants of the Warburtonian school. He was a man of an original and powerful mind, of very extensive learning, and profoundly versed in the article of ecclesiastical history, of which he gave ample evidence in his controversy with Dr. Priestley, while archdeacon of St. Albans. His sermons and critical disquisitions frequently display a rich fund of theological acumen, and of successful illustration of the sacred writings; but his temper did not exhibit much of the meekness and gentleness of his Divine Master; and he was too fond of meddling in political discussions, for which he did not escape the censure of Mr. Pitt.—Jones's Christ. Biog.

HOSANNA, in the Hebrew ceremonies, a prayer which they rehearsed on the several days of the feast of tabernacles. The Heb. הושיע נא Hoshiah-na, signifies, "save now;" or, "save we pray." There are divers of these hosannas; the Jews call them hoschanoth, i. e. hosannahs. Some are rehearsed on the first day, others on the second, &c. which they call hosanna of the first day, hosanna of the second day, &c. Hosanna Rabba, or Grand Hosanna, is a name they give to their feast of tabernacles, which lasts eight days; because, during the course thereof, they are frequently calling for the assistance of God, the forgiveness of their sins, and his blessing on the new year; and to that purpose they make great use of the prayers above mentioned. The Jews also apply the terms hosanna rabba in a more peculiar manner to the seventh day of the feast of tabernacles, because they apply themselves more immediately on that day to invoke the divine blessing, &c.

HOSPITALITY, kindness exercised in the entertainment of strangers. This virtue, we find, is explicitly commanded by, and makes a part of the morality of the New Testament. Indeed, that religion which breathes nothing but charity, and whose tendency is to expand the heart, and call forth the benevolent exertions of mankind, must evidently embrace the practice. If it be asked, of whom is this required? it is answered, that the principle is required of all, though the duty itself can only be practised by those whose circumstances will admit of it. Dr. Stennett, in his discourse on this subject (Domestic Duties, ser. 10.) justly observes, that hospitality is a species of charity to which every one is not competent. But the temper from which it proceeds, I mean a humane, generous, benevolent temper, that ought to prevail in every breast. Some are miserably poor, and it is not to be expected that their doors should be thrown open to entertain strangers; yet the cottage of the peasant may exhibit noble specimens of hospitality. Here distress has often met with pity, and the persecuted an asylum. Nor is there a man who has a house to sleep in, but may be benevolent to strangers. But there are persons of certain characters and stations who are more especially obliged to it; as, particularly, magistrates and others in civil offices, who would forfeit the esteem of the public, and greatly injure their usefulness, were they not to observe the rites of hospitality. Ministers also, and such Christians as are qualified by their particular offices in the church, and their affluent circumstances, may be eminently useful in this way. The two grand virtues which ought to be studied by every one, in order that he may have it in his power to be hospitable, are industry and economy. But it may be asked again, to whom is this duty to be practised? The answer is, to strangers: but here it is necessary to observe, that the term strangers hath two acceptations. It is to be understood of travellers, or persons who come from a distance, and with whom we have little or no acquaintance; and more generally of all who are not of our house,—strangers, as opposed to domestics. Hospitality is especially to be practised to the poor; they who have no houses of their own, or possess few of the conveniences of life, should occasionally be invited to our houses, and refreshed at our tables. Luke xiv. 13, 14. Hospitality also may be practised to those who are of the same character and of the same community with ourselves. As to the various offices of hospitality, and the manner in which they should be rendered, it must be observed, that the entertainments should be plentiful, frugal, and cordial. Gen. xviii. 6, 8. John xii. 3. Luke xv. 17. The obligations to this duty arise from the fitness and reasonableness of it; it brings its own reward. Acts xx. 35. It is expressly commanded by God, Lev. xxv. 35, 38; Luke xvi. 19; xiv. 13, 14; Rom. xii. Heb. xiii. 1, 2; 1 Pet. iv. 9. We have many striking examples of hospitality on divine record: Abraham, Gen. xviii. 1, 8. Lot, Gen. xix. 1, 3; Job xxxi. 17, 22. The Shunamite, 2 Kings iv. 8, 13. The hospitable man mentioned in Judges xix. 16, 21. David, 2 Sam. vi. 19. Obadiah, 1 Kings xviii. 4. Nehemiah, Neh. v. 17, 18. Martha, Luke x. 38. Mary, Matt. xxvi. 6, 13. The primitive Christians, Acts ii. 45, 46. Priscilla and Aquila, Acts xviii. 26. Lydia, Acts xvi. 15, &c. &c. Lastly, what should have a powerful effect on our minds, is the consideration of divine hospitality. God is good to all, and his tender mercies are over all his works. His sun shines and his rain falls on the evil as well as the good. His very enemies share of his bounty. He gives liberally to all men, and upbraids not; but especially we should remember the exceeding riches of his grace, in his kindness towards us through Christ Jesus. Let us lay all these considerations together, and then ask ourselves whether we can find it in our hearts to be selfish, parsimonious, and inhospitable?

Host, (from the Latin Hostia, a victim or sacrifice, in the Church of Rome,) a name given to the elements used in the eucharist, or rather to the consecrated wafer, which they pretend to offer up every day, as a new host or sacrifice for the sins of mankind. They pay adoration to the host upon a false presumption that the elements are no longer bread and wine, but transubstantiated into the real body and blood of Christ. See TRANSUBSTANTIATION. Pope Gregory IX. first decreed a bell to be rung, as a signal for the people to betake themselves to the adoration of the host. The vessel wherein the hosts are kept is called the cibory, being a large kind of covered chalice.

HUGUENOTS, a term of uncertain origin, which was given, by way of contempt, to the French Protestants. Though Francis I. used every effort to prevent the principles of the Reformation from spreading in France, and persecuted the Calvinists, by whom they were most zealously propagated; yet they took root, in the same proportion as they were attempted to be suppressed. The persecutions of such as professed them, were frequently most cruel and bloody; owing to the cupidity of certain parties at court, who thought to enrich themselves by seizing on the estates of the heretics. Under Francis II. the Huguenots were made a hand-ball to gratify the political intriguers of the day. They were dreadfully harassed by the princes of the house of Guise, through whose influence a chamber of parliament was established, called the burning chamber, the duty of which was to convict and burn heretics. Still they suffered in a most exemplary manner; and would not have thought of a rebellion had they not been encouraged to it, in 1560, by a prince of the blood, Louis of Condé, to whom they leagued themselves, having previously consulted lawyers and theologians, both in France and Germany, as to the legality of such a measure. In pursuance of their plan, it was determined, that on an appointed day, a certain number of Calvinists should appear before the king at Blois, to present a petition for the free exercise of their religion; and in case this request was denied, as it was foreseen it would be, a chosen band of armed Protestants were to make themselves masters of the city of Blois, seize the Guises, and compel the king to name the Prince of Condé regent of the realm. The plot, however, was betrayed, and most of the armed conspirators were executed or imprisoned. The contest between the two parties became yet more violent, in the reign of Charles IX., but from motives of policy, the Protestants were allowed the privilege of toleration, chiefly owing to the influence of the Queen Mother; but her instability and intrigues, at last, only rendered their case the more deplorable, and produced the horrible St. Bartholomew massacre, in 1572. See BARTHOLOMEW'S DAY. After many struggles, they had their civil rights secured to them by the edict of Nantz, in 1598, which gave them equal claims with the Catholics to all offices and dignities, and left them in possession of the fortresses which had been ceded to them. In the reign of Louis XIII., they were again molested, again took to arms, but were again worsted, and ultimately obliged to surrender all their strong holds. They were now left to the mercy of the monarch; but were not disturbed till Louis XIV., led on by his confessor and Madame de Maintenon, was induced to persecute them, with a view to bring them back to the true church. In 1681, he deprived them of most of their civil rights, and sent large bodies of dragoons into the provinces to compel them to renounce their principles. Though the frontiers were vigilantly guarded, upwards of 500,000 Huguenots made their escape to Switzerland, Germany, Holland, and England. Supposing them either to be extirpated or converted to Catholicism, Louis revoked the edict of Nantes in 1685. Since that time, at which there were still half a million of them in France, they have alternately enjoyed repose, and been the subjects of alarm and persecution. In 1746 they ventured to appear publicly in Languedoc and Dauphiny; and as the principles of toleration and general liberty matured, they gradually recovered their place in society, till at last the revolution placed them on the same footing with their fellow-citizens. The troubles, attended with bloodshed, which occurred at Nismes, soon after the restoration, were merely accidental, and were suppressed by the judicious measures of government.

HUMANITARIANS, those who believe in the simple humanity of Christ, or that he was nothing more than a mere man, born according to the usual course of nature, and who lived and died according to the ordinary circumstances of mankind. See SOCINIANS.

HUMANITY, the exercise of the social and benevolent virtues; a fellow-feeling for the distresses of another. It is properly called humanity, because there is little or nothing of it in brutes. The social affections are conceived by all to be more refined than the selfish. Sympathy and humanity are universally esteemed the finest temper of mind; and for that reason the prevalence of the social affections in the progress of society is held to be a refinement of our nature. Kaims's El. of Crit., p. 104, vol. i.; Robinson's Sermon on Christianity a System of Humanity; Pratt's Poem on Humanity.

HUMANITY OF CHRIST is his possessing a true human body, and a true human soul, which he assumed for the purpose of rendering his mediation effectual to our salvation. See JESUS CHRIST.

HUMANITY, SINFUL, a term recently introduced by Mr. Irving, late of the Scotch Church, London, in reference to the human nature of our Lord; respecting which he maintains, in opposition to the express statements of Scripture, that it possessed sinful properties, dispositions, and inclinations, till the period of his resurrection; when, having condemned sin in his flesh, he entered into glory in flesh free from sin, and consequently free from death and corruption.

HUMILIATION OF CHRIST is that state of meanness and distress to which he voluntarily descended for the purpose of executing his mediatorial work. This appears, 1. In his birth. He was born of a woman—a sinful woman; though he was without sin, Gal. iv. 4. A poor woman, Luke ii. 7, 24. In a poor country village, John i. 46. In a stable, an abject place. Of a nature subject to infirmities, Heb. ii. 9; hunger, thirst, weariness, pain, &c. 2. In his circumstances;—laid in a manger when he was born; lived in obscurity for a long time; probably worked at the trade of a carpenter; had not a place where to lay his head; and was oppressed with poverty while he went about preaching the gospel. 3. It appeared in his reputation;—he was loaded with the most abusive railing and calumny, Isa. liii.; the most false accusations, Matt. xxvi. 59, 67; and the most ignominious ridicule, Psal. xxii. 6; Matt. xxii. 63; John vii. 35. 4. In his soul he was often tempted, Matt. iv. 1, &c.; Heb. ii. 17, 18; Heb. iv. 15; grieved with the reproaches cast on himself, and with the sins and miseries of others, Heb. xii. 3; Matt. xi. 19; John xi. 35; was burdened with the hidings of his Father's face, and the fears and impressions of his wrath, Psal. xxii. 1; Luke xxii. 43; Heb. v. 7. 5. In his death:—scourged, crowned with thorns, received gall and vinegar to drink, and was crucified between two thieves, Luke xxiii.; John xix.; Mark xv. 24, 25. 6. In his burial;—not only was he born in another man's house, but he was buried in another man's tomb; for he had no tomb of his own, or family vault to be interred in, Isa. liii. 10, &c.; Matt. xii. 46. The humiliation of Christ was necessary, 1. To execute the purpose of God, and covenant engagements of Christ, Acts ii. 23, 24; Psal. xl. 6—8. 2. To fulfil the manifold types and predictions of the Old Testament. 3. To satisfy the broken law of God, and procure eternal redemption for us, Isa. liii.; Heb. ix. 12, 15. 4. To leave us an unspotted pattern of holiness and patience under suffering. Gill's Body of Div., p. 66, vol. ii.; Brown's Nat. and Rev. Religion, p. 357; Ridgley's Body of Div., qu. 48.

HUMILITY, a disposition of mind wherein a person has a low opinion of himself and his advantages. It is a branch of internal worship, or of experimental religion and godliness. It is the effect of divine grace operating on the soul, and always characterises the true Christian. The heathen philosophers were so little acquainted with this virtue, that they had no name for it: what they meant by the word we use, was meanness and baseness of mind. To consider this grace a little more particularly, it may be observed, 1. That humility does not oblige a man to wrong the truth or himself by entertaining a meaner or worse opinion of himself than he deserves. 2. Nor does it oblige a man, right or wrong, to give every body else the preference to himself. A wise man cannot believe himself inferior to the ignorant multitude; nor the virtuous man that he is not so good as those whose lives are vicious. 3. Nor does it oblige a man to treat himself with contempt in his words or actions: it looks more like affectation than humility, when a man says such things in his own disparage as others know, or he himself believes to be false; and it is plain also, that this is often done merely as a bait to catch the praises of others. Humility consists, 1. In not attributing to ourselves any excellence or good which we have not. 2. In not over-rating any thing we do. 3. In not taking an immoderate delight in ourselves. 4. In not assuming more of the praise of a quality or action than belongs to us. 5. In an inward sense of our many imperfections and sins. 6. In ascribing all we have and are to the grace of God. True humility will express itself, 1. By the modesty of our appearance. The humble man will consider his age, abilities, character, function, &c., and act accordingly. 2. By the modesty of our pursuits. We shall not aim at any thing above our strength, but prefer a good to a great name. 3. It will express itself by the modesty of our conversation and behaviour: we shall not be loquacious, obstinate, forward, envious, discontented, or ambitious. The advantages of humility are numerous;—1. It is well-pleasing to God, 1 Pet. iii. 4. 2. It has great influence on us in the performance of all other duties, praying, hearing, converse, &c. 3. It indicates that more grace shall be given, James iv. 6; Psal. xxv. 9. 4. It preserves the soul in great tranquillity and contentment, Psal. lxxix. 32, 33. 5. It makes us patient and resigned under afflictions, Job i. 22. 6. It enables us to exercise moderation in every thing. To obtain this excellent spirit, we should remember, 1. The example of Christ, Phil. ii. 6—8. 2. That heaven is a place of humility, Rev. v. 8. 3. That our sins are numerous, and deserve the greatest punishment, Lam. iii. 39. 4. That humility is the way to honour, Prov. xvi. 18. 5. That the greatest promises of good are made to the humble, Isa. lvii. 15; lvi. 2; 1 Pet. v. 5; Psal. cxlvii. 6; Matt. v. 5. Grove's Mor. Phil., vol. ii. p. 286; Evans's Christian Temper, vol. i. ser. 1; Watts on Humility; Baxter's Christian Directory, v. i. p. 496; Hale's Cont. p. 110; Gill's Body of Div., p. 151, vol. iii.; Walker's Sermons, vol. iv. ser. 3.

HUSBAND, DUTIES OF. See MARRIAGE STATE.

HUNTINGDON, COUNTESS OF, the founder of the denomination of Christians bearing her name, was the daughter of Washington, earl of Ferrers, and was born August 24, 1707. When very young, her mind was impressed with the importance of religion, and she frequently retired to her chamber to supplicate the favour and blessing of God. At the age of twenty-one she was married to Theophilus, earl of Huntingdon, and was thus connected with a family distinguished alike for piety and respectability. She attended on the ministry of the celebrated George Whitefield; and although Lord Huntingdon entertained different opinions, he did not oppose such attendance, deeming the rights of conscience as sacred and unalienable. To Mr. Whitefield she was particularly attached, and warmly supported the erection of chapels, and the diffusion of those principles and opinions which he professed and inculcated. Lady Huntingdon, after the death of Lord H., devoted a great part of her large property to the building of chapels in London and throughout Wales; and for the supply of which she first confined herself to the ministers of the Established Church, as her preachers, many of whom accepted her invitation, and laboured in the places which she had opened; but finding that the ministers, who before laboured for her, were unequal to the task, she determined on erecting a college in South Wales, for the purpose of providing, successively, able and pious teachers. That college, and an accompanying chapel, in the parish of Talgarth, in Brecknockshire, was erected in the year 1768. From that seminary many students emanated, not indeed celebrated for their learning, but many of them for their piety and devotedness to God. They were itinerant—moved from congregation to congregation, in an established rotation; and she alone maintained a correspondence with them, by which she regulated and provided a constant supply. In 1769 she erected a chapel at Tunbridge Wells; and a large building at Spaffields, London, called the Pantheon, which had been erected for the entertainment of parties of pleasure, especially on the Sabbath day, she purchased for religious worship, and it was first opened in 1777. In that chapel, the Rev. Herbert Jones, and William Taylor, officiated as clergymen; and as some alterations had been made by the Countess in the liturgy, although the episcopalian mode of worship was used, a suit was instituted against them, by the minister of the parish of Clerkenwell, in the consistorial court of the Bishop of London. That court determined, that if they proceeded in preaching there any longer, they should be expelled from the church. The threatened expulsion did not intimidate them; and they, with several other clergymen, seceded from the establishment, and put themselves under the protection of the Toleration Act. Those clergymen drew up, and subscribed the Confession of Faith, which was afterwards signed by all the ministers of her ladyship's connexion, and by candidates for ordination. The first six were ordained in Spa Fields Chapel, in 1783. Some years afterwards, she purchased another large place in Whitechapel which had been intended for a theatre, but which, with a few alterations, she converted into a place of worship, and which is now called Sion Chapel. The companions of Lady Huntingdon, for many years, were Miss Scutt, and Lady Ann Erskine, who co-operated with her for several years in all her exertions. Notwithstanding the prodigious efforts of this lady, she lived to the age of eighty-four, and died at her house in Spa Fields, on June 17, 1791: her body was buried in the family vault, at Ashby-de-la-Zouch, in Leicestershire. The seminary in Wales ceased at her death, the lease being just expired; but a new college has been erected at Cheshunt, in Hertfordshire, in which a number of students are yearly educated. The temper of Lady Huntingdon was warm and sanguine; her predilections and prejudices were too hastily adopted, and she therefore frequently formed conclusions not correspondent with truth and wisdom. Notwithstanding such failings, she was distinguished for a fervent zeal to propagate the gospel of Jesus Christ; and multitudes have, doubtless, through her instrumentality, been converted.

HUNTINGTON, WILLIAM, S. S. (Sinner Saved), a notorious Antinomian preacher in London, towards the end of the eighteenth century. He was the son of a farmer's labourer in Kent, and passed the early part of his life in menial service, and in the occupation of a coal-heaver. Having been reclaimed from dissipated and irreligious courses, he became a zealous preacher; and, though a man of little education, he possessed considerable natural talent, and soon succeeded in drawing together a large body of followers; to whom, in the most familiar and popular—but frequently in the most absurd, eccentric and unwarrantable manner—he expounded the Scriptures; crying down all other ministers as unsound in the faith, and exalting his own system as the paragon of gospel divinity. Travelling throughout the country, he collected disciples wherever he went; and there still exist a considerable number of chapels, especially in Sussex, in which his Antinomian tenets continue to be taught. After having lost his first wife by death, Mr. H. married the wealthy relict of Sir James Saunderson, a London alderman, and passed the latter part of his life in affluence. His publications are very numerous, and some of them contain curious details relative to his personal history and experience.

HUSS, JOHN, the celebrated Bohemian reformer, was born near Prague, in Bohemia, about the year 1376, at a village called Husinez, upon the borders of the Black Forest. His parents were not affluent, but his father paid great attention to his education, which he improved by his strong mental capacities, and by close application to his studies in the University of Prague, where he obtained the degree of Bachelor of Arts in 1393, Master of Arts in 1395, and Bachelor in Divinity in 1408. During the course of his university honours, he also obtained a benefice. John Mulhey, a person of large fortune in Prague, erected a chapel, which he called Bethlehem; and, having amply endowed it, appointed Huss as minister. Huss was at this time a Catholic. The opinions of Wickliffe, though then extending, had not reached Bohemia. Having, about the year 1382, perused, through the medium of a young Bohemian nobleman, the writings of Wickliffe, his mind was greatly impressed by them; and he would call him an angel sent from heaven to enlighten mankind. He would mention, among his friends, his meeting with the works of that reformer, as the most fortunate circumstance of his life. From this time, both in the schools and in the pulpit, he would inveigh with great warmth against ecclesiastical abuses; point out the bad government of the church, and the bad lives of the clergy; and lament the state of the people who were under the government of the one, and the influence of the other. The state of religion in Bohemia was, indeed, at that time very low; it was the subject of barter, and the clergy were the most corrupt; Huss, therefore, attracted not only notice, but attention. The followers of Huss became numerous; many members of the university followed him. The works of Wickliffe were translated into the Sclavonian tongue, and read with great attention in every part of Bohemia; and as soon as Pope Alexander V. was seated in the chair, observing the diffusion of Protestant principles and writings, he issued a bull, directed to the archbishop of Prague, ordering him to collect the writings of Wickliffe, and to apprehend and imprison his followers. By virtue of that bull, the archbishop condemned the writings of Wickliffe, proceeded against four doctors who had not delivered up their copies of his writings, and prohibited them from again preaching. Huss, with some other members of that university, protested against those measures; and on the 25th of June, 1410, entered a new appeal from the sentences of the archbishop. This affair was carried before Pope John XXIII., in consequence of the previous death of Alexander; and John granted a commission to cite Huss personally to appear at Rome, to answer the accusations made against him. Huss requested to be excused from attending personally. Three proctors subsequently appeared for him before Cardinal Colonna, who was elected pope in 1417. The proctors apologized for the absence of Huss, but expressed their willingness to answer in his behalf; but Cardinal Colonna declared Huss contumacious, and excommunicated him accordingly. The proctors then appealed to the pope: he appointed certain cardinals to draw up a process of the whole matter, and they not only confirmed the sentence of Colonna, but carrying it further, excommunicated not only Huss, but all his friends and disciples.

This treatment had no tendency to lessen the popularity of Huss. His sufferings increased his influence; and multitudes of all ranks, either impelled by gratitude or by compassion, hastened to enlist themselves in his cause. Thus supported, he did not despond; and, although he was prohibited from preaching, he continued to discharge every other branch of the pastoral office; and, among other plans adopted by him, he gave out questions, which he encouraged the people to discuss in private, and to come to him with their difficulties. Thus disappointed and chagrined in his attempts to suppress the reformed, the new archbishop convened a council of doctors, who drew up and published some articles against Huss and his adherents. But to them he wrote a spirited and judicious reply. Soon after this performance, Huss published another piece against the usurpations of the court of Rome; and to this the archbishop and council replied. But with writing alone they were dissatisfied, and therefore applied to the pope for assistance, who merely recommended the subject to the king of Bohemia. The letters which Huss wrote at this time are very numerous. He justified Wickliffe's book on the Trinity, and defended the character of that reformer against a charge brought by a man of the name of Stokes, and others, who accused him of disobedience. He also wrote many discourses against the peculiar doctrines of the Catholic Church.

About this time Peter of Dresden was obliged to fly from Saxony, and seek a refuge at Prague, where he encouraged a priest of St. Michael's chapel to preach up the establishment of the communion under the species of wine. Huss embraced these sentiments, and for which he was exposed to persecution; but eventually the Hussites were permitted to continue their sermons, and their sentiments became general. In 1412, Huss left his retirement, and returned to Prague. Pope John XXIII. at this time published his bulls against the king of Naples, ordering a crusade against him, and granting indulgences to all who engaged in that war. Huss declaimed against such bulls, crusades, and indulgences. The populace espoused the opinions of Huss: the magistrates imprisoned and persecuted them, and a massacre ensued; but through the whole affair he displayed a true Christian spirit. Immediately after that melancholy affair, Huss retired to his native place, where he lived protected by the principal persons of the country. Thither some of the most eminent men of every country resorted, to obtain his directions, his assistance, and his advice. During his retreat at Hussineze, he spent much of his time in writing. There he wrote his treatise "Upon the Church;" his paper entitled "The Six Errors," levelled against indulgences, simony, excommunication, &c. These treatises were much opposed, and Huss defended them. Huss, soon after, once more returned to Prague, and engaged in other controversies. At Constance, at this time, the famous council was held, at which it was determined that a reformation was necessary; and Pope John was deposed and imprisoned. But against Huss and his followers, it also directed its thunderbolts. Wickliffe was now dead; but they reviled his memory—burnt his books—and even ordered his bones to be dug up and consumed to ashes. To Constance Huss travelled, there determined to defend his principles, and support the cause of truth. On his journey he was received with acclamations, and in three weeks arrived at that place. He was nominally examined before the pope and the cardinals; and, after remaining there some time, he was one day suddenly seized by a party of guards, in the gallery of the council, although the pope had assured him of liberty and protection. At such perfidy the assembly was surprised; and the pope confounded and alarmed, could only say that it was the act of the cardinals.

In a lonely monastery on the banks of the Rhine, belonging to the Franciscans, who as an order, were bitterly opposed to him, Huss was now confined. Yet even there he composed some interesting tracts, among which was one entitled, "A Comment upon the Commandments;" another, "Upon the Lord's Prayer;" a third, "On the Knowledge and Love of God;" and a fourth, "On the Three great Enemies of Mankind." For a long time Huss remained in prison. Catholics of more liberal principles interceded for his acquittal, but in vain. Many sessions elapsed prior to the exhibition of articles against him; but on the 5th and 6th of June, 1515, after a previous examination, he was tried for maintaining the doctrines afterwards professed in the Reformed Church, and was advised to abjure his books and recant. But he magnanimously refused: and on the 7th of July, the council censured him for being obstinate and incorrigible, and ordered "that he should be degraded from the priesthood, his books publicly burnt, and himself delivered to the secular power." That sentence he heard without emotion. He immediately supplicated the pardon of his enemies; and the bishops appointed by the council stripped him of his priestly garments, and put a mitre of paper on his head, on which devils were painted, with this inscription,—"A Ringleader of Heretics." The bishops delivered him to the emperor, and he delivered him to the Duke of Bavaria. His books were burnt at the gate of the church, and he was led to the suburbs to be burnt alive. Prior to his execution, he made a solemn public appeal to God, from the judgment of the pope and council, which was fervent and energetic. He was then surrounded with fagots, his mind all the while composed and happy. The flames were then applied to the fagots; when the martyr sang a hymn, with so loud and cheerful a voice, that he was distinctly heard through all the noise of the combustibles and of the multitude. At last he uttered, "Jesus Christ, thou Son of the living God, have mercy upon me!" and he was consumed; after which, his ashes were carefully collected and cast into the Rhine. Huss was a true ecclesiastic, and a real Christian. Gentle and condescending to the opinions of others, this amiable pattern of virtue was strict only in his principles. His great contest was with vice. His piety was calm, rational, and manly; his fortitude was undaunted. "From his infancy," said the University of Prague, "he was of such excellent morals, that during his stay here, we may venture to challenge any one to produce a single fault against him." His writings were simple, pious, affectionate, and intelligent. Luther said he was the most rational expounder of Scripture he ever met with.

HUSSITES, the followers of John Huss. See TABORITES.

HUTCHINSONIANS, the followers of John Hutchinson, who was born in Yorkshire in 1674. In the early part of his life he served the Duke of Somerset in the capacity of steward; and in the course of his travels from place to place employed himself in collecting fossils. We are told that the large and noble collection bequeathed by Dr. Woodward to the University of Cambridge was actually made by him, and even unfairly obtained from him. In 1724, he published the first part of his curious book, called "Moses' Principia," in which he ridiculed Dr. Woodward's Natural History of the Earth, and exploded the doctrine of gravitation established in Newton's Principia. In 1727, he published a second part of "Moses' Principia," containing the principles of the Scripture philosophy. From this time to his death he published a volume every year or two, which, with the manuscripts he left behind, were published in 1748, in twelve volumes 8vo. On the Monday before his death, Dr. Mead urged him to be blest; saying, pleasantly, "I will soon send you to Moses," meaning his studies; but Mr. Hutchinson, taking it in the literal sense, answered in a muttering tone, "I believe, doctor, you will;" and was so displeased, that he dismissed him for another physician; but he died in a few days after, August 28, 1737.

It appears to be a leading sentiment of his disciples, that all our ideas of divinity are formed from the ideas in nature,—that nature is a standing picture, and Scripture an application of the several parts of the picture, to draw out to us the great things of God, in order to reform our mental conceptions. To prove this point, they allege, that the Scriptures declare the invisible things of God from the formation of the world are clearly seen, being understood by the things which are made; even his eternal power and Godhead. Rom. i. 20. The heavens must declare God's righteousness and truth in the congregation of the saints. Ps. lxxxix. 5. And, in short, the whole system of nature, in one voice of analogy, declares and gives us ideas of his glory, and shows us his handy-work. We cannot have any ideas of invisible things till they are pointed out to us by revelation: and as we cannot know them immediately, such as they are in themselves, after the manner in which we know sensible objects, they must be communicated to us by the mediation of such things as we already comprehend. For this reason the Scripture is found to have a language of its own, which does not consist of words, but of signs or figures taken from visible things: in consequence of which the world which we now see becomes a sort of commentary on the mind of God, and explains the word in which we believe. The doctrines of the Christian faith are attested by the whole natural world; they are recorded in a language which has never been confounded; they are written in a text which shall never be corrupted.

The Hutchinsonians maintain that the great mystery of the Trinity is conveyed to our understandings by ideas of sense; and that the created substance of the air, or heaven, in its threefold agency of fire, light, and spirit, is the enigma of the one essence or one Jehovah in three persons. The unity of essence is exhibited by its unity of substance; the trinity of conditions, fire, light, and spirit. Thus the one substance of the air, or heaven in its three conditions, shows the unity in trinity; and its three conditions in or of one substance, the trinity in unity. For (says this denomination) if we consult the writings of the Old and New Testament, we shall find the persons of the Deity represented under the names and characters of the three material agents, fire, light, and spirit, and their actions expressed by the actions of these their emblems. The Father is called a consuming fire; and his judicial proceedings are spoken of in words which denote the several actions of fire, Jehovah is a consuming fire—Our God is a consuming fire, Deut. iv. 24; Heb. xii. 29. The Son has the name of light, and his purifying actions and offices are described by words which denote the actions and offices of light. He is the true light, which lighteth every man that cometh into the world, John i. 9; Mal. iv. 2. The Comforter has the name of Spirit; and his animating and sustaining offices are described by words, for the actions and offices of the material spirit. His actions in the spiritual economy are agreeable to his type in the natural economy; such as inspiring, impelling, driving, leading. Matt. ii. 1. The philosophic system of the Hutchinsonians is derived from their views of the Hebrew Scriptures. It rests on these suppositions: 1. That the Hebrew language was formed under divine inspiration, either all at once, or at different times, as occasion required; and that the Divine Being had a view, in constructing it, to the various revelations which he in all succeeding times should make in that language: consequently, that its words must be the most proper and determinate to convey such truths as the Deity, during the Old Testament dispensation, thought fit to make known to the sons of men. Farther than this: that the inspired penmen of those ages at least were under the guidance of Heaven in the choice of words for recording what was revealed to them; therefore that the Old Testament, if the language be rightly understood, is the most determinate in its meaning of any other book under heaven.—2. That whatever is recorded in the Old Testament is strictly and literally true, allowing only for a few common figures of rhetoric; that nothing contrary to truth is accommodated to vulgar apprehensions.

In proof of this the Hutchinsonians argue in this manner. The primary and ultimate design of revelation is indeed to teach men divinity; but in subserviency to that, geography, history, and chronology, are occasionally introduced; all which are allowed to be just and authentic. There are also innumerable references to things of nature, and descriptions of them. If, then, the former are just, and to be depended on, for the same reason the latter ought to be esteemed philosophically true. Farther: they think it not unworthy of God, that he should make it a secondary end of his revelation to unfold the secrets of his works; as the primary was to make known the mysteries of his nature, and the designs of his grace, that men might thereby be led to admire and adore the wisdom and goodness which the great Author of the universe has displayed throughout all his works. And as our minds are often referred to natural things for ideas of spiritual truths, it is of great importance, in order to conceive aright of divine matters, that our ideas of the natural things referred to be strictly just and true.

Mr. Hutchinson imagined he found that the Hebrew Scriptures had some capital words, which he thought had not been duly considered and understood; and which, he has endeavoured to prove, contain in their radical meaning the greatest and most comfortable truths. The cherubim he explains to be a hieroglyphic of divine construction, or a sacred image, to describe, as far as figures could go, the humanity united to Deity: and so he treats of several other words of similar import. From all which he concluded, that the rites and ceremonies of the Jewish dispensation were so many delineations of Christ, in what he was to be, to do, and to suffer; that the early Jews knew them to be types of his actions and sufferings; and, by performing them as such, were so far Christians both in faith and practice.

The Hutchinsonians, how fanciful soever many of their views of philosophy, and how utterly untenable their system of Hebrew philology, have, for the most part, been men of devout minds, zealous in the cause of Christianity, and untainted with heterodox opinions, which have so often divided the church of Christ. The names of Romaine, Bishop Horne, Parkhurst, and others of this denomination, will be long esteemed, both for the piety they possessed, and the good they have been the instruments of promoting amongst mankind. HYMN, a song or ode in honour of the Divine Being. St. Hilary, bishop of Poitiers, is said to have been the first who composed hymns to be sung in churches, and was followed by St. Ambrose. Most of those in the Roman breviary were composed by Prudentius. The hymns or odes of the ancients generally consisted of three sorts of stanzas, one of which was sung by the band as they walked from east to west; another was performed as they returned from west to east; the third part was sung before the altar. The Jewish hymns were accompanied with trumpets, drums, and cymbals, to assist the voices of the Levites and the people. We have had a considerable number of hymns composed in our own country. The most esteemed are those of Watts, Doddridge, and Newton. As to selections, few are superior to Dr. Rippon's and Dr. Williams's. See PSALMODY.
